ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

ROYAL COMMISSION

ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

At the Royal Commissions House, Old Palace Yard, S.W.

ONE HUNDRED AND ELEVENTH DAY.

Thursday, 11th February 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK.
Sir SAMUEL JOHN GURNEY HOARE, Bart., M.P.
Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.
Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. RICHARD DURNING HOLT, M.P.
Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Miss HALDANE.
Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.
Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C., called and examined.

43,891. (Chairman.) Sir Kenneth, what is the post you occupy?—I suppose, at any rate for the purposes of this Commission, I am Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor.

43,892. And that post has the same relation to the Lord Chancellor as that of the Permanent Secretary in other Government departments has to the Minister in charge?—Yes, practically; there is no real difference.

43,893. How long have you occupied this post?—Exactly thirty years; no, it is thirty-one years now. I became Permanent Secretary in 1884.

43,894. And in that capacity you are the permanent officer who is responsible to the Lord Chancellor in his control of all the legal departments?—Certainly.

43,895. As regards the representation of the department in Parliament: in the House of Lords, of course, it is represented by the Lord Chancellor; what is the representation in the House of Commons?—There is no representation in the House of Commons.

43,896. If questions are asked in the House of Commons, who, in practice, answers them?—They used to be almost invariably answered by the Secretary to the Treasury, because they were nearly always, I think, questions that bore in some way upon financial matters; but of late years it has been much more common for the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General to answer such questions.

43,897. This, perhaps, is a point somewhat outside our reference, but in your opinion is that representation satisfactory?—I think it is very unsatisfactory. I should hope that you would not consider it outside your reference. I should have thought it was a very important thing from several points of view, and I should be glad at any period you think proper to say a little more about it if I were allowed.

43,898. Perhaps you will give us your opinion on that point; the Commission can, of course, consider later whether it is within their reference to make a representation on the subject?—In the first place, there is nobody in the House of Commons whose duty it is to answer; there is nobody whom the Lord Chancellor can be said to instruct for the purpose. A very common form of answer in the House of Commons is that either the Secretary to the Treasury or the Attorney-General, whichever it is, will communicate with the Lord Chancellor. Of course that is not very satisfactory; you do not get much further. Another very important thing is that when the Estimates come on, which they very rarely do, we have nobody who is really familiar with them, or whose duty it is to answer about them, or who would be in a position, I suppose, to answer anything that was like a critical question about them. We have nobody who represents the department. And then with regard to a very large sphere of the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction, that is to say, with regard to legislation, especially Legal Bills, there is nobody to take charge of them. That bears upon the general subject of the Lord Chancellor's Office in this way, that there have been several Bills in my time dealing with questions of the organisation of the department, and so forth, things which, because they are laid down in the Judicature Acts, cannot be brought in without legislation amending the Acts. We have again and again had Bills dealing with questions of that kind; some have passed through the House of Lords, and others have been brought in in the House of Commons; but they make no progress, because it is nobody's interest to look after them. If the Secretary to the Treasury has a little spare time he may, perhaps, take some steps about such a Bill, or the Attorney-General may; but the fact is that any Bills relating to that department come at the very last, and almost invariably suffer the fate of Bills that come on late in the course of the Session. It would be a very great advantage if we had somebody in the position of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for another departments whose interest it was to look after a Bill. I think those are the chief points. Is the amount of importance, taking in the whole sphere?—Yes, there was a Bill in 1884 about the Lord Chancellor's functions, and it does seem to me that it should not have a representative of that in the House of Commons. I may add, perhaps, that every Lord Chancellor under whom I have served has felt the same thing about it.

11 February 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

43,899. Will you tell us generally what are the legal departments that are under the Lord Chancellor's control?—The main department comes under the general head of the Supreme Court, though that is divided into several sub-divisions. Then I apprehend that you intend to inquire into the County Courts, which are under his jurisdiction; and then I recollect that the Commission left over the Land Registry, though I do not know that it is strictly one of the legal departments, but it was left over to be treated at the same time as the legal departments. The Lord Chancellor makes all the appointments there, and practically lays down all the regulations and everything about it; and so it was thought better, as several of those present will remember, to leave it over until this part of the inquiry.

43,900. Yes; the Commission has already decided that the Land Registry will be within their present inquiry?—I should think that those might be said to be the three principal departments, of which the Supreme Court is very much the largest.

43,901. Will you then tell us, in somewhat more detail, what are the departments of the Supreme Court?—In the first place there is the main division into the Court of Appeal, the King's Bench Division, the Chancery Division, and the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division; those are the main divisions of the Supreme Court. Then there are a good many subsidiary offices, some of which are directly part of the Supreme Court establishment, and others are closely allied to it and are under the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction. I have thought it best to put them all under the general head of the Supreme Court for the purposes of this inquiry. The first office to be mentioned is called the Central Office. That is something more than the offices of the King's Bench Division; its name describes what it really is, namely, a collection of all those offices which are common to all the divisions. There are, for instance, the Writ Office, the Taxing Office, and so on—that class of offices; and then all the offices which are peculiar to the King's Bench Division.

43,902. In the case of the Taxing Office, is it common to all the divisions?—No, it is not common to all the divisions; but I have no doubt that later on you will find that you will inquire as to why it does not apply to all the divisions.

43,903. Does it apply to the Chancery Division or the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division?—It applies to the Chancery Division. It is anticipating a little what I think you are likely to ask me later, and if you allow me I will leave it alone at present.

43,904. If you please?—Then we have the Chancery Division. The offices of the Chancery Division are in two main blocks: Chancery Chambers, that is where the individual judges of the Chancery Division carry on their business with a staff of clerks in each chamber, and then the Chancery Registrars' Office. The registrars are the people who draw up the orders after they are made in Court, and they are separate at present from Chancery Chambers. Those are the two offices in that division. Then you have the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, where there is the Principal Probate Registry, which is a very large affair, not housed in the Law Courts; it is in Somerset House.

43,905. The whole of the offices in the first two divisions you have mentioned, the Central Office and the Chancery Division, are in the Law Courts?—Yes, and the Admiralty Registry of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division is also in the Law Courts, but the Probate Registry is in Somerset House. It is a very big affair, and for some reason that I forget the Commission which recommended what offices should be concentrated together in the Royal Courts of Justice did not propose that the Probate Registry should be brought there. I think that probably is because it is related in some respects to the Revenue Department in Somerset House.

43,906. The Divorce part of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division a separate registry?—That is comparatively small affair; there is not very much to be carried out over those cases. The decree is made and is registered by the Probate Registrar, and that is about all that happens. Then besides those there is the Office of Bankruptcy, which is a separate thing. It used to be combined with the Chancery Division, but that is very ancient history. For a long time it has had a separate office, and with that is allied a small office for the business done in the winding-up of companies. That also used to be in Chancery Chambers.

43,907. Where are the Bankruptcy Offices accommodated now?—They are in what is called Bankruptcy Buildings; they are not inside the Law Courts; they are next door.

43,908. And as regards the Taxing Department?—That is at the Law Courts. Then there are a nest of other offices—perhaps you will allow me to read the list of them in the order I have put them down here. First of all there are the officers of the Courts of Assize. Each of the circuits has a staff, a Clerk of Assize and two or three subordinate officers. Then there is a new institution, the Court of Criminal Appeal. I will go more into detail about that a little later. Then there are the District Registrars; those are men practically in the position of masters of the Supreme Court, but scattered over the country in the different provinces. They were instituted by the Judicature Acts by way of mitigating the centralisation of judicial affairs. People used to have to come up to London for everything in the High Court, and it was thought at that time that it was desirable to have officers in the different centres about the country where preliminary affairs could be transacted before the cases came on for trial.

43,909. Are they in relation with all the divisions of the Supreme Court.—Yes. Then there is the department of Masters in Lunacy and Visitors of Lunatics, having charge of lunatics who are called lunatics so found by inquisition, not the great body of lunatics who are in institutions under orders and certificates, but they are propertied lunatics whose property you may say is in the Court of Chancery. They used to be in the Chancery Division; for a great many years now that department has been a separate affair, but still they are under the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction. They are housed in the Royal Courts of Justice and all their regulations and the classification of their staff, and so on, are the same as in the legal departments, and you find in the Judicature Acts that it says that the officers in lunacy are to be treated in the same way as officers of the Supreme Court. Then the next I have put down is the Pay Office. It is not one of the legal departments, strictly speaking; it is a Treasury Office, the Treasury appoints the clerks and so forth; but it is housed for convenience in the Law Courts. It is the department of the Paymaster's Office which deals with legal affairs. There is a very large financial business done by the Chancery Division in the administration of estates, wills, and trusts, and various kinds of things; so that there is a separate department of the Paymaster's Office in the Royal Courts of Justice for dealing with those matters. The work of that office is closely allied to the Courts, and all its affairs are arranged under rules which the Lord Chancellor makes with the concurrence of the Treasury; so that if it has not been inquired into before (and I do not recollect in our deliberations here that it was inquired into) I think it ought to be inquired into now.

43,910. (Mr. Boutwood.) When you say the Paymaster, do you mean the Paymaster-General?—He is called Assistant Paymaster-General for the Supreme Court.

43,911. But you say in your précis a department of the Paymaster-General?—His office is a branch of the department of the Paymaster-General.

43,912. (Chairman.) As regards discipline, promotion, and so forth, is that branch under the Lord Chancellor?—No.

43,913. Under the Treasury?—Under the Treasury.

43,914. But its work is entirely concerned with the operations of the Courts and of the payment, I suppose, of the officers of the Court and of the staff?—Absolutely. There is an Act called the Supreme Court Funds Act, and rules that are called the Supreme Court Fund Rules, which regulate everything that he has to do, but do not regulate his staff. Of course, it has a bearing upon the amount of staff he may require but it does not regulate his staff; the Lord Chancellor has nothing to do with his staff.

11 February 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

43,915. (Bishop of Southwark.) Where does the money come from for that fund?—That is money paid into Court in various suits.

43,916. It has nothing to do with public money?—It has something to do with public money in a very peculiar and interesting way; that is, that the Treasury takes possession of the suitors' money and does what it thinks fit with it, subject to a guarantee that whenever an order is made that money is to be paid to a suitor they will produce it.

43,917. (Chairman.) Is not the expense of this department borne on the estimates of the Supreme Court?—I am ashamed to say that at this moment I forget. It is not down on our establishment list.

43,918. Is it not on page 15 of the estimates of the Supreme Court of Judicature?—Yes; in the estimates. Then there is an office that is called the Central Scrivenery Department; they are the copyists; they do the copying work. There are some rather important questions that arise upon that later, as you will see. Then, I have put down on the list the judges' clerks. They are paid out of the vote; they are a large class, and there are some important questions about them that I think you would wish to go into. You may, perhaps, later, think they ought to be ruled out; I myself think they ought to be ruled in. Then there is the department of the Official Solicitor; he is in the same kind of position as the solicitors of other departments, like the Solicitor for Inland Revenue, the Solicitor to the Treasury, and so forth, into whose offices the Commission has already inquired, as you will recollect; but our Official Solicitor's Department has not been inquired into.

43,919. Under whose directions does he act?—He is mainly under the directions of the Lord Chancellor, no doubt; but he has to act under the directions of different judges on different occasions.

43,920. We shall no doubt hear about him later on in more detail?—Yes, he will probably give his own account.

43,921. (Mr. Boutwood.) Is he the solicitor of the Supreme Court?—The official solicitor of the Supreme Court.

43,922. (Chairman.) Will you continue your list?—Then there is the staff of attendants, ushers, and so forth who are called the Royal Courts of Justice staff. They are a body of about 170 men who, I think, must be included amongst the legal departments, although they are not clerks. And, finally, there is the office that is called the Crown Office in Chancery. It is one with which I myself am personally concerned. I put it last, because the main business of the Crown Office is not within the Supreme Court of Judicature. The Clerk of the Crown is an officer both of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords, and his operations in that respect are quite independent of the Supreme Court, and even independent of the Lord Chancellor.

43,923. Perhaps you will tell us about it in more detail later?—Yes. I put it last for that reason.

43,924. (Mr. Holt.) Do I rightly understand that the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's Court has nothing whatever to do with you and does not employ any of these people?—Certainly.

43,925. He is quite independent?—Yes.

43,926. And he has a staff of his own different from the staff you have put before us?—Absolutely. I must confess, though it sounds rather fatuous, that it never occurred to me to put down the Lancaster Office, and yet it undoubtedly is one of the legal departments. I suppose that, having at least enough things of my own to look after, I forgot about it, but I presume that you will inquire into it.

43,927. It practically is the equivalent of the Chancery Court?—Certainly, but I certainly think it was an omission upon my part when I was asked the question what are the legal departments to leave out the Chancery of Lancaster, and also to leave out the Chancery of Durham.

43,928. (Chairman.) Will you tell us something, so far as you think it necessary for the purposes of this inquiry, as to the history of the legal departments and the manner in which they have assumed their present shape?—There is a great deal of history that is of interest to legal people, but I think there is a very clear root of title, 40 years, which is a very good period for a root of title, going back to the Judicature Acts. I should suggest that it would be really a waste of time to go further back than that. There may here or there appear some need to ask some question on the subject, but I think if you go back to the Judicature Acts, that is to say to 1873, you certainly go back beyond everybody who holds any office of any sort in the Supreme Court in any legal department, I think, except one. So far as I can recollect there is only one survivor.

43,929. The reform of 1873 completely changed the shape of the Courts of Justice and placed them in their present position?—Yes; it brought them all together into one Supreme Court.

43,930. Is the arrangement of the courts and offices substantially the same as that which was set up by the Judicature Acts?—It has grown up since the passing of the Judicature Acts. I think it has entirely fulfilled the scheme set out in the Judicature Acts.

43,931. If I put it that the process of unification which the Judicature Acts initiated has been made more complete since, does that correctly represent the position?—Yes. There was, of course, very great difficulty in the early days—a difficulty that has been almost entirely surmounted now, in that there was an immense amount of vested interests of existing officers with rights which could not be disturbed, and it took a long time to put into working order a complete system when you had to make, or wished to make, material alterations in the position of various individuals; but that has now, I think I may say, completely worked itself out.

43,932. Owing to the fact that all the present officers have been appointed since the date of the Judicature Acts?—Yes.

43,933. Was it at that time that the Treasury was first brought in as a concurrent regulating power?—I think practically the Treasury came in rather earlier. When first these operations were going on of renovation of the legal establishment, there was an Act we used to have a great deal to do with, called the Salaries and Funds Act of 1869. I need only say in a very few words what the meaning of that Act was. Previously to that time the money out of which salaries were paid was the actual money of the suitors; the suitors paid fees to the courts for the various stages of their litigation; these were collected together in what was called the Suitors Fee Fund, which was looked after by an officer (an ancestor of the Official Solicitor) who was called the Solicitor to the Suitors Fee Fund; and the Lord Chancellor made orders on that fund, which was, so to speak, his own fund, for paying salaries and so forth. The great change made by the Salaries and Funds Act was that all fees were paid to the Treasury, and the Treasury became responsible for paying salaries, not out of those fees, but out of their general funds. There was an agreement with the Treasury a few years later that fees enough should be taken to make the Supreme Court self-supporting; and that is the principle upon which things have proceeded practically since 1869.

43,934. Can the Supreme Court be said to be self-supporting now?—I think more than self-supporting, with one great exception, which is that it is considered in principle that the judges' salaries must be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. I think that goes back to Magna Charta. It is supposed that the King is giving free justice by not making the suitor pay for his judge, but he pays for everything else.

43,935. Then, in principle, if the salaries of the judges are left out of account, the revenue from fees is intended to cover, and does in fact cover, the whole expense of the machinery of the courts and their officers?—I think it does. Perhaps you will ask somebody from the Treasury about it.

43,936. (Bishop of Southwark.) Is the amount of the fees determined by that object?—Yes, there was a practical agreement on that subject, about 1884 I think it was.

43,937. Did the Judicature Act of 1873 follow upon the Judicature Commission?—Yes.

43,938. It carried out their recommendations?—Yes, I think all the recommendations could have been carried out under that Act. That Act has not been fully worked out, I think.

43,939. (Chairman.) Since the date of the Judicature Acts are such changes as have been made substantially further instalments in carrying out the reforms contemplated by the Judicature Commission?—I think they may very fairly be described in that way.

43,940. Now, as regards the Acts of Parliament which at present regulate the Supreme Court and its officers, the principal one, I presume, is the Judicature Act itself?—Yes, the Act of 1873, coupled with the Act of 1875. The Act of 1873 was passed at the end of that year, and then it was postponed because of the great practical difficulty of carrying it into operation immediately; then there came a change of Government, and some very considerable modifications were made by the Act of 1875. Lord Chancellor Selborne was the author of the Act of 1873, and Lord Chancellor Cairns was Lord Chancellor when the Act of 1875 was passed, which made some alterations. I do not think any of them are alterations with which this Commission need be concerned; they made differences of very great importance in the legal world, but I do not think they are matters with which you need be concerned. But it does not do to speak of the Act of 1873 as if it was the principal Act. It is always known as the principal Act, but the Act of 1875 must be read with it by anybody who wants fully to understand the position of the Supreme Court.

43,941. Those Acts, I think, were followed by the Act of 1879 regulating the position of officers?—Yes, that Act of 1879 is a very important Act for this Commission in inquiring into our organisation.

43,942. Was that the outcome of an inquiry?—There was a committee. It was a little before my time, but I was very well acquainted with it. I think it was called the Legal Offices Committee.

43,943. Was that the Legal Offices Committee of 1878?—That would be it. I have not looked at it for years. It was a very good committee.

43,944. (Mr. Boutwood.) Was it a Treasury Committee or a Parliamentary Committee?—I think it was called a Departmental Committee of the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury.

43,945. (Chairman.) The Master of the Rolls was Chairman?—Yes, Sir George Jessel.

43,946. Those are the principal Acts of Parliament bearing on the position of officers?—I think, if I may say so, that any member of the Commission who wanted to go into this need not look at anything in the Judicature Act of 1873, except Sections 77 to 84. Sections 77 and 84 themselves are the two most important sections. Section 77 is the one that transferred to the Supreme Court all the offices existing in all the Courts going on at that time; it transferred the old body to the new body. Section 84 of the Act is of very great importance, for this reason, because it is the one that lays down that the appointment of officers in each division is to be made by the President of that division. If the King's Bench Division had an office of its own, all the appointments under that section would be in the Lord Chief Justice of England, but it has not a department of its own; as I explained a little time ago, it is absorbed in the Central Office, which also contains those offices which are common to all parts of the Supreme Court. Accordingly the result was, as you would see in the Act of 1879 (the Officers Act), that there is a sort of committee for appointment in that combined office, which has gone through various vicissitudes, but at this moment it consists of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, and the Master of the Rolls, because they were the persons who contributed to the General Office from their offices to make up the common office and they appoint in turns.

43,947. Perhaps you will deal with the question of nomination a little later?—I only wanted to say why that section is of importance.

43,948. Will you tell us what other Acts of Parliament or Rules or Orders have a material bearing?—There are the Rules of the Supreme Court, because the Act says that the different officers and different functions are to be divided by Rules of Court; so that there are certain Rules of Court called Orders LV., LXI., LXII., and LXIII., Rules of the Supreme Court, which lay down what is necessary for the constitution of those departments. Order LXI. is the main one.

43,949. Order LXI. appears to deal with the Central Office?—That gives the departments of the Central Office. It is divided into seven or eight departments in the schedule to that Order: the Writ and Appearance Department, the Associates Department, the Crown Office Department, and so on.

43,950. We shall find all that in Order LXI.?—Yes.

43,951. Do the other Orders deal with the other offices of the Court?—Yes. Those from LXI. to LXIII.

43,952. Then besides the Rules of the Supreme Court there are Orders of the Lord Chancellor bearing on the point?—There exist the Orders, and I should think you ought to see them, for constituting each of these departments, that is to say, there is the Order saying what is to be the classification, and what are to be the salaries of the masters and clerks of the Central Office; that I think was in 1882. Then there is a similar Order by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury doing the same thing for the Chancery Division; that I think was in 1881. Then there was a similar Order for the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division made in 1882.

43,953. Are those Orders published?—They certainly used to be published; I do not know if they are published now. All persons concerned know them by heart, and I should think they have probably gone out of print. I could only find in my own office the originals.

43,954. Could you put in copies for the information of the Commission?—Yes, there is no difficulty about it. Then I have put down, among the documents you really ought to be referred to, the various departmental committees that have sat from time to time inquiring into the different departments.

43,955. Are those committees appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—I think all by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury together. I think that you would find that there was a Treasury officer on every one of them. There was a very important committee on the Chancery Division in 1885, and one on the Central Office that, I think, sat in 1886, but it is always referred to as in 1887; I think it was only published in 1887. Both of those are Parliamentary Papers. Then there was an important one on the Taxing Office, which you referred to just now, which recommended that the taxing offices of the different Courts should be brought together into one office.

43,956. Is that a Parliamentary Paper?—No, it is not; it is entirely a departmental affair.

43,957. Could a copy of that be put in?—Certainly. And then there was one on the work of the Lunacy Masters' Office* and another on its staff, one on the Probate Registry, one on the Chancery Registrars Office,† and one on the Central Scrivenery Department. The importance of those documents is that our establishment is formed on the recommendations that were settled by those committees.

43,958. Perhaps you will be kind enough to let the Commission have copies of all reports that have not been presented to Parliament?—Yes. Then there is one document, a very clear and simple document, which I think certainly each Commissioner who wishes to go into detail about these things ought to have in his hands, what we call the Establishment List. Really everything I have mentioned in those numerous reports and Acts of Parliament, and so on, is there. This is the result. This is what we did. This is what was paid on the 1st April last to every man. There is everybody's name; you see what he gets, you see what prospect he has of getting anything more, you see when he was appointed, his promotion, and in fact everything about him. It is a very simple and short document, and is as clear as possible.

43,959. That I think is in the hands of the Commission. Are there any other documents which you consider should be placed before the Commission?—There is the Order under which the Courts of Justice staff is constituted; the only other document I thought that the Commission need be troubled with is the Order by the Civil Service Commission as to the age, the subjects of examination, and so forth. That, of course, is an important order, because our system is that everybody who is nominated for an appointment has to obtain the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners.

43,960. That also is in the hands of the Commission?—Yes, it is a public document.

43,961. You have now given us a list of the departments and a general view of their relation to the Supreme Court and to the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, I should think so.

43,962. Will you now give us a general description of the nature of the organisation of the legal departments?—Yes, that is important. There are one or two points of very great difference between our organisation and the general organisation of the Civil Service. If I might be allowed for a moment to speak as if I was still one of the Commissioners, I should like to be allowed to say that I should have thought the most useful way of inquiring into the legal departments was to see why what we recommended for the other Civil Establishments should not be applied to the Supreme Court. I know that another Commissioner who has retired from the work of the Commission said to me that he thought that, having come to this point in the inquiry, the most convenient thing would have been to appoint a sub-committee with instructions to look into that very question, and that that really was what we wanted to find out: Why, with regard to appointments and all the other particulars, there should be a difference between the legal departments and other departments. Well, one difficulty about the matter starts at once out of your question, Sir, because our organisation is of this kind. At the head we have officers of professional qualifications who may be generally called the masters of the Supreme Court. It happens that in some departments they still retain their old name of registrars, but substantially they are what are called masters of the Supreme Court. They are men who by statute have to be of a certain position in one of the two branches of the profession; they must either be barristers of so many years' practice, or solicitors of so many years' practice. The idea is (and I do not think it is likely to be displaced or perhaps even disputed) that for the class of work they have to do you require a man who has not only been educated as a lawyer, but has practised as a lawyer, and knows what the practice is and not merely what the books are.

43,963. Can you give a general description of the nature of the work they have to do?—The nature of their work is to a large extent really what you may call judicial, because they have to hear the applications of suitors at an early stage, the preliminary stages of their litigation, and to decide whether a man is to be allowed to take this step or that step or the other step, his opponents strenuously representing that he ought not to be allowed to take it; they have to decide questions of that sort which nobody can decide merely from being a learned lawyer. He ought to be a man who has had to deal with those questions as a practitioner. The judge sits in court and decides the questions between the litigants after there has been a long preliminary wrangle over the steps that finally settle the issues which the judge has got to try. After he has given his judgment, which perhaps involves one very short proposition, though probably described at considerable length, that proposition involves between the parties very often a very great deal of working out, and that again is done under the superintendence of this class of officers. There again it is most important that they should know what are the practice and the experience of the profession upon matters of that kind.

43,964. May it be described in this way, that the masters decide points of procedure and execution which are subordinate to the main issue that is decided by the judge?—Yes, I should say that is a fair description. I do not know what Mr. Coward would say.

43,965. (Chairman.) Is there any class of cases of which the master or registrar decides the principal issue?—That is a very difficult question to answer. Of course, a case may very often turn upon what has been decided in one of these preliminary stages. I think the last case but one heard on appeal in the House of Lords, reported last week, was as to whether the Court ought to have been allowed to hear the stage of the case that was before a master in the first instance; that went up right through the Courts and came up to the House of Lords. That illustrates that the question may be of the most enormous importance at the very earliest stage of the case.

43,966. Let me put it in this way. Is there any class of cases, apart from cases where judgment is given by default, which never came before the judge at all, and are decided entirely by the master's or registrar's decision?

(Witness.) In one sense, of course, many cases are decided in that way, because the parties having seen that a perfectly competent man has given a decision upon the point which he knows will really decide the case, if the litigant is a sensible fellow and advised by good counsel, he goes no further.

43,967. (Mr. Boutwood.) Does the statute specifically require practice and not standing?—I do not think that everywhere the Acts are quite uniform as to the language that they use. I think that practice is always meant, but I think you are probably right that we find the word standing, not practice, in one or two cases.

43,968. (Mr. Holt.) If a judge decides that A. owes B. a certain sum of money unknown, are these the persons to investigate what is the correct amount of damage?—No, the question of damages would probably in most cases be the main point to be settled by the jury.

43,969. But, supposing the judge refers the amount of damages to the registrar, that is the man who would do it?—Yes, that is the man.

43,970. (Chairman.) Then is the whole of their work of a judicial character, or have they what might be described as administrative work as well?—I think you may say they have both, certainly.

43,971. Would that be the case especially in the Chancery offices?—Yes, I think so.

43,972. Have the registrars in the Chancery offices to deal with the practical administration of estates?—They have to carry out the directions of the judge or of the master in chambers as to what is to be done about the money. They have to work out the details of what are often very elaborate orders. Although perhaps the judge has not done very much more than say that he gives judgment for the plaintiff or the defendant, it may require a certain amount of working out in a Chancery case, and that is the registrar's business. He calls the parties, that is to say, their solicitors, before him, and they discuss the terms of this order, and he gives the directions to the paymaster who has got the money, if there is money in court, as there often is, of course, in administration of estates.

43,973. That process, if I gather rightly, would be the working out of the judicial decision into detailed directions?—Yes, to the extent of giving the directions, not seeing that they are carried out.

43,974. Does that include what I might describe as a business discretion in dealing with property?—I think you had better ask a registrar about the details of that. I think he might not be satisfied with my description. I should have said that he had not discretion of any sort.

43,975. (Mr. Coward.) The Order would direct what should be done, and he would carry it out?—Yes; the order of the judge is short, and not in detail generally, and the registrar has to interpret it, covering probably an immense amount of detail.

43,976. (Mr. Holt.) Could he of his own accord go back to the judge to ask for further instruction?—Certainly he could, and very often the parties insist upon his doing so. They have the right to go to the judge.

11 February 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

43,977. (Chairman.) And are all decisions given by the master or registrar subject to appeal to the judge?—Yes. There are different ways in which the appeal is brought, but I would suggest that I should not go into that.

43,978. Do we rightly understand that far the greater part of a master's work is of a judicial character?—I think it would be fairly described as that.

43,979. And that it is distinguished from the work of the judges by being, broadly, of a less important character, dealing with subordinate points or consequential points?—Yes, where he would give a decision. There are very important things that go through him, but he knows very well that the decision will not rest with him.

43,980. (Mr. Coward.) Before you pass from that, might I not say that the master's qualifications are necessarily that he should be a lawyer and that he should be thoroughly acquainted with the practice?—That is my opinion, and I think that is the meaning of the Acts under which the qualification is laid down.

43,981. The section is Section 10 of the Act of 1879: "A person shall not be qualified to be appointed master of the Supreme Court, unless he is or has been a practising barrister or solicitor of five years' standing, or has practised for five years as a special pleader or as a special pleader and barrister; but nothing in this section shall affect," etc.?—That is the section. Of course, five years is nothing; there is no such thing, in my experience at least, as a man being appointed who has only five years. Just as the qualification for a judge I think is ten years, but very few are appointed with less than 20 years.

43,982. (Mr. Boutwood.) Are they brought in straight from the outside profession?—Yes. Then you see there is a great gap. That is the immense difference between the Civil Service and the legal service; you go right down from these gentlemen, who may be called 1,500 pounders, because, though there are some who have higher salaries, that is the real maximum salary, 1,500*l.*, you go right down to 600*l.*, and that is an enormous gap. Generally speaking, our organisation makes a complete distinction between those who are at the head, the masters, and the staff of clerks. The staff of clerks begin in the lowest grade at 100*l.* a year, and the maximum, subject to some personal cases, is 600*l.* a year.

43,984. Are there one or two offices in which there is a class somewhat higher than that? In the Chancery Registrar's Office there are Clerks to the Registrars are there not?—Yes; but I think for the purpose of your present inquiry it may be taken that the organisation is:—a set of judicial personages (I think you may almost describe them) at 1,500*l.* a year, with a staff of clerks under them in three grades, third, second, and first, with a maximum of 600*l.* That at once raises a very great difficulty as to applying to the legal departments the same recommendations that were made by this Commission for the Civil Service generally.

43,985. (Mr. Holt.) Am I right in understanding that no first class clerk ever has or ever can become a master or registrar?—That is one of the questions which I hope this Commission will consider. I do not know if this is the best place to speak about it. You will see that later.

43,986. (Mr. Boutwood.) Would you explain, before you pass on, that last answer of yours, why that gap between the two classes creates a difficulty in applying the general Civil Service ideas?—I only suggest to the Commission that that is a great distinction between the legal departments and the ordinary departments, and which will make a difficulty unless you alter it.

43,987. (Chairman.) Is the work of the clerks entirely distinct from the work of the masters?—I think it must be regarded as such. It is a very difficult question to answer.

43,988. In principle is the work of the clerks non-judicial in character and entirely distinct from that of a master?—Yes, I think, giving an accurate description of what their duties are, you would arrive at that.

43,989. What is the function of the master, or, as the case may be, of the registrar with regard to the staff of clerks?—Yes, and it would be convenient if we always called them masters. The language of the statute says that the business of the clerks shall be under the control (or some such word) of persons to be called masters. That is the language of the statute and that is the practice.

43,990. You have given the Commission a general view of the organisation, and before entering into that in any further detail it will be convenient to deal with the question of appointment. Will you tell us what are the methods of appointment, and by what authorities appointments are made to these various grades?—I think I mentioned that under Section 84 of the Judicature Act the president of each division appoints all the officers; that is laid down in the Act. The result of that would be that all the officers, both masters and clerks in the King's Bench Division, would be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice who is president of that division, that those in the Chancery Division would be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who is President of the Chancery Division; and those in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division would be appointed by the President, as he is called, of that division; he has no special title like the Lord Chief Justice. But the Central Office is a composite office. It was made up under the Act which we call the Officers Act of 1879, by which there were combined in the Central Office several departments which were under the jurisdiction of different judges: all the Common Law offices, all the King's Bench offices are in the department, and certain offices that used to be under the jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls were brought into the Central Office. The Writ Office and Record Office used to be in the Rolls Office in old times; I need not enter into the history of that; but when the Central Office was constituted the Master of the Rolls was made to contribute, so to speak, the Writ Office and the Record Office, and so it was considered that he ought to have a share in the appointment of the officers in the department which had swallowed up his former office. Then the Lord Chancellor had no power of appointment over the Central Office when it was first constituted, but there were in existence then two other divisions of the Common Law Courts that were called the Exchequer and Common Pleas, and there was under the Officers Act, 1879, a committee for appointments in this composite office consisting of the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Then the Common Pleas and the Exchequer were abolished in 1881, and one big division of the King's Bench was formed, and a very strong opinion was expressed, as will be seen in the Debates in Parliament at that time, that the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench was not to swallow up the appointments of these two other officers, and so they had to make a new board of appointment; and the Lord Chancellor was brought in, and so it happens that he has his turn in the appointments on that side.

43,991. Then the appointments are made in rotation by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls?—The words of the statute are that they are to be in rotation or in such order as they may determine amongst themselves, and what they have done in practice (it is not laid down anywhere) is that they have two turns; they have a turn for masters and they have a turn for clerks, for very obvious reasons; otherwise if a vacancy occurred in a clerkship, when it was the Lord Chancellor's turn, he would appoint a man at 100*l.* a year; if the next person to die happened to be a master the other judge would have an appointment of 1,500*l.* a year.

43,992. There is a separate rota for the masterships and clerkships?—There is no such thing as a rota laid down, but that is the way it has been worked.

43,993. (Mr. Holt.) Have they got any other officers to advise them in this matter, or do they each act through separate subordinates?—The nearest thing to a common officer, I should think, was myself, but there is no other community. I have no real relation to the Lord Chief Justice or to the Master of the Rolls, and they certainly have no right to give me any orders.

43,994. (Mr. Boutwood.) So that each of these acts of patronage is the act of one man?—Absolutely.

43,995. (Mr. Holt.) And there are three independent streams?—I know nothing about what the Lord Chief Justice or the Master of the Rolls may do when there is a vacancy, except that they expect me to let them know, and they are good enough to accept anything I may tell them about whose turn it is, and sometimes they allow me to make some other remarks about whether it is desirable to fill up the appointment, and so forth. But that is absolutely personal; there is no duty upon my part towards them or any authority on their part as regards me.

43,996. (Chairman.) And there is no common list of candidates?—They only come to me as the person who is supposed to know about affairs in general.

43,997. Then as regards the departments which do not come under those three main heads of the Central Office, the Chancery Division, and the Probate Division, in whom is the appointment to them vested, for instance the Bankruptcy Department and the Companies Winding-up Department?—There is a general provision in Section 84, of which the practical result is that if nobody else has been given the appointment the Lord Chancellor has the appointment. He appoints in the Bankruptcy Office and the Companies Office.

43,998. And in Lunacy?—Yes, in Lunacy; that completes the list.

43,999. Who appoints the District Registrars?—That is rather an involved affair. With the exception of Liverpool and Manchester the District Registrar and the County Court Registrar are the same person, and the County Court Judge appoints the County Court Registrar, so that he practically appoints the District Registrar.

44,000. (Mr. Holt.) What happens in Liverpool and Manchester?—Under a section in, I think it is, the Judicature Act, 1881, it is said that where the amount of business in a registry, where there would naturally be both County Court business and High Court business, is so large that one man cannot do it, and that there must be two offices, the Lord Chancellor can separate the High Court work from the County Court work, and appoint a separate man for each; and that is what takes place only at Liverpool and Manchester as a matter of fact.

44,001. (Mr. Boutwood.) Does the Probate Division come under that?—That is a separate affair again. That is under the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, because he is the President.

44,002. (Mr. Holt.) For the Liverpool and Manchester posts are they within the Lord Chancellor's own patronage, or do they come in rotation with others?—No, they are his affair; the Lord Chancellor appoints.

44,003. (Chairman.) Then as regards the subordinate posts in the Royal Courts of Justice staff, are they appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—They are appointed, by far the largest number of them, by the Lord Chancellor, but there are details described in the Order constituting the staff under which the different presidents of the divisions appoint the men who are attached to their Courts. The attendants are divided into different classes, and one important class are the men who used to be called ushers; those are the attendants at the Court both for keeping order and also if people want to get books, or to send a message, and so forth. The persons who are ushers in the King's Bench Division are appointed by the head of the King's Bench Division, by the Lord Chief Justice; in the Chancery Division by the Lord Chancellor; and in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division by the president of that division.

44,004. As regards qualifications, we have heard already the statutory qualification which is required for masters. Is there any qualification in the case of clerks?—No; no qualification by statute or by rule, unless you call the terms laid down by the Civil Service a qualification. I mean the limits of age and the passing of the examination and health and conduct, and so forth, all of which comes before the Civil Service Commission.

44,005. Details of that, perhaps, we had better get from the First Civil Service Commissioner, whom we shall have before us?—If you are going to have him, I think it would be as well that you should hear from him and not from me; but I am quite prepared to answer any questions.

44,006. Will you kindly tell us what the age limits are?—For the third class, which may be taken as almost universally the class to which the men are appointed nowadays (it used not to be so, but that is the case now—every man is appointed in the third class and has his chance of going up), the age limit is 20 to 30.

44,007. (Mr. Boutwood.) I see on this précis that you have given us "age limit for examination." Is there an examination?—Yes; for the Civil Service certificate.

44,008. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Only a pass examination?—Yes.

44,009. (Chairman.) After the nomination, have they to pass a qualifying examination?—Yes; a qualifying examination.

44,010. That examination is not of a high character, I think?—For the third class it is not at all of a high character, and very often is the only examination that the man ever passes; he is not subjected to an examination on promotion.

44,011. It is only if he is appointed direct to the first or second class that he has to pass an examination of a higher character?—He would have to pass it; but there have been very few—I do not recollect any appointment direct to the first class in my time.

44,012. Has there been any appointment to the first class in the last 20 years?—Certainly not.

44,013. Have there been any direct appointments to the second class?—One or two, but I think they are pretty ancient now.

44,014. In practice the appointments are almost entirely to the third class?—Yes, it has grown up to be so; it is not so under the regulations. Under the regulations the judge, whichever it is as president of the division, has the right to appoint to the vacancies as they occur; if it is a vacancy in the first class, he has the right to appoint to it; but it has grown up, I think probably, without much observation on the part of those concerned, to be the practice upon a vacancy occurring in the upper class for a man to be promoted from the lower class, although I think, if you looked strictly into the Orders under which the establishment is conducted, you would see that it ought to be an appointment to the first class. But you will see how curiously that might work. Say a vacancy occurs in the first class when it is the Lord Chancellor's turn, and he appoints to the first class a man by promotion out of the second class, that would create a vacancy in the second class, and then it would be the Lord Chief Justice's turn. But that is not the way it is done; it has gradually worked into this, that there is a flow of promotion from the third class up to the first upon a vacancy occurring in the first class; and the result is that there is a vacancy in the third class, and that is the vacancy to which the president, whose turn it is to appoint, appoints.

44,015. (Mr. Coward.) Do you consider that a satisfactory mode? You want in the first class people of great experience, which probably might not be readily obtained by merely going through the other classes. Would it not be advantageous to get, for a first class clerk, a person who has had a large practical experience?—I think, if I may say so, that that is a subject very well deserving the consideration of the Royal Commission, and I should like to be allowed to say something about it.

44,016. (Chairman.) We might deal with that point later when we come to the question of promotion?—According to my notes, it would be more convenient for me if it were allowed to stand over.

44,017. Does the appointed candidate in all cases pass the Civil Service examination?—He cannot get in without doing so.

44,018. Is he not excepted under Clause 7 in some cases?—Yes, we know all about that; we have discussed all that in the Commission before. There is that power of over-riding the general rules by means of Clause 7.

44,019. Is that applied in a large proportion of appointments?—I really do not recollect any case at this moment.

44,020. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Are the masters examined?—No.

44,021. Surely they must be appointed either under Clause 7 or under Section 4 of the Act of 1859?—They require no certificates; they are appointed by statute without certificate.

44,022. (Chairman.) The Commission already has before it a return from the Civil Service Commissioners, from which it would appear that in the last six years 10 of the third class clerks have been appointed under Clause 7, and 54 after examination. Would that be correct?—I think what that means is that there was an arrangement made (I do not know whether it could be actually described as a regulation) by the Civil Service Commission, that candidates who had been so many years, I think it is seven years, in a solicitor's office serving under a solicitor, might, if the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Civil Service Commission all agreed, be exempted from examination, on the ground that that service and practice gave them the best qualifications for a legal department; and that if these were men of over 25 years of age (because they laid down that limit) they probably would have passed away from the somewhat elementary subjects that compose that examination, and that if they had got what is regarded as a very desirable qualification in our clerks, it was vexatious and useless really to ask them to pass an examination of which I think you have got the terms before you. Then I think that brought in Clause 7.

44,023. So that in practice it would mean that the ten candidates who have been admitted under Clause 7 are those who have had experience in a solicitor's office?—Speaking without absolute recollection of the details of every case, I think you would find that in every case it meant he was a man who had been all his life in a solicitor's office and was over 25 years of age at the time of appointment.

44,024. Does that mean that the others, those who had to pass the qualifying examination, have not had experience in a solicitor's office?—It would probably mean that they had not had seven years' continuous experience in a solicitor's office, or that they were under 25 years of age. I should think it would very likely be found that the majority of those 54, I think you said, had all been in solicitors' offices, but that they were not over 25 years of age. When the Civil Service Commissioners and the other authorities decided to give that preference to men who had been in solicitors' offices, the Civil Service Commissioners said they did not think it ought to apply to men who were under 25. I do not know that I particularly sympathised with that myself at the time, if I may speak of my own opinion, but certainly I deferred to the judgment of the Civil Service Commissioners, and never raised any objection or question.

44,025. As regards the candidates who pass the examination, can you say what proportion of them have had any experience in a solicitor's office?—For a great many years there have been very few appointments made except of that class. They are on the whole, in my opinion, the best men, but I should myself be rather sorry to see it made an absolute qualification. There are some very good fellows amongst them undoubtedly, but those who would give up the profession and give up any hope of ever becoming partners in their solicitor's offices are not the very highest class of man, and I myself think that it is desirable to have a leaven in the departments if we can get them of a higher stamp of man, I mean a man of more education, the kind of man whom I think we all had in our minds as desirable for the Civil Service in the other deliberations of this Commission. I think a leaven of those men, even university men, though I hope you will not think I am enlarging too much just now—men who have taken their degrees and belong to the very best class of men in the country I venture to say. I suppose they have a little despaired of what they can do and how they can make any money (they are generally poor, of course), and they say they would like to go into the legal service. Then I tell them, "Well, under the organisation of our legal service it is a very poor look out for a man like you. I do not think you ought to go into it; your ambition ought to be something more than that." But still I see some of them that I must say I am very glad to see in the office. I think they are likely to be a good influence, if they do not get eventually too much disappointed with the poverty of the service. If, in spite of all the warning and discouragements that I give them, they will go in, I think it is a good thing to be able to get hold of them; and, if it was proper to go into particulars of individual men, I could point out some instances of how successful it has been. But there you come to one of the objections that I dare say Mr. Coward will enlarge upon presently as to the disadvantage that such men as that can never go beyond 600*l.* a year.

44,027. I should like to ask a question upon that point. Have the clerical staff in any cases access to the higher offices?—They have. In the Probate Registry one of the qualifications for a registrar—that is to say, what we call a master, for the 1,500*l.* appointment—is that he shall have been a first class clerk in that department. In the Chancery Registrar's Office that you mentioned just now, under the original constitution of that office, which was at the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign, it was an absolute and only qualification for a master, or registrar as he is called there, that he should have served as what was called a principal clerk in that office, and that statute is still on the statute book.

44,028. So that in practice the masters or registrars in that office are entirely appointed from the clerks?—There has never been in my time (that is over any time you need take into consideration) any man appointed master or registrar in the Chancery Registry Office except a man who has been a principal clerk in the office. There is an inconsistency in the different divisions. You have in the Central Office and in Chancery Chambers and the Taxing Office an absolute gulf fixed; but it is not so in the Chancery Registrar's Office.

44,029. Does that difference in practice and regulation correspond to any difference in the nature of the work?—There is a good deal of difference of opinion about that. My own opinion is that it does not.

44,030. Would your own opinion be in favour of opening an avenue of promotion in the other offices?—I would, certainly, with a very strict, what I think in the former deliberations of the Commission we called, efficiency bar.

44,031. (Mr. Boutwood.) Those men that you were speaking of just now, I suppose, were of a somewhat higher class than the men we had in mind in thinking of the senior clerical service?—Yes, I should say so.

44,032. (Mr. Holt.) Do I rightly understand that in one division a first class clerk can never become a master; in another division the masters are always drawn from them, and in the third division it is sometimes one and sometimes the other?—Yes, it is so.

44,033. (Chairman.) Will you now tell us what your practice is in dealing with applications for nomination in the Lord Chancellor's Office?—There is nothing under the statute to prevent the Lord Chancellor appointing straight off anybody, so far as the statute is concerned, always provided that he can pass the Civil Service Commissioners. Applications are addressed simply in the form of private letters to the Lord Chancellor, and arrive at his office, saying that the applicant wishes to be considered a candidate for a clerkship in the Supreme Court, and the practice now is that where on the face of it he is a man qualified for such an appointment, say, to take one thing, that he is not over 30 years of age, he is told that he may go and interview the senior master of the Central Office. The senior master has a form agreed upon between himself and myself (I am only acting, of course, for the Lord Chancellor), which gives some different heads on which he has to report as to the qualifications of this man, winding up with a general statement as to whether he thinks he is a fit man for an appointment in that office.

44,034. Do you require any testimonials or certificates for professional qualities?—The applications are nearly always accompanied by testimonials. A man who wrote without any testimonials at all or any references at all would either be disregarded, or, if he seemed to be at all a likely person, he would be invited to send them. There might be a case of a man who simply wrote and applied without sending any testimonials, and when he came before the senior master the senior master would ask him to produce testimonials, and get such information as he thought proper to enable him to make a report to the Lord Chancellor.

44,035. It is entirely open to anyone to apply if he is within the necessary limits of age?—Yes.

44,036. That in fact is the sole qualification that is necessary for application?—There are a great many applications coming from men for one reason or another who obviously would never pass any test—not the sort of men who would be admissible at all. Perhaps it might be useful to say that I think the fact that people can apply must be very well known, for two reasons: One is because there are an immense number of applications, and the other is that the Civil Service Commission send to us from time to time to ask for copies of the paper which gives information to candidates as to whom they should apply to, what are the qualifications, what the prospects are, and so forth. There are such a very large number of those applicants that the Civil Service Commissioners frequently send over to say that they want 100 more copies and so on, so that I think it seems to be pretty well known. At any rate, it supplies far more applicants than enough. One of the personal difficulties of dealing with the situation is the not at all agreeable task of having to tell so many people that there is practically no prospect of getting what, in some cases, it seems they very urgently require.

44,037. Is any publication or notice made with regard to impending vacancies?—Certainly none from the Lord Chancellor's Department. Whether the Civil Service Commissioners have anything of that kind I do not know.

44,038. Do you think it would be advisable that any such notice should be published?—I think as long as the operation is carried on under its present system I should hope it would not happen, because it would add to the number of applicants, though, as I said before, I think it is pretty well known, because we have so many already.

44,039. Is the number of applicants very large compared with the number of vacancies?—Yes, very large, hopelessly large.

44,040. Can you tell us anything with regard to the procedure of the other high officers who nominate?—No, I really know nothing about it.

44,041. That is the procedure as applied to the appointment of clerks?—Yes.

44,042. (Mr. Boutwood.) When is this examination held: do you have an examination for an individual man, or do you send up batches to be examined?—On such reasons as may be thought sufficient a man is told that, subject to his getting the Civil Service certificate, he is appointed, and the examination is such a slight one at present that I almost always know (I use the expression "I" because it is really the frank expression to use with regard to these matters) whether the man is going to pass or not. We generally want him at once, because, subject to anything that this Commission may think afterwards, I think our staff is pretty nearly at the minimum, and we nearly always want the man as soon as we can get him; and in nine cases out of ten I tell the senior master he may have him at once, and let him get his certificate as soon as the Civil Service Commissioners can examine him. I have known one or two cases, perhaps more, amongst those appointed by the Lord Chancellor where he has not passed the examination; but the Civil Service Commissioners, upon my asking them whether they think the man was all right, only he made a mess of one of his subjects, and whether he would pass another time, have examined him again, and he has passed; but there have been cases where they have not passed. There is a subject that is called Digesting Returns into Summaries. I do not know if the Commissioners know what that is, but a man who has been working away most excellently in a solicitor's office until he is 25 or 26, and then suddenly is asked, "Will you please digest a return into summaries," sometimes failed to do it. But the Commissioners, generally when I make inquiries of them, tell me they think that if he looks at the way this thing is done for about a week or a month, if he comes up again in a month he will pass.

44,043. (Miss Haldane.) Is it an entirely technical examination, or is it in general knowledge?—It really almost may be described as the three R's.

44,044. (Chairman.) It is practically similar to the examination for assistant clerks?—At this moment I had forgotten it.

44,045. (Bishop of Southwark.) This really follows from what you said just now. They cannot come in before the age of 20?—That is so.

44,046. For some of these appointments you have had university men before you?—I have.

44,047. And some are people who have had experience in solicitors' offices?—The great majority.

44,048. What happens to a man who does not belong to either of those classes between the time of leaving school?—We have a great many of those, and the sort of answer that is sent is, "Your name will be put down if you wish, but you do not appear to have had any experience in a legal office, and you probably have very little chance against the number of otherwise excellent candidates who have had that experience."

44,049. Are they people that come to you from businesses, or who are they; what have they been doing?—The men I think you are referring to are university men. They are up at college. I suppose the temptation of an immediate 100*l.* a year is more than they can resist.

44,050. The people who apply for these posts are either university men or people who have had legal experience?—I cannot say that. People of all sorts apply, but except those two classes I should say no others were ever favoured; they are discouraged. They are given a discouraging answer, and they are practically left out of account when the time comes for saying who is to be nominated. The time comes from time to time, you see, when you have to take on men for this work. The real truth is that there is not a pin to choose between a great quantity of men from the point of view of the person who has to select which it is to be; he might as well toss up or do anything like that. You may ask, "Would it be a good thing that they should compete amongst one another, and have in that sense 'open competition'?" I have not the least objection. I do not care which comes out top; I should not think any better or any worse of him probably, but should be quite content that he should be appointed.

44,051. (Chairman.) That brings us to the point whether there are any modifications that you think desirable in the present system of appointment?—That raises, I suppose, to begin with, the whole question of patronage, does it not?

44,052. Yes. Will you give us your views upon that?—I have a very great dislike of patronage in the ordinary sense of the word, the common sense of the word. I have had, on behalf of the Lord Chancellor, great experience of it, and a more thankless, more disagreeable thing, and a thing more trying to any man who has got anything worthy of being called a heart, it is hardly possible to conceive. Of course, there are a great many objections to it that we know of; I mean the sort of general idea that it is not fairly exercised. But I think that we threshed all that out, did we not, on the Commission before, and I signed the report, and the views that prevailed on that subject there I should not wish to depart from here. I cannot exactly, when speaking as a private individual, pledge myself to everything that I signed as one of the body for whom I had the most vast respect, when we had to sign our report; but I entirely adopt, and think ought to be adopted so far as they can be for the Supreme Court, the principles with regard to patronage and any control of it that there may be.

44,053. You mentioned the principles already adopted by the Commission. Shall I be right in saying that those are that where posts require merely general qualifications they should be, so far as possible, thrown open to open competition, and that where, owing to a necessity for professional or technical knowledge or special qualifications of some kind, nomination is to be preferred, that nomination should be exercised by a committee rather than by an individual, and that the Civil Service Commissioners should, as a rule, be represented on that committee?—I am not sure that that is quite an accurate description of our conclusion.

44,054. Will you correct it if it is inaccurate?—I thought that they were not to be appointed by the committee. I think the committee was to submit the names to the Minister.

44,055. Yes, I think that is the more correct description?—It was something more like that. I do not think they were to have the actual appointment. It was either that the Minister had in a sort of way to submit his proposed nomination to their judgment or for their advice, but I thought we guarded ourselves against taking away all responsibility from the Minister.

44,056. Perhaps that is the correct way to put it—that the nomination should be made on the advice of the committee?—Yes, I think that was it; but I am all in favour of something of that kind. I did not quite agree with the recommendation. I went the length very reluctantly of putting a dissenting note in the Commission's Report with regard to the particular recommendation that it was to be a Treasury Committee. I thought it ought to be a wholly independent committee.

44,057. (Mr. Boutwood.) You are speaking of a different committee, are you not?—Am I?

44,058. Your memorandum related to the Treasury section for general organisation—not for patronage?—I thought it was to control patronage.

44,059. (Chairman.) Applying those principles to the present case, do you consider that for the clerical appointments in general open competition would be suitable?—I cannot myself see that there would be a difficulty about it. I think that the question was discussed in the Commission in regard to Mr. Boutwood's department, where there were a certain number of clerks who had to have some sort of legal qualification. I do not see why you cannot have competition between the men who comply with a certain qualification.

44,060. For all the clerks who have had seven years in a solicitor's office to compete together?—Yes.

44,061. Would you think it necessary to make seven years in a solicitor's office an indispensable qualification?—Something of that sort. I think I have already said that I think it would be a pity to make it an indispensable qualification, because it would have cut out some very good men whom there has been an opportunity of bringing into the office.

44,062. Would a good man entering the office at, say, the age of 20, or even an earlier age, have any difficulty in learning the work of the office?—I think not. I think that you will probably have witnesses before you who differ upon that, but that is my opinion.

44,063. So that if that were so there would be no objection to admitting to competition, supposing competition was established, candidates who had not had a period of experience in a solicitor's office?—Yes, I think so, but it seems to me to complicate the method by which the open competition is to be carried on.

44,064. If it is thrown entirely open, would that not be the simplest method?—You must be very careful about your examination. I am not sure that that does not bring us back to what we talked so much about with regard to the Civil Service; whether you do not want to see your man and know something about your man. It is very difficult for a man who has been engaged, as I have in this business so long, not to think that there is some advantage in knowing who is being appointed into the office for which he is responsible.

44,065. Is there anything in the work as compared with the work of an ordinary Government office, say the Local Government Board, which makes the personal qualifications more important apart from intellectual and educational qualifications?—All the work has to do with the technicalities of the law, I mean that even if the man is doing very little more than copying, to be an intelligent copyist he must know something about the legal document; he will do it better if he knows what the legal document is, and has been accustomed to handle legal documents, and those are the only documents he has to deal with. They all have to deal with that class of documents; they do not merely write private letters and so on.

44,066. Can a knowledge of those documents be acquired in the office?—In my opinion certainly. I have no hesitation about it, but I shall be cross-examined upon that subject.

44,067. (Mr. Coward.) That is to say, that there would be great divergence of opinion about it?—Yes, I have said so already.

44,068. (Chairman.) But your opinion is decidedly that that knowledge can be acquired in the office?—Yes. My belief is, and if I may use the expression I have acted upon it for a good many years, that there is nothing required from a man going up to our 600*l.* a year, to our first class, which a man properly selected cannot learn and cannot do just as well as if he learned it in any other way, and I feel it as strongly as possible up to the 400*l.* I am sure that as regards many of the men we have had it is true of those of the 600*l.* class; but I am quite prepared to think that, subject to not shutting the door absolutely between 400*l.* and 600*l.*, it might be an advantage, I almost go further, I think I may say it would be an advantage to appoint some men to the first class from outside.

44,069. A certain number of them?—Yes. I think it would have two possible advantages, I am prepared at least to be convinced, say by Mr. Coward, that it would have advantages. You would bring some men into the office who have been a long time and have acquired a considerable position and respect in a high-class solicitor's office, which would be in a certain sense new blood into the office; and it would exercise a very good influence upon the question of whether your second class man was fit to be promoted to the first class. As our organisation at present stands there is the power to do that; we do not require any new regulation, we only require that the Lord Chancellor or other appointing authority should occasionally, on being satisfied that there was really no first class man in the second class, go and get a good man from outside. But, of course, with our system there is great danger there, and I personally have worked against it always, because with our system of appointment by patronage as it stands now, I do not think that it would be likely to work very well if, upon a first class vacancy, the appointing authority was to feel that he could appoint somebody straight to it.

44,070. That gives us your opinion on the question of patronage as applied to the lower appointments. Will you give us also your opinion on the same question as applied to the higher appointments, masterships?—Nobody surely would suggest open competition for a man of 45 to 55 who had been for years and years in practice at the Bar or in a solicitor's office. I think we settled long ago that open competition did not apply to that class of man.

44,071. At any rate you think it is clear that competition is out of the question for those higher posts?—Yes, I think so.

44,072. Does the present system of patronage work satisfactorily when applied to them?—I should have thought so. I have reason to think, I do not think I am unwise in mentioning it, that the present Lord Chancellor would be glad to see something in the nature of that kind of control that I thought our Commission meant the Treasury Committee to exercise, so that there was some other authority that had to be satisfied, some body that had to be given, say, an opportunity of reporting as to what they thought of the comparative excellence of the people who were under consideration.

44,073. Applying the principle already adopted by the Commission to that case would it not result in a Committee of Recommendation, who should make a recommendation to the Lord Chancellor or to the other high judicial authority whose turn it was to appoint?—I should like to put it a little short of recommendation; report upon the applications, or something like that.

44,074. In the case of masterships, are applications received?—Yes.

44,075. And a list is kept?—Yes.

44,076. And in practice is the appointment always made from the list of applicants, or does the appointing authority make a selection of his own motion outside the list?—I cannot speak for the Master of the Rolls, or the Lord Chief Justice, of course, but I can speak for the Lord Chancellor. He certainly does not consider himself limited to those who have written applying, but I do not think I recollect an instance of a man having been appointed to one of those offices who had not in fact applied. I do not think there is much importance in it, but I think that is so.

44,077. But if the Lord Chancellor thought that among the list of applicants there was no specially suitable person, he would certainly consider himself at liberty to appoint anybody else?—Yes, but then that is not, in fact, the case; there are any number of very excellent men. The real difficulty is to choose.

44,078. If a committee were appointed to report upon the qualifications of applicants, what composition would you suggest for that committee?—I think certainly it would be a good thing to have the Civil Service Commissioner, and I certainly think it would be desirable to have the Permanent Secretary. That we agreed, I think, before; it is not mere egotism my saying it. I think not to give what you may call the permanent head of the department a say as to the people with whom he has to work or over whom he has to exercise control is not reasonable—it is not business. But that is quite enough. I think there ought to be some one or two independent people, if you can get them.

44,079. (Mr. Holt.) Generally speaking, for your own department you adhere to what you prescribe as to other departments?—Yes, certainly; I do not say I agreed in every word we recommended; nobody does on a Royal Commission.

44,080. (Bishop of Southwark.) I suppose there is no necessity to give this committee that same sort of strength which we recommended with regard to Foreign Office appointments, where it was suggested that it was only upon the recommendation of the committee that the Foreign Secretary should give his nomination?—No, I should rather think it was not. I think it is quite sufficient control if you have the report of such a committee as that. If the Minister were to appoint somebody outside he certainly would have to account for it to the world at large.

44,081. (Mr. Holt.) May I read this to you? This is from Chapter VI. of the Majority Report that you signed, under the heading of "The Professional and Technical Civil Service": "We think that steps should be taken to set up a committee in each department which employs professional officers; and that the committee should consist of the permanent head of the department or some administrative officer of high rank deputed by him to act as his representative, together with an experienced officer of the professional section in which the vacancy occurs, and a representative of the Civil Service Commission, preferably a member of that Board. It should be the duty of such a committee, the members of which, while chosen on the principles suggested above, would vary to some extent with the nature of the vacancy to be filled, to select the two or three most suitable candidates, and to submit their names in order of merit, with the reasons for selecting each, to the Minister for his final selection and approval of one of them." Do you agree to that?—I am quite satisfied to have that. That is not exactly what I think best. That goes a little stronger, you see, than what I suggest; it limits, as the Bishop of Southwark said, his choice entirely both, as I understand it, to the people selected by that Board in the first instance for consideration, and also to those whom they finally select to send up to him

44,082. No; previously to that it is proposed that there should be advertisement, and that everybody who chose to answer the advertisement should be considered by the committee as a preliminary stage?—I have no objection to that, but I do not feel as if anything like the last word has been said upon that subject here, because I do not feel sure that the professions would think that that fitted into our organisation. I am not sure whether it would work or not; but I should be quite satisfied with it.

44,083. Even if it applied to you?—Yes.

44,084. (Chairman.) As regards the officers with whom the ultimate power of nomination rests, the Lord Chancellor and the other high judicial authorities, do you consider that the ultimate power of nomination should rest with them, or do you think any modification in that respect desirable?—I have always thought for years and years that nobody should have the power of appointment to offices which are paid out of public funds—though it is not technically correct, I think, to say that our officers are paid out of public funds, because they are paid really out of the fees, you know; but they are substantially the same.

44,085. Their salaries are voted by Parliament?—Yes, they are. I have always thought that nobody ought to have the power of appointment who is not responsible to Parliament. The judges, of all people in the world, are those who are not responsible to Parliament, because it is contrary, I believe, to the Rules of the House of Commons that you should even discuss what a judge does. I have always thought that, and I think that my opinion on that subject was expressed as long ago as 1885 in the report of the Chancery Committee, but I am not sure; I have not read it for years.

44,086. So that the practical effect, if that principle were adopted, would be to remove the patronage of the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls from them, and to place the ultimate nomination for all these offices in the hands of the Lord Chancellor?—The Lord Chancellor's patronage is already so enormous, so almost intolerably burdensome, that I feel very strongly the objection to that, besides the objection to increasing patronage in the hands of anybody; but that some way ought to be found, say, by means of the committee we have been discussing, which can practically control it—not controlling it in the hands of these judges, but controlling it in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who is a Minister, as ultimately responsible—if you by some means of that sort can arrive at it, I think it ought to be done. That is my own opinion.

44,087. Would it be possible that those judges should have some representation on the committee of selection?—Yes, it did not occur to me, but I think, if I may say so respectfully, that is a very good suggestion.

44,088. If it were found necessary to introduce open competition for the clerical appointments, that would relieve a good deal of the detail of the burden at all events?—Yes.

44,089. Have you any other suggestions to make with regard to modifications of the system?—I do not know whether you intend to go at some point, and whether this is the point, into the question of men being able to pass from the first class into these greater positions.

44,090. We will deal with that when we come to the question of promotion?—If you please.

44,091. The only other point that arises, I think, on this question of nomination is whether, assuming the system remained such as it is now, it is desirable to alter the standard of the qualifying examination for clerks. What is your opinion on that point?—I think the examination ought certainly to be altered, and I had arrived (I say "I" because it has never been put before the Lord Chancellor) at a practical agreement with the senior master of the Central Office and with the Civil Service Commissioner for an alteration, a great improvement, I think, in the examination, and I think it would have been carried out before now except that I thought it a little inconvenient that an important change of that kind should be made before the matter had been under consideration here. Of course the Commission sat much longer than any of us hoped, and so the thing has stood over for I do not know how long, eighteen months or something of that sort; but I do think there ought to be an alteration, and I have got the alteration all ready if the Commission cared to see what stage we had arrived at on the subject.

44,092. Perhaps you will put in a statement as regards that?—Yes. My general objection to the existing examination is that I think it is a very poor affair, not worth much.

44,093. Very elementary?—Too elementary.

44,094. Were your alterations in the direction of making it a more stringent examination in subjects of general education or of introducing technical subjects?—I would make it more technical, really.

44,095. Do you propose also to raise the general educational standard?—I think my notion was that we should do it merely through a request to the Civil Service Commissioners to be a little more severe.

44,096. (Chairman.) We now come to the question of promotion. What is the system of promotion?—I think I explained that one peculiarity of the position was that the person having the right of appointment, strictly according to the Act of Parliament, could appoint at once, if he thought fit, to the actual vacancy that occurred; he might appoint direct, for instance, to the first class if the vacancy took place there. But the practice has become almost universal—and I do not think is the least likely to be altered, unless alterations are made here—that there is promotion from the third class to the second, and from the second to the first. The promotions are now being made upon a report of the Committee of the Masters to the Lord Chancellor, and he promotes from the one class to the other, so the ultimate vacancy is consequently always in the third class.

44,097. Does that apply to the other offices as well as the Central Office?—That applies everywhere. I cannot speak positively about the Probate Registry, but I believe that is the case there.

44,098. It applies to the Chancery Offices?—Yes; it applies to the Chancery Offices. That is the practice; there is no regulation in the matter.

44,099. Then in each office is there a committee which attends to this matter of promotion?—There is in what is called the Chancery Chambers, though it is quite a modern institution; but ever since 1887 it has existed in the Central Office.

44,100. In the Central Office is the committee composed of masters?—It consists of three masters. It is called the Committee of Control. The Committee of 1887, whose Report I put in, made a recommendation that there should be a committee appointed of three masters, to be called a Committee of Control; that they should report to the Lord Chancellor every year as to the general conduct of the office; and that they should make recommendations as to promotions when vacancies occurred, and that practice has been followed ever since.

44,101. (Mr. Coward.) That would be promotion from one of the lower grades?—Yes; from one class to another.

44,102. Not from outside?—No; strictly promotion.

44,103. (Chairman.) And in recommending promotions do they proceed by merit or by seniority?—The theory is that it is by merit; the practice is to take the men in order of seniority and consider whether they are absolutely fit for promotion. The first man that you come to going down the list would, in the ordinary course, be the man.

44,104. As a matter of practice, are men ever passed over?—I think seldom: though in the Chancery Division I think there have been a good many cases of men being passed over. I think that has been largely due to a very strong feeling of my own upon the subject that promotions ought to be watched with very great vigilance in hopes of carrying out a true system of promotion by merit. You do find in the different classes at times men who are certainly not worth more than the maximum salary of the class in which they then are. It is with reference to that I think it is quite possible—and I think I have already mentioned it—that at any rate as regards the highest class it might be desirable to keep it open to appoint men from outside.

44,105. Why has it arisen that the principle of selection has been applied more extensively to the Chancery offices than to the Central Office?—I think the real reason is that no committee of that kind was appointed in the Chancery Division until comparatively recently, and therefore whenever there was a vacancy and a question of promotion it came up for the Lord Chancellor to say who was to be appointed. There had never been any recommendation with regard to the Chancery side for the appointment of such a committee; that committee arose entirely out of an inquiry that was directed into the Central Office itself, and then the Chancery side is, more immediately than the other departments, under the Lord Chancellor himself who is president of the division, and I think in that way it was more or less natural that the thing should be dealt with directly from the office.

44,106. So that the tendency of the committee is to proceed by seniority rather than by selection?—I think they have a greater tendency that way than the tendency that was exhibited before.

44,107. In the Probate Registry does the Lord Chancellor make the promotions?—No, he has nothing to do with them.

44,108. Is it the President of the Probate Division?—It is entirely done by the President of the Probate Division, and, I believe, but you had better get it from the senior registrar of the Probate Registry, that there promotion by seniority is almost entirely the rule.

44,109. Do you think the system works satisfactorily?—As far as I know it does. I can imagine there being an unwillingness to tell me personally much about the defects of a system which I was supposed to be working myself, and I can quite imagine that there may have been complaints; it is almost impossible to suppose that there should not be complaints. I have known personally of one or two complaints, but they were certainly more of a personal character than directed against the system, and I do not think that when investigated there was found to be any ground for them at all.

44,110. Were those complaints from men who had been passed over?—Yes, men who had been passed over. It is impossible to suppose that the man passed over will take quite the same view as, at any rate, the man who is successful.

44,111. As bearing on the question of promotion, is there a substantial difference between the work of the different classes of clerks—the first, second, and third class?—I think distinctly, yes. The work is arranged according to the classes. I think the difference of class very fairly represents a difference of work. There are cases out of which, no doubt, difficulty arises from time to time. You may get in the same office a clever young man and an indolent older man, and the younger man begins gradually to do the work and the older man is not sorry for it, and things get into an awkward state. A question arises as to promotion, and the younger man is objected to, perhaps, on the ground of his comparatively short service, and he tells you “I have really been doing all the work of the first class the last three years.” That is the sort of statement made. I do not say that that often happens, but it does happen.

44,112. Is it a difference in the actual work done or a difference in the degree of difficulty of work of the same nature?—I think generally a difference in work. They classify the work appropriate to the different classes, but perhaps you would get that better in detail from a senior master. Whenever questions regarding it have come before me, I have always tried to get the thing into that proper scientific position, and not to let the situation arise, which I was referring to before, of their giving the better work to the man whom they discover to be clever regardless of his position and salary.

44,113. Is there any possibility of promotion from one department to another, or does the promotion run entirely in the particular departments?—Practically it runs in the departments. There are occasionally transfers; I do not think they are much favoured, but they do take place, and there is ample power for them to take place. There is no technical difficulty in the way at all, and no difficulty arising on account of salaries, because we have uniform salaries everywhere.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,114. Would it be desirable to have a greater degree of interchangeability between the different departments?—On the whole, I think it would be desirable. Within the Central Office, which is divided, as you know, into several departments, there is a great deal of interchangeability now, and the amount of it has been greatly increased in recent years, and I have not the least doubt it is a very good thing.

44,115. As regards the individual it keeps him much less narrow than if he is engaged all his life in a particular branch?—Quite so.

44,116. Do you consider, as regards the general efficiency of the staff, that it adds to their intellectual calibre if they are moved about from one work to another?—I think so, and it makes a man more likely to be a useful man when he is promoted, and more likely to make it easy for him to be promoted when the occasion arises; the difficulty will not then come up that he has never before heard anything about the work of that department in which a vacancy has occurred.

44,117. You are now speaking, I understand, of the various sub-divisions of the Central Office?—Yes.

44,118. Would that same consideration also apply to interchangeability as between the other offices; for instance, between the Central Office and the Taxing Office?—No, I do not think there is very much to be gained by it except the facility of promoting a good man, who ought to be promoted if possible—where there is no opportunity for promotion on his own side and in the next office there is an opportunity for him.

44,119. Is there much inequality in the rate of promotion in the different offices?—Yes, a good deal.

44,120. I observe that there is a considerable difference in the proportions between the higher and lower classes?—A very great difference.

44,121. I suppose that would produce a considerable difference in the rate of promotion?—No doubt.

44,122. That could be, to some extent, equalised by a greater degree of interchangeability?—I think so. You will probably find when you come to examine the masters, or, say, Mr. Stringer, more importance is attached to technical difficulties with regard to that.

44,123. There is a question which has been already touched upon, but which arises specially on this subject of promotion—the question of access to the highest posts for the general body of clerks. Will you give us your opinion on that?—It is a very difficult question, but I think it is a great pity that the clerks should not be given that access, and I think it should be facilitated by having, possibly, an intermediate grade somewhere between the 600*l.* and the 1,500*l.*—I do not know whether they would be called assistant masters, but there should be established a kind of bridge or an island midway between those two continents.

44,124. (Mr. Coward.) With the object that they might pass over the bridge and get to the upper class?—Yes. I have known one or two cases of very good men who came in for some reason of their own who always appeared to be men worth more than 600*l.* a year, who proved themselves very good in the office, and might well, I think, have been allowed to go to a higher post if you can devise one for them. If you think that it is absolutely impossible for any man to do the work of a master or registrar unless he is given 1,500*l.* a year, of course that creates a great difficulty.

44,125. (Chairman.) I see in the Principal Probate Registry there is a class intermediate between the first-class clerks and registrars—the principal clerks of seats?—Yes, they are called principal clerks.

44,126. There are six of them rising to a salary of 800*l.* a year?—Yes, they have that intermediate class.

44,127. (Mr. Boutwood.) Then in the Central Office you have assistant masters?—Yes.

44,128. And they seem to come under the statutory requirements as to practice?—Yes.

44,129. (Chairman.) The assistant masters are appointed in the same way as masters—not by promotion from the staff?—Yes.

44,130. Has it ever been proposed to Parliament to alter that statutory requirement?—I do not think a clause for that purpose has ever actually been in the House. I thought one had been, but I cannot find the Bill. I have, however, found a draft Bill which collected and consolidated the various qualifications both for masters and for clerks, so that it started by saying “No person may be appointed a master or registrar unless he has,” and then it gave the qualifications which are required in each of the divisions, all put together. In that way you would bring into each division all the qualifications, and a man would be able under that clause to pass from the clerk's grade up to the master's grade of the Chancery Division, which he cannot do now, because he would be able to do it anywhere in the Supreme Court. I was responsible for drawing up the clause years ago. I never saw it again until yesterday. I thought it had been brought in in a Bill, but I cannot find that it was. I think it is perfectly practicable. It was consented to by the Lord Chancellor and Treasury of the day, and I shall be very glad to exhibit this if you think it worth while to look at it.

44,131. (Mr. Coward.) You would probably attract a better class of man for the lower grades if they had a chance of being raised to the upper one?—I think so, and if you had a very very strong efficiency bar, so that a man should only be promoted out of the clerk class if he really was a man whom all those responsible for the matter considered was entirely fit for whatever is the next stage.

44,132. In other words, that you could not get a better man for the post either outside or inside?—Yes, practically.

44,133. Because what you want is the best man for the post?—Yes, you do.

44,134. (Bishop of Southwark.) The efficiency bar would work very differently in the legal system from the rest of the Civil Service. We insisted in our previous Report upon the importance of making these promotions at an early stage in the clerk's career, during the period when he would be developing his powers and showed promise of real capacity. I take it that the opportunity offered to a clerk in our legal system is different?—But it would have to work differently, because I do not think any man, certainly under 40 years of age, would be fit to exercise the kind of functions that a master had to perform. He is a judicial kind of person, and if he were ever so clever he would not be satisfactory to those who come before him if his beard is not yet grown.

44,135. (Chairman.) Legislation you think would be necessary for the change?—Yes, there is no doubt it would be necessary.

44,136. Then as regards the organisation of the offices, have you any suggestions to make as to improvements in the existing organisation?—Is it not organisation we have been speaking of.

44,137. The question of the higher offices is no doubt a question of organisation, but we would like your opinion on the subject of amalgamation between different offices?—I have always been a very strong advocate of a thing which has been much discussed in legal circles, and that is the amalgamation of the Chancery Offices. It was recommended, I think, in 1885. At the request of the committee which considered the question I wrote a memorandum* on the subject which I should like to put in.

44,138. We should like to see it?—A committee on the Chancery Registrars Office was appointed some years ago. There was some question whether I should sit on the committee, and I said I thought it would be better that I should remain outside, but I would give them a memorandum of what my opinion was. I read it over the other day, and I am still of the same opinion. It is not very different from what they eventually recommended, but it states, in a way in which I should like to state it over again, what my own opinion is on the question of the amalgamation of those offices and what might be done with them when amalgamated, because the question has often been raised as to whether in those departments the number of the greater officers should be as large as it is as compared with the number of the lesser officers.

44,139. The number of the greater officers is especially marked in the Registrars' Office, is it not?—And in Chancery Chambers. There are 12 masters.

44,140. In Chancery Chambers the number of first class clerks appears to be considerably larger than the second class, and the number of second class clerks appears to be about the same as the number of third class?—Yes.

44,141. In the Registrars Office there appear to be 9 registrars, including the senior registrar, 6 clerks to registrars, 4 second class clerks, and 9 third class clerks. So in both those offices the proportion of higher posts is greater than in the Central Office or the Probate Registry?—Yes, if you enter into the question, you will probably find it a very difficult one, because of the nature of the business done in those offices. So much of it is work either preparatory for or consequent upon the hearing before the judge himself. I think it very likely will be represented before this Commission that that work can only be satisfactorily done by an officer of that very high class, and that what remains to be done is neither so very much in quantity or quality as to need the large number of subordinate people whom you generally find in a department. I think there is a great deal to be said for that, but I think it is carried to an extreme point just now, and that those offices are capable of a good deal of modification. I think I have stated in more particularity how that might be done in the memorandum that I alluded to, and if it were put in and consequently published then other witnesses coming before you would have an opportunity of seeing it and treating it as they, no doubt, would think it deserved.

44,142. Then you suggest that besides some readjustment of the proportions of the higher and lower classes, those two offices, the Chancery Chambers and the Chancery Registrars, might be amalgamated?—Yes, that is another thing; but I think the class of work they do might very well be amalgamated. Mr. Coward may be surprised at my speaking so confidently upon these subjects, but I can quote to him very high authority for my views.

44,143. (Mr. Coward.) I am not myself quite competent to criticise, because I do not think I know so much about these inferior branches of the work?—When you have evidence from the Law Society they will take quite a different point I imagine. They will differ from me and will probably say I know nothing about it. My knowledge is not entirely my own, but I have very high authority for my views.

44,144. (Chairman.) Then will you put in the memorandum to which you have referred?—I think it might be useful for those who wish to go into details.

44,145. Are there any other directions in which you would suggest consolidation of offices?—There is a very old question which may arise here, or later on, about the District Probate Registries. Attempts have often and often been made to amalgamate them with the other district registries of the High Court that were referred to a short time ago, but at present they remain as a separate set of offices. I think you have a list of the District Probate Registries in the estimates.

44,146. In principle you would be in favour of that amalgamation?—Yes, very much. I have done my utmost to get it.

44,147. Of what nature are the difficulties which have prevented it from taking place?—I think the real difficulty in the way is the difficulty of patronage. The District Probate Registries are in the patronage of the President of the Probate Division. I think if they were amalgamated with the District Registries, under the existing system the registrar would be appointed by the County Court Judge, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor. I think he ought to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who I certainly think would call in the County Court Judge to assist him, because he knows something about the local people. I think it ought to be put the other way, for the reasons already stated about patronage generally—that patronage ought not to remain with a person who is not subject to Parliamentary control.

44,148. Speaking generally, is there a Supreme Court Registry at every place where there is a Probate Registry?—No, they are not at all the same places, but I think at most.

44,149. Has the origin of Probate Registries been partly ecclesiastical?—Yes.

44,150. Does that account for the fact that there are Probate Registries in some comparatively unimportant places?—Yes, because District Registries were not constituted until 1875, and some of the ecclesiastical centres are no longer great legal centres.

44,151. Would it be desirable to readjust the list of probate registries to correspond to the present importance of the places?—I should think it would. There have been one or two instances, but it is a subject on which the President of the Probate Division would really be the best authority.

44,152. Would local sentiment come in largely in a matter of that kind in favour of maintaining probate registries where they exist at present?—I doubt if there would be anything that could properly be called local feeling, only so far as there would be a feeling that local people should be appointed to clerkships in them, and so on.

44,153. (Mr. Coward.) Do you think it would be something like the readjustment of circuits, and should we have great local criticism?—No, I do not think so. It is not sufficiently important for that. I do not believe there would be much difficulty, or that it would arise in many cases.

44,154. (Chairman.) As regards the Taxing Office, how far does that office deal with taxing for the whole of the Supreme Court?—Each department used to have its own taxing office until recent years; that is to say, a case which was brought in a particular division of the High Court went through all its stages from beginning to end in that separate division of the Court. There was some years ago a great deal of discussion which arose because of the different number of cases that were brought in the Chancery Division and in the King's Bench—the one division was crowded and the other was not. One of the remedies proposed for this difference, or one of the explanations rather that were given of it, was that the practice as to taxation differed in the two divisions—that a better scale of costs was given in one division than in the other. I think it was Lord Justice Bowen (Lord Bowen as he afterwards was) who was the person who mainly insisted upon it that that difficulty would never be got rid of unless you had one Taxing Office for all the divisions, and then there could be only one practice in that respect, and a practitioner would not find that he made more money by having the case brought in one division than by having it brought in the other. There was then a committee appointed to consider this, and to recommend how it should be carried out. I have the report of the committee here amongst the documents already mentioned, which I suggest putting in. It was a committee presided over by the late Lord Chief Justice (Lord Alverstone), and they recommended that there should be one Taxing Office for the whole of the Supreme Court for all departments, including the Lunacy Department. That was immediately carried out with regard to the matter which was the origin of it all, and which was of real practical importance, that is to say, the King's Bench Division and the Chancery Division have one common Taxing Office now, where all their taxations are carried out. But there were various things that stood in the way of carrying it further. One was that it was really of very little importance as to the rest. Another was that there were personal difficulties; the taxing master of one department did not wish to be carried over and consolidated with the others, and said he did his business very well and that he had been appointed to this particular office and not to another—things of that sort, and that kind of personal difficulty, which we know always arises when you are trying to make re-organisations, stood in the way. In one or two cases also economy has stood in the way; it was said that the work was being done more economically under the system as it stood than it would be if the office was carried over. There were various reasons, all of them of sufficient importance, it was thought, to make it unnecessary to carry out the amalgamation, until all existing interests had disappeared at any rate. That is how the matter stands now.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,155. That separate system applies to the Probate Division and the Bankruptcy and the Lunacy Departments?—Yes, they all have their separate taxing offices still.

44,156. Do you think the time has now come when unification could be carried out as regards those offices?—I do not see why it should not be carried out, but I do not think it is of large importance whether it is or not, practically. The great object to bring the taxing offices of the King's Bench and Chancery Divisions together was attained.

44,157. Will you now deal with the rules as regards discipline, leave, hours of attendance, retirement, and so forth—matters which in the Civil Service generally are regulated by Orders in Council?—Our regulations upon those subjects, which are not laid down anywhere at present, are very much the same as those in the Civil Service; but they are not absolutely the same, and doubt has been raised as to whether technically the Civil Service regulations could be applied to the Supreme Court. Bills have been introduced once or twice to say that these regulations may be applied to the Supreme Court, but they have not got through. They are instances of what I mentioned at the beginning of the day—the disadvantage of having no one to look after such Bills in the House of Commons.

44,158. What is the actual legal position at present as regards the application of Civil Service Orders in Council to the legal departments?—It is a difficult question. I have had instructions in the course of my time to argue it both ways, and did so entirely to my own satisfaction. But the opinion prevailing was that the Orders in Council did not apply to the legal offices, and consequently a Bill was introduced in three successive Sessions proposing to make them apply, or at any rate to authorise the legal authorities to apply them if they thought fit.

44,159. The "legal authorities" meaning the Lord Chancellor?—It would mean the concurrence of all the presidents of divisions, because each of them is master of his own department, and in order to carry them out equally they would all have to concur in making the Orders. There was a draft Order drawn up at one time applying the Civil Service regulations, as far as they could be made to fit, to our organisation. I could put in that draft Order. It would have been passed if the Bill had been passed, no doubt. The legal authorities all agreed upon it. They were quite willing to have it. There was no difficulty about it.

44,160. Will you kindly put in that draft?—Yes.* There is one great question with reference to it which makes a difference in the legal service, and that is the question of the Long Vacation in the autumn. If the Courts are not sitting to carry on business, there is, of course, much less for the officials to do, and consequently the leave is much larger to some classes of people than it is in the ordinary Civil Service. You could not lay down a regulation with reference to an officer who had been appointed with what he would consider a vested right to his Long Vacation, to say he was to have only 36 days' vacation in the year, or whatever it is in the Civil Service. That creates a difficulty with regard to the matter.

44,161. What is the duration of the Long Vacation?—It is now from 1st August to 12th October, and there are officers who are away all that time.

44,162. Are the offices of the Supreme Court closed during the Long Vacation?—No; there has to be a sufficient number of the offices open to do any business that comes in in the Long Vacation.

44,163. Do the masters sit in the Long Vacation?—A sufficient number of masters sit to do any business that comes in; that is the idea.

44,164. Does a certain amount of business go on before the masters during the Long Vacation?—Yes; a considerable amount.

44,165. (Mr. Coward.) What they call "Vacation business"?—Yes. The definition of "Vacation business" has lately been considerably extended under the recommendations of a Royal Commission, as you know.

44,166. (Chairman.) And the work of the Taxing Office, for instance, goes on, but not so much of it?—I think one taxing master sits.

44,167. Is there a difference in the office hours during the Long Vacation?—Yes; I think they are from 11 to 2, or something of that sort, instead of 10 to 4.

44,168. What is the length of the other vacations?—The Christmas vacation is from 21st December to 11th January—three weeks. Then there is a short vacation—only 10 days—at Easter, and 10 days at Whitsuntide. It is a very long time, no doubt, altogether.

44,169. Do these shorter vacations substantially affect the work of the offices? Is the work still done during the shorter vacations?—I do not think it makes very much difference, really.

44,170. Is the practical effect that the greater part of the leave for clerks is given during the Long Vacation?—I think so. Perhaps you will ask the senior master for accurate details of that sort. I should think you would get it more directly from him.

44,171. Then may we take it that the draft Order which you are putting in represents your views as to what the regulations should be to apply to the offices?—It certainly represented my view as approved by the Lord Chancellor at the time that was drawn up. It is a long time ago now. I have read it over rapidly just before coming here, and it looks to me all right still.

44,172. Did that represent any substantial change of the present practice?—Not really very much.

44,173. There is one important point as regards the application of the Civil Service rules on which we should like to have your opinion, and that is on the question of a fixed age for retirement. What is the position at present?—There is no age for retirement. It has often been recommended, but it has never been carried out, and there is considerable doubt as to whether it could be laid down in such regulations as I have been speaking of without some statutory authority to make regulations for the Supreme Court as to, amongst other things, the age for retirement. There is a great difference of opinion as to the power. My private opinion is that there is power to do it, but very high authority has thought otherwise.

44,174. Assuming that there is power, would the exercise of that power involve any compensation to vested interests?—If you forthwith retired anybody who was over 65, which is the age in the Civil Service, that man, having got an appointment for life, I think, would certainly be entitled to compensation.

44,175. What is the present tenure, taking the masters first?—I think the masters undoubtedly have a tenure for life. I think it is "good behaviour," whatever that means.

44,176. And as regards the clerical staff in general, what is the position?—The clerical staff probably really have no tenure at all.

44,177. They hold during pleasure?—I think it is really during pleasure, but that is a tenure disadvantageous for authority really. During pleasure in cases of that kind comes to mean practically for life. It means that you have to say to a man that he has to go because you think he can no longer do his work, and that, of course, makes it very much more difficult for the authority than a state of things such as there is now in the Civil Service, where it is said that everybody shall go at a certain age.

44,178. As regards the clerical staff, apart from masters, is it held by any authority that legislation would be required before you could apply any retirement limit?—I do not think so.

44,179. In that case there is no doubt it could be applied?—I do not think there could be any doubt about it.

44,180. Would there be any question of compensation there?—I do not believe there would be.

44,181. May it be considered that they have been appointed at present on the understanding that they will be subject to an age limit if it be imposed?—No I do not think so. It is a difficult question about which of course very great differences of opinion might be held as to the position of a man who was appointed to an office where he might reasonably suppose, according to the work of the department, that he would stay, if he was fit for work, until he was 75; whether, whatever was the exact technical position, it was fair to him, he being perfectly fit, to make him go at 65, and whether he ought not to be given something.

44,182. What is the practice at present? Do many of the clerks remain until much beyond 65 years of age?—Yes.

44,183. If a clerk becomes inefficient for the purposes of his duties through age, what steps are taken?—It is a very difficult position indeed. He can only be removed if there is evidence satisfactory to the Lord Chancellor that he is unfit for his duties and ought to be removed. Of course the Lord Chancellor does not know of his own personal knowledge and observation, and he must rely upon the report that is made to him. It is very difficult to get a report upon which you can act with regard to that subject. From humane reasons, from reasons of ordinary human disposition, people are very unwilling to say that their good and faithful old servant is to be sent away and to have a much reduced income.

44,184. (Mr. Coward.) As a practical matter it is never done, is it?—Hardly ever.

44,185. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Is there anybody over 95 in the office?—Not that I am aware of—in fact I am quite sure that there is not.

44,186. (Chairman.) What is your own opinion as regards the application of a limit of age for retirement?—As to whether there ought to be an age for retirement, I would again refer to the decisions of this Commission with regard to the Civil Service. There are general considerations upon that subject which have led the Civil Service Commission to lay down an age for retirement, and I think that we approve of it on this Royal Commission.

44,187. Do you consider that there is anything in the nature of the legal offices which should put them outside the application of those recommendations?—I cannot conceive that there is. I am not now saying that if it had not been settled with regard to the Civil Service I should say that I thought it was the ideal thing. There is a great deal to be said on both sides about an age limit; but, this Commission having settled that it was the right thing on the whole for the public service, I do not know why it should not apply to the legal service.

44,188. In saying that are you speaking of the masters as well as the clerical staff?—Certainly. I think you will find that in the Chancery Report of 1885 it was definitely recommended, and I think it is recommended for the Central Office too. The most able man we then had in the office, Mr. Jenkins, who was a master, became 70 shortly after the Report of the Committee, and in order to show how strongly he felt that it ought to be carried out, he retired, leaving various septuagenarians still seated.

44,189. In the case of masters would you say the limit should be 70 or 65?—My own feeling is in favour of 70. Taking them as a class, the men who arrive at that position in the legal profession, I think, are generally pretty tough men; they are generally very good physically at the age of 70; and I do not think there is any doubt that for judicial work, if a man retains all his faculties and his strength, the older he is the better he is. So that I think I should be rather sorry to see the age of the masters curtailed to 65; but still I dare say the same thing would be said about the chief Civil servants. I certainly have seen several Civil servants leave departments at the age of 65 when they have got their best work in the next five years.

44,190. (Mr. Coward.) The Judicature Commission recommended 72 years as the age?—That was only for judges, I think. My remarks, if there is anything in them, about tough men and the advantage of age apply even more to a judge than to a master.

44,191. (Chairman.) As regards pension, what is the position?—In the Act of 1879 you will see there is a section which says that for the purposes of pay and pension the officers of the Supreme Court shall be deemed to be Civil servants of the State.

44,192. So by that clause the ordinary Pension Act of the Civil Service is applied to them?—Yes, and the recent alterations apply to them. It is no longer 60ths, but 80ths.

44,193. Have they added years for the purpose of pension in the case of masters?—They have a clause of their own, and I have not fully considered what is the effect of our recommendations upon that subject. I think this Commission has recommended the getting rid of that clause in the Act of 1859, and that the added years should disappear; but I doubt whether that makes the clause disappear from our Act. I think the power to add years remains. I cannot help thinking that the desirableness of adding years is very much greater in the legal service than it is in the Civil Service. In the Civil Service your man begins much earlier than he does with us. A man is very seldom made a master before 50, and if he has to retire at 65 he will have only 15/80ths of his salary for his pension, which is too small.

44,194. Would you be in favour of retaining the system of adding years for the higher posts, the appointment to which are always made from professional men at a somewhat advanced age?—Yes, but I do not carry in my mind at the moment what we did recommend in this Commission's Report about that, and it may be that our recommendations would cover the case of such people.

44,195. Was not the recommendation to the effect that the probable short tenure should be recognised by adjustment of salary rather than by the granting of additional years for pension?—I do not know how the Treasury look at that. I signed, but I am not sure I should entirely agree with what was recommended about that, and I have great doubts as to what the Treasury may do. It looks to me as if it would be very difficult, with our masters, to adjust it that way.

44,196. Besides the masters, have any other officers of the legal departments any added years?—I do not think so.

44,197. Will you give us your views about the hours of attendance?—There is in the legal offices generally a rule of 10 to 4, and that, of course, is a shorter time than the hours for the Civil Service; and, assuming that those recommendations of the Commission which can properly be applied ought to be applied to the legal departments, the natural result would be 10 to 5 at least. The question is, why not? I believe the reason against it is that the professions that use the Law Courts do not come to the Courts after 4 o'clock, and if the officers generally at the Law Courts were to remain there after 4 o'clock, they would remain there with nothing to do.

44,198. Is there any work to be done after the professions have ceased coming, such as making records and filing, and so forth?—I have never heard a satisfactory answer to that very natural question. I should have thought that with a proper adjustment of work it could be so arranged, and, therefore, when the question is put whether there is any reason why the same rule should not apply there as elsewhere, I say that I think there is no reason.

44,199. (Mr. Coward.) There is no solicitor's office in London, I should think, where the office hours are not at least from 10 to 6, and probably a great deal later?—That is perfectly evident; but I mean that you come to the Courts till 4 o'clock, but at five minutes past four you have an appointment at your office.

44,200. I was intending to agree with you. It seems to me that the hours are ridiculously short?—But you do not personally want the legal departments open after four; you want to be at your office. If you ask the Law Society when they are here whether they wish the offices at the Royal Courts of Justice to remain open after four, I think they will tell you they do not care as long as you do not have any proceedings going on that oblige them to go there, because they would say: "We have as much work as we can do for a couple of hours and more at our offices after the Courts rise. It would be very inconvenient to us if you carried on any business there which obliged our attendance." So that raises a consideration as to which I dare say you will satisfy yourselves when you have the senior master and others before you.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,201. (Chairman.) Are there any other points that occur to you to mention to the Commission on the question of the rules and regulations?—No; I do not think I have anything else to suggest.

44,202. Then we will turn to the County Courts. Will you give us a very general idea of the work of the County Courts?—The amount of work of the County Courts is very large indeed and very various; but if you want an easy way of knowing what the County Courts are like, you should look in the Law List. There is a list of County Courts there and their arrangements which is very clear, and interesting too.

44,203. Is the arrangement that there are circuits, each of which has a judge?—Yes.

44,204. And in each circuit there are a certain number of courts which the judge attends in rotation?—Yes.

44,205. And to each court is attached a registrar with the necessary amount of clerical assistance?—Yes. There are, I think, 55 County Court judges now, and each judge has so many courts. I am not sure if there is any judge outside London who has absolutely only one court, except at Manchester.

44,206. There appear to be 59 circuits?—They are not all in existence, I think you will find. There are 55 County Court judges and each judge has so many courts. You will find that the judge of a big place like Leeds has very little to do except with the court of Leeds, which keeps him well fed. Then you will find close by another judge of a circuit of a more country character, who has perhaps even as many as 10 courts. I think the judge in Mid-Wales has even more courts than that. The principle under the County Courts Act is that every County Court Judge has to sit at the courts to which he is attached once a month unless the Lord Chancellor allows him to sit less. There are some very small places where it is considered that a sitting once every two months is enough; I think there are two or three places where they only sit three times in the year. But the ordinary rule is, with the great majority of courts, that the judge sits at least once a month, and where he has only one court he, of course, sits about two-thirds of the month day by day, just like a High Court Judge.

44,207. Is there a registrar attached to each court?—Each court in each circuit has a registrar. The judge goes from No. 1 Court to No. 2 Court and he finds the registrar of No. 2 Court there.

44,208. Does the registrar do judicial work?—Yes.

44,209. Is he also in charge of the office of the court?—Yes.

44,210. Is a large part of the judicial work of each court done by the registrar?—It is very difficult in the County Court to draw a sharp line between what is judicial work and what is administrative work.

44,211. (Mr. Coward.) He deals with undefended cases and that kind of thing?—Yes. He has jurisdiction to dispose of the undefended cases, because, after all, that is only taking a note that there is no defence, and seeing that the man who has claimed has complied, on the face of it, with the ordinary rules of his court in making his claim, and is entitled to get his judgment.

44,212. (Chairman.) Does that mean a large part of the business of the Court as judged by the number of complaints?—Yes, there are an immense number of such cases.

44,213. What is the system of appointing the registrars?—The County Court Judge appoints the registrars at every one of his courts, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor. He has to send up the name of the man that he proposes, and send up his testimonials, and to satisfy the Lord Chancellor that he has duly considered the situation and the applications, and has proceeded about the business of selecting the man in a proper way, and the man is duly qualified and so forth, but the Lord Chancellor does not enter into the question in the same way as he would if he was appointing the man himself. It is the judge who selects the man and the Lord Chancellor countersigns the appointment.

44,214. Does that system work satisfactorily?—I think so, subject to the question of patronage.

44,215. But your general remarks about patronage would apply in this case?—Certainly. Then there is a special point about the District Registries. It was decided by the Judicature Acts that it would be a good thing to have provincial officers who could do certain of the business of the masters in the provinces so that people might not have to come up to London, and it was decided to establish those officers and to call them District Registrars. It was pointed out that there were the County Court Registrars there, and that the County Court Registrar in a large place—and it would be only in a large place that you would have District Registrars of the High Court—was always a highly qualified man, and a man of experience and position amongst the solicitors there and that he might be the District Registrar. The effect of that is that the District Registrar, although he is an officer, and an important officer of the High Court, is appointed by a County Court Judge. There is a pretty strong opinion held, which is certainly my own opinion, that the Lord Chancellor ought to be put in a stronger position with regard to those who hold the position of District Registrar, and that, while it would be an intolerable burden to have to appoint to all the small courts, where the registrar is the District Registrar of the High Court, he ought to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor subject to all the remarks made about a certain control of patronage.

44,216. If that were done would you propose that there should be a committee of some kind to make the appointments?—Whatever might be settled about the other appointments I think might apply to these, but I think it is undesirable that the district registrars should be appointed by the County Court judges.

44,217. How many of them are whole-time officers?—I cannot tell you offhand how many there are.

44,218. Is it a large proportion?—You could not call it a large proportion. It is only where the salary approaches 1,000*l.* a year.

44,219. Are any of them pensionable?—Those who are "whole-timers" are pensionable.

44,220. I presume the question of the age for retirement applies to them in much the same way as to officers in the Central Office?—I think anybody who is a whole-timer ought to be put under the same rule.

44,221. At present there is no fixed age?—No.

44,222. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Could we have a list of them, and a statement as to their present ages?—I do not suppose there is much difficulty about that. The person who, I think, could carry that out, and also give you a good deal of detailed information, especially on the financial side, as to how these people are paid, which is an important point, is Mr. Bridgeman, who is the Superintendent of the County Courts Department of accounts at the Treasury. He has an army of what are called "examiners" who go down to the different Courts and who look into their accounts, because the system upon which the registrars are paid is that they take fees for the different proceedings in the Court, and they have to account for those fees, some of which go straight into their pockets, and others are paid to the Treasury. In every case the salary of the registrar depends upon the amount of business in the Court, and of course that requires very strict auditing. Mr. Bridgeman will tell you all about how that works.

44,223. We shall get the details of that system from Mr. Bridgeman?—Yes.

44,224. (Mr. Coward.) Does that system occur to you as being a satisfactory system?—I can quite understand somebody thinking it not satisfactory. There have been attempts made, I think, to have a different system; that is to say, simply to have paid officers planted about all over the country; but it becomes impracticable in the small places.

44,225. (Chairman.) In the small places, I presume, the registrar's work occupies a very small part of the time of a solicitor practising in the locality?—Yes, it is really rather a blue ribbon in the small places, and everywhere except the largest places. You get on the whole, I think, the best solicitor in a place to take the County Court registrarship, because he just adds it to his business; he puts up "County Court Registrar" over his door. The people go there, and his ordinary clerks work it out for him. A certain amount of the salary of the clerks is attributable merely as a matter of account to the County Court business; but they are his private clerks, and I do not know that there is any other way of working it.

44,226. What is the system as regards the clerical staff under the registrar?—The registrar finds his own clerks.

44,227. Does that apply in the case of a whole time registrar?—Yes.

44,228. They are the servants of the registrar?—They are the servants of the registrar.

44,229. And paid by him out of what funds?—He has an arrangement with the Treasury which approaches very near to our old friend the “lump sum” that we used to talk about.

44,230. That is to say, he has an allowance for assistance?—It practically comes to that. It is rather a complicated arrangement which I am perfectly capable of explaining, but which would be better explained to you by Mr. Bridgeman. It has its unsatisfactory side, and in particular I should think you probably have had sent to you a representative from the Association of County Court Clerks upon the question whether those who are practically whole-timers ought not to be Civil servants of the State like the clerks of the Supreme Court, and whether they ought not to have pensions, and so forth. Some years ago a committee was appointed to inquire into that, and I have made a note to send you the report of that. Sir David Brynmor Jones was Chairman of the Committee.

44,231. Will you put in a copy of that? Is it a public document?—I can put it in, but perhaps you will ascertain if the Treasury has any objection to my doing so. I can answer for it that the Lord Chancellor has no objection. The question about the District Probate Registries comes in in this connection.

44,232. Your remarks on that subject apply here?—Yes.

44,233. You are of opinion that they should as far as possible be amalgamated with the County Court registries and the registries of the High Court?—Yes.

44,234. We will now turn to the Land Registry. How are the appointments in the Land Registry made?—Those are made by the Lord Chancellor. Practically everything that I have said about appointments in the Supreme Court, as far as he makes them, applies to the Land Registry. It was organised on the analogy of the other legal offices.

44,235. Have you there the three classes of clerks which you have spoken of?—Yes, just the same.

44,236. Is there some technical staff required for questions of survey and mapping?—Yes, and they are organised differently.

44,237. Are they also appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes; though practically the recommendations of Sir Charles Brickdale, I think, have been invariably accepted, there is no doubt that the Lord Chancellor is responsible for the appointments.

44,238. In the Land Registry are some of the higher offices filled by direct appointment from the professions?—Yes, they have been. They have all been appointed for special business. The posts could not have been filled by promotion amongst the clerks, and could not very well be classified with the clerks; and on the other hand they were inferior to the registrars. It really means that the organisation of the Supreme Court, with a stratum of masters at the top, and then a lower stratum of clerks, could not be rigidly applied to the Land Registry; and I think experience has shown that there ought to be a considerable modification in the organisation of the Land Registry. To a considerable extent it has already rather lost that character in which it was originally constituted.

44,239. In what direction do you consider that reorganisation is wanted?—I do not think I have a very strong opinion upon the point. It would be desirable to ascertain what Sir Charles Brickdale thinks about that. There is one observation which applies to the Land Registry, and which really applies to the Supreme Court, and which, I think, ought to be borne in mind when you are considering the question of organisation, salary, and so forth, and that is, that these offices really pay their way. The Land Registry has power under Act of Parliament to charge fees for the various things that it does—the registrations, and so forth—and those charges are fixed by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, with the advice of a professional committee, with a view to carrying on the Land Registry without any surplus, but without any charge to the public. It is the same in this respect as the Public Trustee, whose office has already been before the Commission.

44,240. In practice is that result attained?—Yes, because there is built up a surplus into an insurance fund in case of any mistakes in the registries, just the same as has the Public Trustee. It is an important thing, because when there are discussions with the Treasury as to whether something should be allowed, or something done, it is not a question of placing any charge on the public funds. The department, I think, has a sort of feeling that as they pay they ought to be allowed to have a rather stronger say as to what they want, and the question is whether they should have it or not.

44,241. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would you apply that principle to the Post Office?—I do not wish to answer in a hurry. I only wish to say that that is the fact in this office which has to be borne in mind—that it is not one of those offices borne upon the Estimates in the usual sense.

44,242. (Chairman.) Will you turn now to the offices which are rather outside the general legal establishments. You mentioned in the first place the Assize Offices. What do they consist of?—Every one of the circuits has a head officer who is called the Clerk of Assize, and he acts in the assizes very much as the master would during the sitting of a Court. He is the head officer of the judge, and has certain functions to perform with reference to cases both before and after they come before the judge of assize on circuit. He has two or three subordinates; they all have titles. One is called the Clerk of Indictments and another is called the Associate, and the inferior officer is called the Bailiff. Their establishments were inquired into at the same time as the Central Office in 1887. I was on that committee, and we laid down then what the establishment ought to be, and I think, as I have already remarked about the Central Office, we placed it on a minimum; I should very much doubt if you could reduce it as far as regards either numbers or salaries.

44,243. They are not employed for the whole of the year, I presume?—No.

44,244. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) They are not in this list which is before us?—No, they are in the Estimates.

44,245. (Chairman.) Their work is going on when the assizes are going on?—Mainly.

44,246. With some preparatory work?—Yes; some work before and some after. If you look at that Report of the Committee of 1887, you will see that it was recommended that there should be some way, when the assizes were not going on, of utilising the assize officers at the Royal Courts of Justice when the judges who otherwise would be on assize are all sitting. You had a number of King's Bench Courts sitting when there are no assizes going on, and when the assizes were going on the courts are empty at the Royal Courts of Justice, and so it was thought that as the judges moved from London to the country and back to London, so these officers who have duties immediately connected with the Court and with the hearing of cases could move about also. But the fact is that there has been a good deal of change since 1887. The circuits are much more distributed than they were then. At that time all the judges sat in London for a certain time, and then all, or nearly all, went away on assizes, and the courts were left almost empty in London. They now distribute the work much more. They keep a larger number of judges continually here, and they are very seldom all here.

44,247. So that amalgamation would now be more difficult?—Much more difficult, and I think it would probably come to very little.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,248. The clerks of assize are not pensionable, are they?—I think not. I do not recollect at the moment.

44,249. How are they appointed?—They are appointed by the judge of assize. The rule amongst the judges is this: It is statutory that they are appointed by the judge of assize, but who the judge of assize shall be is a regulation amongst themselves, which is that the senior judge who goes the summer circuit at any particular place appoints to any vacancy in the office of the clerk of assize or any of his subordinates which takes place during the next 12 months.

44,250. Would your remarks about patronage in general apply to these appointments also?—Yes, unquestionably.

44,251. Is there a professional qualification in this case?—For clerks of assize? I forget at the moment.

44,252. (Mr. Matheson.) Must not they be barristers?—I am not sure.

44,253. (Mr. Coward.) I think they all are barristers?—Yes, they all are. I think an Act called the Clerks of Assize Act, 1869, still on the Statute Book, lays it down.

44,254. (Chairman.) The next of the outside offices which you mentioned was the Criminal Appeal Office?—The Criminal Appeal Office, though anybody who went to the Law Courts would think it was simply part of the Central Office, is, technically, not part of the Central Office. It is not, technically, part of the Supreme Court. When the principle of appeal in criminal cases was settled by Lord Chancellor Loreburn a few years ago, the Act constituted a Special Court, which consists of the King's Bench judges, not the other judges, and not the Lord Chancellor. It is a Court of itself, with jurisdiction to hear appeals in criminal cases, and they have, like other courts, a staff. Their principal officer is called the Registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal. He is another of those persons who may generically be called "masters"; he is a master. At present he actually is one of the masters of the Central Office. He joins his office as registrar to a certain share in the duties of the Central Office.

44,255. The amount of work is small, I suppose?—No, the work is not small at all, and it is of very high importance. The fact is that it is a very economical arrangement. We get a 1,500 pounder for this new office, as far as he himself is concerned for nothing, but he has an assistant registrar in the position of an assistant master, who has 800*l.* to 1,000*l.* The man who is now registrar, Mr. Kershaw, was appointed assistant registrar when the Act was passed, and he is now registrar, and is what is called Master of the Crown Office in the Central Office who is appointed by the Lord Chief Justice. The Crown Office Department is the one to which appeals from magistrates come on what is called the Crown side of the King's Bench Division. It has a quasi criminal jurisdiction already, and so he is a very appropriate person to do this criminal appeal business. Then he has a staff—a very moderate staff—all of whom were taken out of the Central Office. We chose clerks that we knew, and whom he knew, and who he thought were likely to suit him out of the Central Office, and they are on the same scale of salaries, but are appointed by the Lord Chancellor under the Act.

44,256. Have you any observations to make on this office apart from the general observations that you have made on the other offices?—I really do not think so. I think the finances are borne on the Supreme Court Vote, notwithstanding that it is not really a department of the Supreme Court, but it is a convenient thing to do, and I do not know that there is any technical difficulty likely to arise with regard to it.

44,257. The district registrars we have already dealt with in your evidence on the other registrars?—I think anything I had noted down with the idea of saying has already been said. There is, however, one reference that might be useful to anybody wishing to pursue the subject further, and that is Order 35 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, the one which says what the jurisdiction of the district registrar is.

44,258. As regards the Pay Office?—I think I have mentioned that. If it has not been looked into, I should have thought it ought to be looked into.

44,259. It is not under the Lord Chancellor?—No, neither appointment, payment, nor departmental regulation are made by the Lord Chancellor, though all their work and everything is laid down by rules under the Supreme Court Rules.

44,260. As regards the Scrivenery Department, you told us generally what their functions are?—I think you probably will have some representation from them, because they are one of those departments which, not being on the establishment, now wish to be placed upon the establishment, or at least to have pensions and so forth.

44,261. As regards the Lunacy Departments, there are masters and visitors?—They are not really part of the Supreme Court, though in old days they used to be part of the Chancery Division, because their business is to look after the estates, and to some extent after the management of the persons of propertied lunatics. That matter came into the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division in respect of property; that is the real origin of their being dealt with there, I think. There are two masters—one has been quite recently appointed—and there is a staff of clerks, as to which there is a report, which I will put in, which lays down what the staff ought to be and what it is now by authority, including the authority of the Treasury, after inquiry. I do not know that there is any remark to make upon it. I think that is probably all right if you approve of the organisation, which is exactly the same as elsewhere.

44,262. Would there be any advantage in amalgamating the masters' office and the visitors' office?—I do not think there is any advantage or disadvantage. I do not think it in the least matters—they work together—because the business of the visitors, as their name implies, is to go about the country to see that the schemes which have been laid down in the master's office for maintaining and looking after the lunatics are properly carried out, and they make a report every month upon every one of those persons, and make a certain batch of special reports as to those about whom there is anything particular to say; those reports come before the Lord Chancellor every month.

44,263. Would you suggest any reorganisation in those departments?—I do not think I have anything to suggest about them. I do not see why there should be an absolute exclusion in that department, any more than in the Supreme Court, of the possibility of one of the officers in the lower degree rising to the highest. I knew a man who was for a great many years in that office who would have made a most admirable Master in Lunacy. He died somewhat early, but for some years before his death I thought it a great pity that he was not eligible for the promotion.

44,264. (Bishop of Southwark.) I suppose the chief clerk has always been one of the first class clerks?—Yes.

44,265. He simply goes up naturally?—Yes.

44,266. (Chairman.) Are the functions of the masters in that office judicial?—Yes, very much so. They do a great deal of the same business for the lunatic estates that the masters in the Chancery Division and the judges in the Chancery Division do with reference to certain other classes of estates. It is their business to deal with the administration of estates, only it is the administration of lunatics' estates instead of wards of Court—insane persons instead of sane persons, that is all. There have been various proposals for amalgamation with reference to this office. It was recently proposed, and very nearly carried out, that the office should to a great extent disappear altogether, and that the estates of lunatics should be administered in Chancery chambers.

44,267. Would there be any serious objection to that?—I think there was a recommendation, I am not sure if unanimous, to that effect in the Report of the Royal Commission on Lunacy a short time ago.

44,268. (Miss Haldane.) And was not that question considered in the House of Commons?—Yes, I think it was.

44,269. And I think it was decided against?—I forget what the result of it was.

44,270. This Commission stated in their report:—“The question of consolidating the whole Lunacy administration in one department was referred to in evidence given before us. This subject received full discussion by the Commission appointed by your Majesty on the Care of the Feeble Minded, and a clause for the purpose of such consolidation was included in the Mental Deficiency Bill lately before Parliament; but not only was the clause struck out in

“the House of Commons, but also a section of the “Lunacy Act which contained a like provision was “specifically repealed”?—That was a larger consolidation than the one I am referring to. It was the union and consolidation of the Lord Chancellor’s lunacy jurisdiction with the jurisdiction that is now administered by what is called the Board of Control in Lunacy which used to be the office of the Commissioners in Lunacy. That is what that report referred to, and not to the question of the administration of estates in lunacy being carried on in Chancery chambers.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWELFTH DAY.

Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C., recalled and further examined.

44,271. (Chairman.) At the end of our sitting yesterday we were dealing with the Lunacy Offices, and there were one or two points still remaining to be mentioned with regard to them. Have you any suggestion to make as regards the position of the masters?—I have for a long time myself thought that that office would be better organised if it had only one head, and possibly two assistant masters. At present they work in two branches practically; one master takes half the cases, more or less, and the other master takes the other half. I do not think the one master knows much about what goes on in the cases before the other master, and I think it would be better if, instead of the business being divided like that at the very top, it was divided at the next stage, and there was a real pyramid up to the top. I do not know that that would be a very economical arrangement. I am inclined to think it might be arranged that way without costing more money, although probably there would be three great officers instead of two, because there would be the one at the very head and two assistants below him. I think the head should gather up the knowledge of all the cases on the most important points, and have a general supervision over the whole of the cases, instead of, as at present, the cases being divided between the two masters. I believe myself that on the whole the office would be better organised upon that principle than upon its present basis.

44,272. I see the Masters in Lunacy receive 2,000*l.* a year each?—Yes.

44,273. Is there any special reason why they should be paid on a higher scale of salary than the masters in other offices of the Court?—I do not feel sure that if you had only one, as I suggest, he might not remain at the present salary. I think if there continued to be two the salary which applies to the other principal officers throughout the Supreme Court ought to be sufficient. The Commissioners in Lunacy get 1,500*l.* a year, not 2,000*l.* a year. As a matter of history the case is this: that class of lunatics used to be dealt with in the Chancery Division; they were called, as they are indeed sometimes called still, Chancery lunatics; in fact they were the lunatic wards of Court, just as there still remain sane wards of Court in charge of the Chancery Division. I think in about 1845 the lunacy business was separated from the other chancery business, and the Masters in Chancery remained in the Chancery Division, but the lunacy business was put in a separate department, and two of the masters, who then were called “Masters in Lunacy,” continued the business in a separate division. The salaries, I think, in those days for all the masters were 2,000*l.* a year, and so the lunacy masters started quite properly with 2,000*l.*, and when reforms were introduced into the Chancery Division, the Lunacy Department lay low, and was not dealt with.

44,274. As regards the Lunacy Offices in general, have you any other observations to make?—There was one thing that has only occurred to me since yesterday, and that is that I ought to have referred this Commission to the evidence that was given before the Royal Commission on Lunacy generally.

44,275. Did that Commission inquire into the legal departments dealing with lunacy?—Yes, and especially into the question as to whether there ought to be an amalgamation of the lunacy departments, and for the purposes of that amalgamation whether the administration of the property of lunatics, which is the most important part of the business in connection with this class of lunatic, might not go back to its old position in the Chancery Division, and the superintendence of the person of the lunatics might not go over to what is now called the Board of Control. All that was carefully considered then, and the evidence about it is interesting. I have a personal reason for making this suggestion, because I gave very full evidence; I gave a memorandum to the Royal Commission and was then examined, and it would save time if anybody were to run their eye over that, instead of encouraging me to waste time now.

44,276. Then the Commission may refer to that?—I would suggest that you should at least refer to that. There were some very good remarks made upon that by Mr. Greene, who sat upon that Commission, and who, until the other day, was one of the Honorary Commissioners in Lunacy.

44,277. We will now pass to the judges’ clerks. Are they personal officers attached to each judge?—Yes, appointed by each judge.

44,278. There is one clerk attached to each judge?—Each judge now only has one clerk; he used to have two.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,279. The salary of each clerk is, I think, 400*l.* a year?—Yes.

44,280. Does a newly appointed judge, as a rule, appoint his own clerk, or does he often continue to employ the clerk of a previous judge?—He nearly always, almost necessarily you may say, takes the man who was his clerk while he was at the Bar.

44,281. What is the nature of the duties that those clerks to the judges perform?—I think it is very difficult to say. I think it very much depends upon the personal requirements of the judge. One judge might conceivably dictate his judgments to his clerk, while another would write them himself. Then there is a good deal of personal attendance, of course, required by every judge. There is a great deal of wearing of wigs and gowns; the clerk has charge of those, and assists his chief to put them on and also to take them off.

44,282. (Mr. Coward.) He airs them?—Yes, no doubt. There is one very important piece of business for which the judge's clerk is responsible, particularly in the King's Bench Division. The judge takes notes very carefully of the evidence in trials before him, and those notes are required for the Court of Appeal and for other purposes; the judges' clerks give out the copies of those notes, and also take charge of the judges' books of notes, and there is no doubt that is an important duty and requires great care and great responsibility.

44,283. (Chairman.) I suppose these clerks are not pensionable?—No, they are entirely personal officers.

44,284. Has any question been raised as regards their admission to pension?—Yes, it has been raised; I should have thought you would have had a memorial on the subject. Another question has been raised. The question about their being pensionable is, I think, almost entirely one for the Treasury. The Treasury, I think, would probably say that the salary of 400*l.* was a much higher salary than they considered necessary for a judge's private clerk, if it were not that he is liable to the disappearance of his judge after a somewhat limited service, and they therefore give him a salary out of which he may be expected to save money, during the twelve or fifteen years that he generally serves, for his old age; they would probably say that if they were to make these clerks pensionable they must considerably reduce the salary in order to make the pension fund. I should imagine that they might also say that if these officers are to be paid out of public money they ought to be appointed under some of the ordinary restrictions applying to people who are appointed to offices paid out of public money, that is to say, they ought not to be merely the personal appointment of the judge.

44,285. You said that a judge, as a rule, would appoint the clerk whom he had had with him as a barrister?—Yes.

44,286. If the judge had continued his career as a barrister, and had not been placed upon the Bench, his clerk would not have had any right to pension?—No, he would not. I think the clerks of barristers who are in such a position as to become judges, or are likely to become judges, generally earn a considerable amount of money. I think any clerk, if you gave him his choice, as to whether his chief should remain at the Bar or become a judge, would vote for his remaining at the Bar.

44,287. Are you aware whether there are any provident or pension societies among the barristers' clerks?—I think not.

44,288. Would not the natural solution be that voluntary associations should be formed, which might include judges' clerks, to provide pensions?—I think so.

44,289. Does the case of the judges' clerks materially differ, as regards the problem of pension, from that of barristers' clerks, except in the fact that they are paid out of public funds instead of private funds?—I think not; by which I mean to say that I agree with your suggestion. The only other thing is that there has been a considerable movement in favour of making the judges' clerks, after the retirement of the judge, when the clerk ceases to be employed, eligible, or something more than eligible, for clerkships in the offices of the Supreme Court.

44,290. What is your view as to that suggestion?—I have always been very strongly opposed to it, and I think, as I explained yesterday, seeing the way in which we deal with the appointments, promotions, and so forth, of the staff of clerks, it would be very undesirable, because, as the practice now is, the clerks are appointed in the first instance to the third class, beginning at 100*l.* a year and rising to 200*l.*, with the prospect, if they are good men, of their rising further, and that is now quite understood. If they were liable, whenever a judge retired, to have a man put into the second class or even the first class straight away, of course it would cause great dissatisfaction amongst the other appointees.

44,291. (Mr. Coward.) And the judges' clerks would be doing work which they had never seen before and had no real knowledge of?—I should like to see their case in favour of this put by somebody other than myself, because, as I have already stated, I am so strongly opposed to it that I could not be at all a good person to state the case for them. I can imagine that your proposition would not be accepted by all the clerks to the judges.

44,292. (Chairman.) Have you any further observations to make with regard to the judges' clerks?—No.

44,293. Now we will pass to the office of the official solicitor. Is his position the position of a solicitor instructed by the Court to carry out for clients who cannot be represented by a solicitor in the ordinary way, such duties as a solicitor would perform for an ordinary client?—The Court has the power to resort to the official solicitor in such cases as you mention, and, except with regard to wards of Court and with regard to lunatics, I should say it is very seldom exercised. The position of official solicitor is referred to in Order 65, Rule 11, which deals generally with costs, where the official solicitor can be utilised by the Court to make inquiries when they are not satisfied with the conduct of a practitioner before them. The official solicitor is in a very peculiar position. Although he is paid to some extent just like any other officer of the Court, he is allowed to retain his right to practise; the reason of that is that it is thought desirable that the person who is official solicitor should continue in touch and continue his practical acquaintance with the profession. I certainly think that it is a very valuable thing, though, of course, it is anomalous to have a man who is in the public service paid out of public money, and yet is in practice. There is another thing that is peculiar about him, and that is the way he is paid. He is paid a fixed sum—I think 500*l.* a year—for the duties that he could be called upon to perform like any other officer of the Court; but then, with relation to that class of business where he acts really like an ordinary solicitor for a client, he earns his money just like any other solicitor, and he retains so much of it as will bring his salary up to, I think, 1,300*l.* a year; the balance, which is very considerable, he pays into the Treasury. The major part of the salaries of his clerks is paid out of that money which he earns, just as an ordinary solicitor would pay the salaries of his clerks out of the money that he earns.

44,294. (Mr. Boutwood.) Out of the balance that he pays over to the Treasury?—He has continually to discuss it with the Treasury, and it has always been the subject of a certain amount of friction between the official solicitor and the Treasury. He discusses with them what amount he may pay to the clerks. That, of course, affects the balance. You may put it either way you like—that he pays them first and pays over the balance, or pays over the balance and gets back a lump sum from the Treasury.

44,295. (Chairman.) It is substantially the lump sum arrangement which exists in the case of other solicitors to public departments?—It is the lump sum arrangement over again, and you will find when you call him before you—and I think he will be a very valuable witness, because of his knowledge of the whole business of the Supreme Court, and his knowledge of his own profession—he will probably tell you that he thinks his clerks ought to be put on an established footing. He thinks they do as much work, and as important work and analogous work to that of the other clerks, and that they ought to be put on an established footing. I would suggest that the Royal Commissioners should look upon it in the same way as they have upon the establishment of the other solicitors to public departments.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,296. As to the staff of the Royal Courts of Justice—that is, the subordinate staff of ushers, porters, cleaners, and messengers—how are they appointed?—The principle which applies to appointments generally applies to them also. Those who are attached for particular duties to certain divisions, such as the ushers and messengers who do duty for the King's Bench Courts, are appointed by the Lord Chief Justice; in the Probate Division, by the President of that division; and in the Chancery Division, by the Lord Chancellor. Where they are doing general duties for the whole place, they are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Their pay is, putting it roughly, 30s. a week; they begin at 24s. and rise to 30s., and under special circumstances they go up to 35s. by a duty for the King's Bench Courts, are appointed by the Lord Chief Justice; in the Probate Division, by the President of that division; and in the Chancery Division, by the Lord Chancellor. Where they are doing general duties for the whole place, they are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Their pay is, putting it roughly, 30s. a week; they begin at 24s. and rise to 30s., and under special circumstances they go up to 35s. by a duty for the King's

Those who are called the first class attendants—they are divided into two classes, first class and second class—get 100l. a year.

44,297. Are pensioners largely appointed to those posts?—Yes; ex-soldiers and sailors are very largely appointed by the Lord Chancellor.

44,298. Is there any general understanding between the heads of the divisions—the appointing officers—that ex-soldiers and sailors should have a preference?—I cannot say as to the other appointors, I can only say as to the Lord Chancellor. If you were to examine Mr. Sartoris, the Superintendent, he is a very sensible man, and a man who would give very interesting information to the Commission, I think, upon the employment of all that class of servant, and I think he could tell you what in practice is the proportion of ex-soldiers and sailors who are appointed. The proportion is as large as this, that two or three times the Lord Chancellor has been approached, as I believe the chiefs of other departments have been, by the War Office, largely at the instigation of Parliament, to maintain that appointments of this class ought to be given to ex-soldiers and sailors, and the Lord Chancellor of the day has deprecated being brought into anything like a fixed scheme upon the subject, because the proportion of ex-soldiers and sailors who are appointed upon the staff of the Royal Courts of Justice is so much larger than has been suggested under any scheme that has been put forward, and he thought it was not advantageous to the soldiers and sailors that that should cease to be. If instead of appointing 75 per cent. as I think it is now, the Lord Chancellor were to come into a scheme in which it was said that 50 per cent. were to be appointed, the result would be that 25 per cent. would be appointed from other sources.

44,299. Then the Crown Office remains to be mentioned?—The Crown Office is in many respects a very interesting office, and at present it is held by the Lord Chancellor's secretary, that is to say, I am Clerk of the Crown. The reason why I ventured to suggest it being put last was because in its essence and origin it is a department quite outside the Supreme Court, and independent of the Lord Chancellor. The Clerk of the Crown is an officer of both Houses of Parliament, and he has, in respect of various duties under the Ballot Act with reference to general elections—the issue of writs and so forth—to obey the Order of the House. I have frequently had to attend before the House of Commons, and do what I have been told to do by them with reference to the subject of the issue of writs for general elections, and so forth.

44,300. (Mr. Holt.) I think, if I remember rightly, you appeared when Sir Harry Verney was returned, in consequence of a clerical error in the return to a writ?—Yes, if a "t" is not crossed upon a writ nobody can alter it except the Clerk of the Crown.

44,301. In this case the surname was left out?—Yes, and he cannot alter it without the permission of the House, and he is ordered to attend before the House and bring the writ. It is moved in the House that the writ be altered, and then he goes up to the table, bowing three times, and alters the writ in the way he is directed, shows it to the Speaker and carries it off, because under the Ballot Act nobody may have physical possession of the writ until it is sent to the Record Office except the Clerk of the Crown. That is a thing entirely apart from the Lord Chancellor, and so I thought that perhaps an office that is so much outside the Supreme Court might not be regarded as one of the legal departments.

44,302. (Chairman.) Has the Clerk of the Crown extensive duties in relation to the Supreme Court?—He has to carry out the appointment of judges, and so forth; he prepares the warrants and the commissions, and the Letters Patent under which they are appointed. The ground upon which the amalgamation with the secretary's office—whether it will persist or not after my time I do not feel quite sure—was made at that time was that the relations of the Clerk of the Crown to the Great Seal are essential; the Great Seal is in the custody of the Lord Chancellor, and the uses of the Great Seal are therefore part of the functions of the secretary as acting for him and conveying his directions. There is no doubt that a great deal of unnecessary going backwards and forwards, and possibilities of delay, and possibilities of mistakes in exceedingly technical matters, and so on, were certainly got rid of by amalgamating the two offices. Then also there was the very important question of economy. I, in fact, at this moment hold the appointment as Clerk of the Crown under the Sign Manual of Queen Victoria, assigning me a salary of 1,200l. a year. As a matter of fact in respect of the duties of Clerk of the Crown I have 300l. a year; so that there is a direct saving in that respect. There is also this position, that there is no doubt, I think, with regard to the various duties of Clerk of the Crown, that you must have a man of position and responsibility, and yet the duties are not such as to occupy anything like his whole time—and very little of his time as it formerly was—but on certain occasions, such as general elections above all others, the duties suddenly become very immediate and arduous, besides being very responsible. It certainly was, I venture to think, an advantage that you should be able to lay your hands upon an officer who held what, if I may without undue egotism say so, was a position of responsibility and importance, to take charge of those matters which could be quite reasonably and well transacted by him under ordinary circumstances, though upon occasions such as general elections it does result in a very heavy strain. The only objection to it that I know is that it is a very heavy thing during that time. As you know, there have been frequent general elections in the last few years. When first I became connected with these affairs an election every four or five years was the outside, but there have been frequent general elections lately, and there is no doubt it is a great strain when that takes place. The strain of a general election, added to the duties and responsibilities in connection with the Lord Chancellor, is for a short period no doubt severe.

44,303. Have you, as Clerk of the Crown, a separate staff?—No; the advantages or disadvantages of amalgamation apply to the staff as well as to the secretary. The staff is actually smaller now, I think I am correct in stating, for the work of the two offices than it used to be in either office before, and the work is done by the aid of able and industrious men satisfactorily all through, and with great labour and difficulty when occasions of stress arise.

44,304. On occasions of stress, such as a general election, do you get temporary clerical assistance to cope with it?—To a small extent. Such business as there is is so technical that temporary assistance is not really of very much use. Another very interesting occasion when there is stress in the office—an occasion of which I was quite unaware when the amalgamation took place—is on the occasion of a coronation. The Clerk of the Crown, as I discovered to my horror on the demise of Queen Victoria, is what is called Registrar of the Court of Claims. I think the very existence of the Court of Claims was hardly in the minds of anybody when this amalgamation took place. What the Court did, and what it was for, hardly any living person knew, because Her Most Gracious Majesty to the benefit of everybody lived a very long time, and it was

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

60 years since there had been a coronation. To my horror I discovered that I was responsible for getting this Court set up, and for everything that was to take place before it. It was a very laborious business then, and but for the help of Sir Edward Hope, who was then Registrar of the Privy Council, I really think we should have come to grief over it. There have been two coronations since, and it is a great strain on the office while that is going on; there is a great deal of technical business, and some questions of great legal importance for those who think it is important who should carry a spur or something of that sort. The end of the Court of Claims is that there is a document drawn up which is called the "Coronation Roll"; that is drawn up by the Clerk of the Crown, who enters in the Roll full details of all the claims and all judgments on the claims that were heard before the Court of Claims. That roll is in the Record Office, and you will find in the Record Office the Coronation Rolls signed by the Clerk of the Crown going back, I believe, as far as Henry II., and no doubt they existed before that.

44,305. (Mr. Holt.) Have you anything to do with by-elections?—Yes, everything; and there I absolutely obey the order of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

44,306. Have you anything to do with a by-election in Ireland?—No, except that a return is made by the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to the Clerk of the Crown in England, and then the return is made to the House of Commons.

44,307. Have you anything to do with a general election in Ireland?—Just in the same way. They send the return over to the Crown Office. The official document, which is the evidence, I suppose, of a man being a member of the House of Commons, is the return made by the Clerk of the Crown, which is made in the form of a great book at the beginning of the Parliament, signed by him, and brought in and laid on the table of the House of Commons on the first day of meeting. It is the first thing that is done, and on reading the names in that book the clerk at the table summons up each member to come and take the oath at the table. That book contains the Scotch and the Irish as well as the English members.

44,308. That meets my point. There is a Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, too?—Yes; a general election is conducted independently in Ireland, but the result of the elections is returned to the Crown Office, England, by the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland. The Clerk of the Crown in England is the only person to whom the House of Commons refers for a correct list of the members of the House.

44,309. (Chairman.) That is very interesting. May we understand that you think it a matter of convenience and in the public interest that the office of the Clerk of the Crown should remain associated with the office of secretary to the Lord Chancellor?—I do not think I am prepared to give a very positive opinion about that.

44,310. Do you consider that the convenience of the public and the public interest has been served by the union of those two offices?—I think, quite apart from all personal considerations, it has been advantageous, if in no other way in getting rid of unnecessary steps in matters of formality and getting rid of the risk of slips in those formal matters which, being under the Great Seal, are undoubtedly of considerable importance.

44,311. (Mr. Holt.) Is your salary as Clerk of the Crown on the Estimates?—Yes.

44,312. Then you can be attacked in Parliament for your conduct as Clerk of the Crown?—Yes.

44,313. Who would defend you as Clerk of the Crown?—There is nobody whose duty it is to defend. I should have to rely upon the kind offices of some friend.

44,314. That is rather an anomalous position?—That applies to the Supreme Court Vote altogether, except so far as the Secretary of the Treasury has the duty of defending any Estimates that are put before the House. There is nobody who represents the Lord Chancellor and his department in the House of Commons.

44,315. As Clerk of the Crown you are partly the servant of the Crown, partly the servant of the House of Lords, and partly the servant of the House of Commons?—Yes, it is so. I should expect the House of Commons, if my conduct was impugned there, to take a certain personal interest in me, and to defend me as their own officer.

44,316. Is the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland in any way your subordinate?—In no way at all. He is an officer partly of the Crown and partly of the Lord Chancellor in Ireland, just as I am in this country.

44,317. But you communicate with him. Does he get his instructions about writs for by-elections direct from the Speaker, or direct through the Crown, or through you?—Not through me directly, but he has to make his return to the Clerk of the Crown with regard to both Houses of Parliament. With regard to the election of representative peers he makes his return through the Clerk of the Crown.

44,318. Have you, as Clerk of the Crown, anything to do with peers taking their seats?—I have to issue the writ in respect of each peer who comes in and claims to take his seat. He has to get it at the Crown Office. I facilitate that operation by sending the writ up to the Lobby of the House of Lords, but, technically, he has to go to the Crown Office to get his writ.

44,319. Then your position in both Houses of Parliament with regard to writs is precisely the same?—Practically the same.

44,320. With regard to the official solicitor, do the clerks of the official solicitor do any part of his outside work. I understand the official solicitor has an independent practice outside. Does he keep a separate staff of clerks for his private practice and a separate staff for his official practice?—I think I would rather leave that for him to answer when he is here.

44,321. You rather dealt with the position of his establishment, suggesting that it should be put in the same position as that of the solicitor to other public departments?—Yes.

44,322. Would a comparison hold good unless he had a separate staff?—I should say no. It could only apply to those people who at present are wholly paid out of the lump sum.

44,323. And whose time is wholly given to public work?—Yes, I think so. I think it is so with him. I think the clerks whom he requires for his work as official solicitor are at the present time independent of his clerks who do his private business.

44,324. Has he got a separate office for his business as official solicitor?—Yes, entirely. He has an office in the Royal Courts of Justice. His private business is all carried on in a separate office in New Court.

44,325. Has either the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General any official duties in connection with your department?—No official duties.

44,326. None at all?—No.

44,327. You rather suggested that it might be a good thing if there was a subordinate Minister in the House of Commons to reply for your department?—Yes.

44,328. If that were done could such an officer, in your opinion, be in any way utilised as an assistant to the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General?—Yes, I should think he might be.

44,329. You may possibly know that sometimes when parliamentary business is very heavy, it is suggested that the law officers of the Crown are grossly overworked?—Yes.

44,330. If such an office were constituted, might not it be to the public advantage that it should be combined in some way with the duties of the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General?—I think so.

44,331. The effect of doing that would be that the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General would not be wholly dissociated from your department. If their assistant were acting both for you and for them it would almost inevitably follow that the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General would have also to act both for you and for their own department?—I do not feel quite sure about that, I have not attempted to work out any scheme with reference to my suggestion on that subject, and certainly did not make the suggestion with any regard to what were the requirements of the law officers of the Crown in the House of Commons.

44,332. You told us that some of your Bills were, as you thought, neglected in consequence of having no representative in the House of Commons?—Yes.

44,333. What sort of Bill had you in mind at the time?—At the moment when I mentioned it I was thinking of a Bill that was drawn containing in it two clauses in particular; one was a clause consolidating the qualifications for officers of the Supreme Court, and making one rule with reference to a point that you appear to take interest in about the passage from the lower ranks to the higher ranks. At present, in some divisions, there is no passage, and in others there is a passage. This was a clause which made the thing uniform throughout the divisions. The other clause was dealing with the question of whether Orders in Council for the Civil Service applied to the Supreme Court or not. That Bill went a certain distance in the House of Commons, but was practically relegated to the class of Bills that may be taken up if there is any time, and there is never any time, and so the Bill drops.

44,334. Was not there a Bill a year or two ago in connection with County Courts?—That is, perhaps, on the whole, the strongest instance of the difficulty that could be referred to. That Bill has been introduced again and again. I think it was introduced for the first time in the same year as the Doctrine of Preference in 1903, and has continued to be slaughtered year after year down to the present time. It had several very important provisions in it, some of them interesting to the Treasury, others of them only interesting to the legal profession.

44,335. Do you think that the failure of that Bill to proceed any further is partly due to the fact that your department is not represented properly in the House of Commons?—I think so. Our only chance of getting it dealt with was the law officers of the Crown having time to deal with it. They naturally give preference to the Bill that each of them is more directly concerned in, or those Bills, as is the case nowadays, that the law officers of the Crown take a very prominent part in—the Finance Bills—before the House of Commons. Of course that used not to be the case in olden days, and they used to confine themselves much more to legal Bills than they do nowadays.

44,336. Now as to the position of clerks of assize. Am I right in understanding that the clerks of assize are appointed by the judge who happens to be the senior judge on the assize at the time the vacancy occurs?—The senior judge who goes the summer circuit is the one who has the right of appointment of assize officers for the rest of the year, until another judge in the next summer is senior judge of that assize.

44,337. Is there any reason to think that those appointments have been frequently, or with suspicious frequency, given to the near relatives of the appointing person?—I do not very much like to answer that question, but I think anybody who wished to ascertain the answer to that question should look at the list of clerks of assize.

44,338. The person who makes such an appointment has practically no real responsibility in connection with it at all. The man who makes the appointment is, so to speak, making it because he happens to be in a particular position on a particular day, and is in no way responsible for the proper conduct of the offices after the appointment is made?—No, he is not responsible.

44,339. You said that the masters of the Supreme Court were persons who had to be in the position of barristers or solicitors who had actually practised?—Yes.

44,340. When you say “actually practised,” does that simply mean that barristers have had their names up on a door, or does it mean they have actually appeared in the Law Courts as practitioners?—I do not know that a legal interpretation has ever been given to those words, and it would be very difficult, I think, to maintain that anybody whom the Lord Chancellor or the other appointing authority had presented to the office was or was not a barrister in practice. But it is well understood what it means; it means in adequate practice.

44,341. It would be understood that he was a person who had at some time not infrequently appeared and taken actual professional work?—There can be no doubt about that; in fact I should put it higher than that: It means a man who is in active practice at the time.

44,342. In this synopsis of evidence which you handed in I do not see any notice as to where the Divorce Registry occurs. Is that included in the Probate Division?—Yes, the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division is its name.

44,343. You put down “Probate Registry” and “Admiralty Registry” and Divorce is omitted?—There is no separate office called a Divorce Registry; it is done by the Probate officers in the Probate Registry.

44,344–5. And not by the Admiralty officers?—Not by the Admiralty.

44,346. (Mr. Boutwood.) When we were considering the Report on the Civil Service, you will remember, we came to some conclusion of this sort—that, on the whole, the clerical establishments were to be filled by some sort of examination or competition, and that, generally speaking, nomination and patronage were to be reserved for professional services. That was the rough distinction which we had in our minds.—Yes.

44,347. Could these third class clerks of the Supreme Court be in any sense called professional officers?—No.

44,348. I wondered whether you would extend the category to cover them?—It is difficult, I think, to be clear on the subject, because I do not think you could possibly call them professional officers, and yet you hold out to them a prospect and hope that they will prove themselves equal to rising to the duties of the first class, where I think they might very fairly be described as professional officers.

44,349. Supposing the first class were separated somewhat in the way you suggested yesterday, would you see any serious objection to bringing the third class under some sort of competition rule?—No, I should like on the whole, to see them made the subject of open competition. It is one of the difficulties, of course, of the whole subject of open competition that you make a fixed proposal of examination and you cannot exercise your judgment about a man except upon the result of that examination. I tried to explain yesterday that while I thought, taking it on the whole, and for the majority of the clerks, the best men you could get were those who had been brought up in a solicitor's office, yet I thought it was desirable to have a certain leaven of a higher class of man brought in. Now, you would not get that higher class of man if you laid down a rule that he must have so many years' experience in a solicitor's office.

44,350. And you do not think that an open competition that had not got that rule in it as one of the preliminary conditions would be quite adequate. Is that the point?—Because I do not see how you would get in my element of vagueness in a system that was rigid.

44,351. I am suggesting to you a larger vagueness. This is conceivable. You could have a competitive examination, and say that candidates must have a certain experience in a solicitor's office?—Yes, that is a limited competition.

44,352. Yes. On the other hand, you could just have an ordinary competition without that requirement and take your chance. Supposing that you had the latter?—To my mind I doubt whether we should get as good men as we get under the system now.

44,353. So you are in the face of these difficulties—if you have your limited competition prescribing experience in a solicitor's office you lose the other sort of man you speak of: if you have the purely open competition you lose the experience in a solicitor's office?—Yes, those are the main pros and cons with regard to that matter. I should be quite willing, as long as I am in this position, to go on as we are now, but I can quite conceive that my successor would rather not have the responsibility.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,354. Apart from the opportunity that it gives you of bringing in your university man exceptionally, does the present system give you any considerable advantage?—No, I think not. That is the only suggestion I have to make about it.

44,355. The view is usually held that the nomination and the consequent personal interview are chiefly valuable when the personal qualifications of the man are primary. This does not apply very much to your third class clerk?—I rather wish to deprecate being asked too much about my personal opinions upon those subjects, because I should rather like to abide by my signature to the conclusion that the majority of this Commission have arrived at.

44,356. What happens to a judge's clerk when his judge departs. Of course he loses his post, but as a matter of fact do you know what happens to him?—Different things, of course, happen to different ones. In some cases I have known some judges' clerks who went back into service with a barrister. Some well-known men amongst the judges' clerks have never found difficulty either in becoming a clerk to another judge or to some barrister in large practice. There are others who have no means, and some of them I daresay not much qualification for other work, although their own masters, who were accustomed to them, were quite pleased to have them as clerks; and I think in most of those cases the judge has made some provision for the clerk. Of course there are cases, though I believe they are rarer than one would hope that they might be, where the clerk has been a sensible man and has used the opportunity—and it certainly is an opportunity—of laying by money.

44,357. The Crown can regulate the Civil Service by Orders in Council, but apparently there is some doubt whether it can do the same thing for the legal service. Is that real or supposed inability of the Crown an inference from the independence of judges?—No, I do not think so. It was thought right when the Judicature Act was passed to continue what was the state of things before, and that it should be left to the judicial authorities—chiefly to the Lord Chancellor—to regulate all those things. They are either laid down by Rules of Court, which means, under existing circumstances, that they are laid down by what is called the Rules Committee—which is a committee of judges and others—or they are laid down by the Lord Chancellor with the concurrence of the Treasury. That is statutory. The whole thing was thought out, and there was correspondence with the Treasury, but I do not think it is worth while for the Commission to ask for that correspondence or go into it. The result was, I think, an agreement on both sides that if the Orders in Council were to apply to the judicial establishments, there must be a clause put in with the idea that it would supersede the clauses on the subject in the Judicature Acts.

44,358. You have mentioned more than once the parliamentary representation of the legal offices. It is an easy thing to get hold of somebody and say, "You shall be Minister to represent these people." A difficulty has occurred to me, and I do not know how far it would be a difficulty in your mind. There is one office that I know of (you may remember it) that has a parliamentary representative, who is in no effective sense part of the organisation of the office; he takes no part in the proceedings, and cannot be said in any real sense to be responsible for anything that is said or done, and practically he is a mere mouthpiece of the office for reading out answers in the House of Commons from a type-written piece of paper. Unless you give your man some organic connection with legal offices you might drop into that position, and that would not be a very desirable one?—It would not be an ideal position, but it would be better than the present position. If there were a member of Parliament connected with the Government whose interest it was to take charge of the legal Bills it would be a great help. I imagine there is a certain amount of ambition in every member of Parliament to have a Bill.

44,359. Whose servant is the clerk of assize?—He is a servant of the Crown, whatever that means.

44,360. Who can dismiss him?—The Lord Chancellor, or the senior Judge of Assize.

44,361. And is the Lord Chancellor the person who is responsible for his conduct?—In that way. It has not been the practice of the Lord Chancellor to make a tour of the assize offices to see what the clerk of assize is doing, but if somebody had reason to complain, the person he would write to, if he wished to bring it to any effective issue, would be the Lord Chancellor, and he would make such inquiries as he thought proper.

44,362. Is the salary of the clerk of assize on the Estimates?—Yes.

44,363. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us that in practice it is now general amongst clerks of the Central Office for a clerk to enter at the bottom, receiving 100*l.* a year, and if his conduct is good to go steadily up to 600*l.* a year?—Yes.

44,364. That is to say, the principle which is adopted in other offices that men should be recruited from the beginning either for more routine work or for higher work is not adopted in legal offices?—No.

44,365. The effect of that is that a man from the beginning does a very large amount of purely routine work for many years?—Yes.

44,366. And in the legal offices all the routine work is done by these men?—Yes.

44,367. The effect also would be that he gets to Class I. comparatively late in life?—Yes.

44,368. I see in the Central Office the first four people in Class I. entered the Service in 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1867, which is a long time ago. The next people entered in 1874, 1874, 1879, and apparently the last one appointed went into the Service in 1876. The man who will next be appointed went into the Service in 1877. That implies that it is a very long time before they get to the first class?—Certainly.

44,369. It is only in the first class that skilled work is supposed to be done?—And to some extent, I should think, in the second class.

44,370. But it is the fact that the period during which he is doing skilled work is very short?—Yes. I understand very well what you mean, and I have great sympathy with that view generally, and I think a man who goes on doing purely routine work for a long time is probably not a man who improves much; but I think on the whole, from the way the office is worked now, with a good deal of interchangeability in the different departments, and from the nature of the work that comes in, an energetic man who has got some stuff in him does learn a good deal, and does qualify himself for the work which he would get in the second class, and so, when he gets into the second class, he improves himself still more. I think that is the case, and that perhaps may be because the division of the work is not quite so precise as we have seen generally in the Civil Service. In that way, perhaps, I said, "yes," a little too readily to one of your questions.

44,371. You told us yesterday that it has sometimes happened that an ignorant man at the top of the Service was in fact allowing the better kind of work to be done by a clever man a good deal lower down in the Service?—Yes, I think that sometimes happens.

44,372. And that produces anomalies in the office?—I do not recollect that yesterday I made that observation as applying only to the legal departments. I think my observation was a general one—that I think it is a thing that takes place in the public service generally.

44,373. It included the legal departments?—Yes.

44,374. You can correct that in two ways, either by promoting the clever man from underneath, or telling the clever man to cease to do the advanced work, and insist upon its being done by the older man?—Yes.

44,375. You say you are attempting to correct it. May I take it that you are doing both things, that is, insisting upon the work being done by the older man, and also trying to promote the younger man?—Yes. Where I have the opportunity of speaking upon that subject that is the double direction in which my observations move.

44,376. But in so far as the work in fact has been done by a man you call a clever man, and is in future done by a man you call ignorant, while the symmetry of the office is improved by the change, the public suffers if you insist upon the worse man doing the more important work?—It is a very undesirable state of things from every point of view, I think.

44,377. You told us that the proportion of men on the higher scale of salaries—the first to the second class of clerks—differs in various offices?—Yes.

44,378. By whom is that proportion fixed?—The proportion was fixed as long ago as the eighties—1881, 1882, and 1883—in the different departments by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury at that time.

44,379. And I may take it that it was fixed on the basis of giving a larger proportion of the highly-paid posts to the offices where the work was in fact most important and difficult?—Yes, clearly.

44,380. But both offices, those in which the proportion of first-class posts is large and those in which the proportion of first-class posts is low, are in fact manned in precisely the same way by the men coming in by the same system of nomination and the same salary at the bottom?—That is so.

44,381. So in an office where the work is of great importance you pay higher salaries, but you take no steps to get better men than in those offices in which the work is of less importance?—I think that is not quite so under the existing system. I think if you were to apply the different system that has been suggested that would result. At present, if a vacancy occurs in an office where the business is more important, there is more exactitude exercised in selecting the man than there is in the other cases. For instance, I think if the question was the dealing with a vacancy in the Chancery Division, there is a feeling that you want a man with more technical knowledge in the first instance than if you were appointing him to the Central Office.

44,382. But these posts are in fact appointed by certain high officers in rotation?—There you get into hopeless difficulty, and great objection, I think, to the present state of things.

44,383. Does your experience suggest that if one of the high officers, say, the Lord Chief Justice, has promised his next appointment of a clerk to a certain person, he would, in fact, make any different appointment whether the vacancy fell in this office or that?—I was drawing a distinction really between the Chancery Division and the Central Office.

44,384. I am thinking of the Central Office?—The Lord Chief Justice's appointments with regard to this matter are only in the Central Office. There would be no distinction between the more or less importance of the duties that the man was going to.

44,385. When you get an office in which the men who are ultimately to do your higher and semi-professional work begin their career by a long period of absolutely mechanical work, it becomes of great importance that that mechanical work shall be lessened as far as possible?—Yes, that is an opinion which I think we have expressed on this Commission.

44,386. Has there ever been an inquiry applying to all these legal departments as to whether in fact every possible means is taken to avoid routine labour by the use of more modern methods?—No, I do not think so.

44,387. Do you think such an inquiry would do good?—I think it would be a very useful thing.

44,388. You know the practice in other offices; in fact are these legal offices before or behind other businesses in using such means as typewriters, shorthand, vertical filing, and all modern appliances?—I should not like to express too positive an opinion upon the subject. You will have witnesses before you who will answer that better than I could; but my own opinion is that they are behindhand.

44,389. When you were being asked about superannuation and retirement on account of age, you told us that it was extremely difficult for you to receive information from underneath as to a man's gradual decreasing efficiency—that there was no motive on the part of men who themselves might suffer from old age later on, to report on each other. Is that so?—The tendency of natural politeness and consideration towards so old a man as I is now that they will not say anything to me.

44,390. Although you have no exact information, you think it very probable that there may be old gentlemen in the office whose efficiency has in fact for a long time steadily diminished?—That, of course, is likely to be the case.

44,391. I want to ask you whether, in your opinion, all the resources of civilisation have been used to meet that situation. Have you any time-books showing whether gentlemen who, presumably by their age, are ceasing to be very efficient, attend regularly, and all the time?—Yes, we have attendance-books just as elsewhere in the Civil Service.

44,392. If a man's sick absence becomes rather important, what happens?—If it is reported, and if it becomes serious, it eventually comes to me; and indeed there has been for many years in the Central Office, and now also in the Chancery Division, an annual report which says whether the health of the department has been good or not; and on that occasion, if anybody has been away for a considerable time, it is stated, and some remarks are made about it.

44,393. Is there any statute which would prevent that annual report being accompanied by a medical certificate from an impartial doctor as to whether the gentleman in question is likely to be able to do his duty with full efficiency?—There is no statute against it. I think it is one of those things that could be prescribed by the Lord Chancellor with the concurrence of the other appointing authorities.

44,394. Then that might be one of the resources of civilisation which has not yet been tried?—Yes; but when you say it has not yet been tried we have no regular system by which it is done, but it is in fact what happens upon the subject being brought to the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

44,395. But there is no routine method by which that comes into operation?—No.

44,396. Has an attempt ever been made to ascertain in the case of a man whose age may presumably be lessening his efficiency, what work he is in fact doing. Suddenly do you ask him: "During this last week what work have you been doing, and is your work worth 800*l.* a year?"—If you are addressing the question to me as acting for the Lord Chancellor, it very seldom would come to such a point that I should send for an old contemporary and ask him what he has been doing during the last week. If I thought things were coming to such a pass as that, I should either write to the old gentleman, whom I should probably know somewhat personally, or to the master, if I thought the master was friendly and considerate towards him, and suggest to him that it would be advisable for him to retire. That is really what takes place.

44,397. But before that you say you have a difficulty in finding out the facts, and I am asking about some possibly improved methods to find out the facts. If you have any doubt about the facts, that would be one way of finding out, would it not?—Yes, it would; but I rely upon the master to tell me. My relations with all the masters are of a most excellent character. I have no difficulty whatsoever in asking a master to come and tell me how business is going on in his division, and as to any person about whom it seems necessary to make inquiry, and I have the most complete confidence in what the master will tell me. But if things ever do come to the pass of having to bring in the Lord Chancellor's absolute power of removal, you require for that something more than a confidential conversation with the master; you require him to be prepared to make a certificate to the Lord Chancellor that in his opinion this person is no longer able to do his duties. There is great reluctance, naturally, and I will go so far as to say proper reluctance, on the part of a humane master to make the certificate that is going to bring down the guillotine upon his old servant.

44,398. But the guillotine in this case is not dismissal from the service with no salary, but dismissal with a pension on the full Civil Service scale, which pension was originally presumably intended to apply to all people whose efficiency was impaired by age?—Yes.

44,399. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Page 5 of the Return sets out the actual names of the masters and assistant masters in the Central Office. Mr. — has 1,500*l.* a year; is he the son of a judge?—Yes.

44,400. Is Mr. — the son of a judge?—Yes.

12 February 1915.]

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,401. Is Mr. — the son of a judge?—Yes.

44,402. Is Mr. — the son of a judge?—Yes.

44,403. Is Mr. — the cousin of a judge?—He is certainly a near relation of a late Lord Justice, but not a son.

44,404. Mr. —, is he the cousin of a Lord Chief Justice's wife?—I do not know.

44,405. Mr. —, is he the brother-in-law of a Lord Chief Justice?—Yes.

44,406. That accounts for seven out of the nine. As to the other two, do you know whether they are so related or not?—No, I do not know.

44,407. I have not taken the clerks of assize, or a number of other officers, the names of whom seem to suggest to me that I might find the same sort of relationship. These appointments are made by a system of rotation of the appointing parties?—There is an important qualification about that at present. I mentioned yesterday that there was a separate rotation for these greater persons, and a rotation for the lesser persons. It used to be that these appointments were made by the three appointing authorities alternately, but when that alteration of the Taxing Department was made, and all the taxing officers for the two divisions were brought into one place, there was an agreement made, that is really only an agreement from judge to judge, and does not bind successors, that the Lord Chancellor would make all the appointments in the Taxing Office, and that the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chief Justice would alternate in the Central Office. So just now those appointments in the Central Office are being made not by the Lord Chancellor.

44,408. Is it in your judgment the case that the whole system of rotation is necessarily based upon the conception that the power of appointing is a privilege and not a personal duty?—I do not think anybody who has had to do with the thing as long as I have would call it a privilege.

44,409. (Chairman.) The rotation arrangement does not apply to any offices now, except the Central Office and the Taxing Office?—That is so.

44,410. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I want to turn to some of these representations which we have received. I have a statement here called "Some criticisms of the 'present County Court System,'" by Mr. C. J. Fletcher, who is apparently an official in a county court. He refers to the fact that the registrars are paid by results, and he says they could not but be influenced by this circumstance, "though entirely sub-consciously, 'in their attitude towards such questions as judgment 'summonses and imprisonment for debt.'" The plain English of that statement is that certain of the King's subjects are imprisoned for debt owing to the existence of this system, and would not be imprisoned for debt if this system did not exist?—I daresay you can arrive at that. It does not impress my mind very much.

44,411. The lay public are somewhat sensitive on the question of the liberty of the subject?—Yes, indeed; and quite rightly.

44,412. And it is believed that imprisonment for debt on its present scale is rather a serious item in our national life?—A most abominable system. I should like to take the opportunity of saying that I think there is a good deal of truth about the fact that it is payment by results in the district registries, and that is an unfortunate feature; but I think, when you have examined other people, if you do examine them, with reference to the County Court system, you will see that it is almost impossible to suggest, with regard to the smaller courts—which are, of course, the vast majority of courts—any other system.

44,413. I come now to a statement as to the establishment of District Probate Registries, by the District Probate Registries Clerks' Association. These gentlemen suggest a system of amalgamation?—I dare say.

44,414. These gentlemen in the District Probate Registries, speaking apparently about their own members, say: "The present conditions of service in the 'District Probate Registries press very heavily on 'many of the older men, who become gradually unfitted through age or infirmity for the full and 'proper discharge of their duty; and there being now 'owing to the later decision of the Lords of the "Treasury as to pensions) no provision for them upon retirement, they reasonably endeavour to hold their positions until death. This is very detrimental to 'the Service.'" If these gentlemen, speaking of themselves, say that they become gradually unfitted through age or infirmity, and that that fact is detrimental to the Service, that again, from the point of view of the public, is somewhat serious?—Yes, undoubtedly. I think those gentlemen can hardly have considered the effect of their statement.

44,415. On page 274 of the Estimates we have a statement as to the Clerks of Assize, who apparently get from 800*l.* to 1,000*l.* a year?—One gets 1,000*l.* a year.

44,416. But we have neither there nor in this other list their names. Do you know any way in which the Commission could get their names?—Their names, I think, must be in the Law List.

44,417. (Mr. Clynes.) Is there not some committee now sitting on the question of the employment of soldiers and sailors?—There is a War Office Committee, I think.

44,418. You do not know whether the gentleman you refer to as having considerable information on this matter has given evidence before that committee?—I was referring to Mr. Sartoris, the Superintendent of the Courts. I do not know whether he has given evidence. He may have, if there is a committee sitting.

44,419. In the case of men being off duty for a considerable time through sickness, do the same conditions apply to men in legal branches of the Service as in the other branches of the Civil Service?—Practically the same.

44,420. Their salaries are continued in full?—Yes, up to a certain time. I think six months.

44,421. There is a limit?—Yes, practically there is a limit. Though it is not laid down in any regulations, it was provided for in the draft regulations which I referred to yesterday, and of which a copy will be put in, and my recollection is that in those draft regulations it is ipsissimis verbis with the regulations under the Order in Council.

44,422. (Mr. Coward.) With regard to the hours of attendance of 10 to 4, in such places, for instance, as banks especially, they have office hours of 9 to 4, and then the office is closed, and you would say the public are no longer admitted and do not go in, but the people who are there do not trot off immediately 4 o'clock comes; they have their other work to do?—I fancy that the great swell of the bank does trot off at about 4 o'clock.

44,423. Not always, but still he is not so regular in attendance as those beneath him, and I do not think you could quite compare a master of the Court, for instance, with Sir Felix Schuster as an illustration. Do you think that it might not be advantageous for the hours to be a little lengthened?—I think I said yesterday that I saw no reason why what was considered a proper day's work in the Civil Service generally should not be considered a proper day's work in the legal departments.

44,424. There is really no reason that one can see against it?—I see no reason.

44,425. (Miss Haldane.) You signified, I think, that the Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor should correspond very much to, say, the Permanent Secretary to the Foreign Office?—Yes.

44,426. And then that there should be an Under Secretary in the House of Commons, something like the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs?—Something of that kind.

44,427. He would be political, of course, and would change with the Government?—I think on the whole it would be best that he should be political, because if he is political he will have more influence with the Government of the day in giving facilities for the Bill in which he is interested in the House.

44,428. Do you think there would be work for him?—I think we should give him plenty to do.

44,429. Going back to the lunacy question, is it not the fact that the Lord Chancellor also appoints to the new Central Board, or makes certain appointments?—Yes, he appoints the legal members of the Board.

Under the statute there have to be a certain number who are lawyers with qualifications laid down of so many years' practice, or it says they must be lawyers.

44,430. Then naturally he appoints no women there?—He cannot appoint a women lawyer now because women are not admitted to the profession.

44,431. I think there are women on the Board?—Certainly.

44,432. But they are not appointed by him?—Not appointed by him.

44,433. With regard to the visitors in lunacy, I understand that the lunatics who come under this department are lunatics with property. Are some of those lunatics women?—I believe there are more women lunatics than men.

44,434. Are there any women visitors?—No.

44,435. Has it ever been considered whether there should be any women visitors?—I do not think so. The number of visitors is very small; there is one lawyer and two doctors. For a lawyer, at present, there could not be a woman visitor, because women are not admitted to the legal profession. That is not the case with the medical profession, who have lady doctors.

44,436. Has it ever been considered whether a lady doctor might be usefully appointed a visitor?—No, it has not, but there has been no opportunity to consider the question for a very long time. I think Sir James Crichton Browne was one of the visitors before I became secretary, so that his vacancy at any rate has never been considered. Dr. Nicholson was appointed in my time, but that also is a very long time ago, so there really has not been an opportunity, except in theory possibly, of considering it, and I have never heard it suggested.

44,437. Is their whole time occupied in this work?—They are what would be called whole-timers, but how many hours a day the work occupies them, it would be very difficult to say. On one day a man may make a long journey, and perhaps go to a place where there are a great number of patients to be seen; another day may be a very short journey, and so on.

44,438. Are they pensionable officers?—Yes.

44,439. (Chairman.) I see Sir James Crichton Browne was appointed in 1875, and Dr. Nicholson in 1896?—Yes.

44,440. (Mr. Shipley.) Who appoints the doctors?—The three visitors are appointed by the Lord Chancellor.

44,441. (Miss Haldane.) Does the Lord Chancellor have charge of the property of women lunatics in Scotland, or only in England?—Not in Scotland.

44,442. I suppose we shall hear later whether they are dealt with by the Scottish Board of Lunacy?—I think they are, but my evidence is of no value on the subject.

44,443. I want to know your views on the question of the employment of women in respect of the staff generally. Do you think that there are any offices which might suitably be held by women, and which have not yet been open to women in the legal departments?—I should have thought that in the Central Scrivenery Board women might certainly be employed. With regard to the other offices, I think members of the Commission know that I might be almost described as a whole-hogger upon the subject of women. I only see one difficulty with regard to admitting women into the offices of the legal departments, and that is that the whole business is connected with the law, and that the two branches of the profession of law do not admit women: so that in that respect your legal departments would not be in harmony with the practitioners who come before them, and if there is an objection or a difficulty about women being in the practising professions, I think it must at least influence the consideration of whether they could be admitted into the departments which are doing the same business from the other side of the table.

44,444. You know there is a movement towards women obtaining admission to the legal profession. Supposing that were attained at a future period, do you see any objection to women being eligible for posts in the legal departments?—Not the least. I should expect to see Mistresses of the Supreme Court in due time.

44,445. As you know, in the office of the Public Trustee, which we have already considered, the employment of women was reported very favourably upon?—Yes. The Public Trustee, I think, has as many women in the office as men.

44,446. I hear he has increased his numbers very much since we had evidence from him?—I do not think there are any women in high positions there, though I believe he, like myself, is a believer that there is no limit to the possibilities of employing women usefully in departments of that kind.

44,447. Is typing very much used throughout the departments? I see typists are mentioned in certain departments and not in others?—My impression is that it is very little used, and I gave an answer to that effect to Mr. Graham Wallas; but I must not be taken as being prepared to answer precisely.

44,448. Judging from the returns which we have, very few typists are mentioned, and it struck me that there might be very suitable and proper openings for more women typists in different departments?—I think that is very likely.

44,449. There are certain women attendants appointed by the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls alternately in the Royal Courts of Justice?—Yes. Provision has to be made for female witnesses who may be kept waiting a long time, not knowing when they will be called into Court; and when the staff of the Royal Courts of Justice was established and the present Royal Courts of Justice were built, we thought four women ought to be there so as to look after the witnesses while they are kept waiting.

44,450. I wondered why it was only in the Royal Courts of Justice. There do not appear to be any in the other Courts, judging by our returns?—What other Courts do you refer to?

44,451. The County Courts, or the Divorce Court?—The Divorce Court is in the Royal Courts of Justice. There is also the Bankruptcy Court sitting in Bankruptcy Buildings, and I do not think there is any female attendant there, but I am not quite sure.

44,452. With regard to the messengers, you will remember our recommendations about the pensioner messengers in our previous report?—Yes.

44,453. Would you approve of those recommendations being carried into effect with regard to certain of these messengers?—I can see no reason why any difference should be made.

44,454. It was said: "We think the Treasury should insist on vacancies in the existing establishments as they arise being filled from this force, except in exceptional cases, on sufficient reason shown in each case." Would you agree to that?—I see no reason why that should be excluded, though under existing circumstances the Treasury could not insist, because there are these various appointing authorities. It could only be put, I think, in the form of a recommendation—supposing the appointments are left as they are—from a high authority like this Commission that it ought to be considered.

44,455. That that should be the system on which messengers should be appointed in future.—Yes. As I tried to qualify some of my other answers, I do not wish to say too much about my personal view with regard to these matters. I put my name to the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and I see no reason in the nature of our Service why that should not apply to it. I do not feel quite certain at the moment, not having considered it before, as to what effect that might have upon our Service. If you examine Mr. Sartoris you might, perhaps, see if he thinks there is anything in the conditions of our Service that would make the recommendation of the Royal Commission inapplicable.

44,456. (Sir John Kempe.) I should like to supplement Miss Haldane's first question, as to your proposal that an under-secretary should be appointed to represent the legal departments in Parliament. I do not quite gather from your answers to Mr. Boutwood whether your idea is that this officer should sit in the offices of the Supreme Court?—No, I do not think it is necessary for him to have anything to do with it. I think he should merely be a representative in Parliament, whose duty it would be to take charge of questions or Bills relating to the legal departments, and I do not look upon him as necessarily a salaried officer at all. I think it would be something that would be given to the class of persons who do undertake that sort of work now without salary, but if anybody wished to give him a salary I should not like to raise any objection. I hope it will not be upon the estimates of the Supreme Court, because my interest is to keep them down.

Sir KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,457. His duty would be confined to departmental questions?—Yes.

44,458. He would not touch the administration of law, of course?—No, not in that way.

44,459. That means that the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General must still answer in the House of Commons on questions of administration of the law?—If it was any question which would be addressed to the Lord Chancellor himself, if he could sit in the House of Commons, I think it would be the best way that this member I refer to should get his instructions from the Lord Chancellor as to what answer he should give (which is what an under-secretary now does with his chief in any of the other great departments), and answer accordingly. You see a difficulty arises when a question is asked in the House of Commons. There the Attorney-General is asked the question, and he comes and consults the Lord Chancellor. They probably agree as to what they should say, but the Lord Chancellor cannot say to the Attorney-General: "You are to say so and so." We want somebody who is more in that position. There is a material difference between the man whom you can ask: "Would you mind saying so and so; that is what I should like you to say," and having a subordinate who comes and says: "Please sir, what am I to say?"

44,460. Then he would do no more than the law officers can do now between them?—There is that difference, a difference perhaps a little difficult to describe, but one which is easy to feel between a person who is your officer, and to whom you can say: "Do this," and he doeth it, and a person who is only kind enough to take the trouble for the convenience of the House of Commons to answer the question.

44,461. The same thing, of course, applies to many other departments now?—Does it?

44,462. To minor offices, such as the Record Office, the Charity Commission, and so on?—No, not the Charity Commission; they have a representative. I do not think you could ask that everything that may be called a department should have a member of the House of Commons to itself, but the legal departments and the whole jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor is a very great affair, and would correspond to the Foreign Office and the Home Office and the great departments of the State. It is the only great department of the State which has nobody to speak for it officially and as a matter of duty in the House of Commons. That is the double disadvantage—that the Lord Chancellor has no officer of his own to say what he wishes said in the House of Commons, and the House of Commons has nobody whom it can get at with regard to the offices. If a question is more or less critical or important, the answer is given by the Attorney-General, or the Secretary to the Treasury, or whoever it is, and they communicate with the Lord Chancellor.

44,463. Is not there this difference between the legal department and the ordinary administrative departments of the State, that, as a general rule, it is the subject-matter which the department administers that has to be looked after in the House of Commons and not the department itself. In this case you propose to have a representative to answer for your department only, and not the subject-matter, which is the administration of the law?—I think where any question could be properly answered about the administration of the law in the House of Commons there is no reason why this suggested representative should not answer it.

44,464. Early in your evidence you said that the anomalies which formerly appeared in the departments are now completely worked out. I noticed in the estimates there are a great many notes still to this effect: This office and salary will be reconsidered on a vacancy," repeated continually throughout the estimates of the Royal Courts of Justice. There are about 20 or 30 offices to be reconsidered on a vacancy?—I do not think those cases apply to a person appointed before the Judicature Act. I think they are cases of more recent appointments. It generally arises in this way: The Treasury consent to what is recommended, but reserve to themselves a right of discussing the subject over again when next there is an opportunity. In that case a note of that sort would be put in.

44,465. Then each of those offices represents in fact some special duty?—Probably. It is very difficult to say offhand.

44,466. They are offices which may not be continued on a vacancy?—No. Probably a note would not be put in there without the consent of the Lord Chancellor, and therefore it would mean that the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury both agree that whenever a vacancy occurs this matter is going to be talked over again. Being a note on the Estimates it generally arises over a question of money, though there may be other considerations; there may be some intention of putting the duties elsewhere, or putting other duties upon them on a vacancy.

44,467. It sometimes refers to numbers on the staff?—There may be, but it may mean that the Treasury have consented to the arrangement on condition of it being discussed again on an opportunity occurring, or, at any rate, it may be that the Lord Chancellor has said—as it probably would be a question of a reduction coming from the Treasury—"Well, I agree to a reduction on this occasion, but if on the occasion of a further vacancy other duties are added to the office, I expect more money to be paid, and therefore I reserve my right to raise the question again on a vacancy"; but it may come either way.

44,468. I did not quite gather from your answer to Mr. Wallas whether you thought on the whole the system of uniformity of scales of salary for the whole of the Supreme Court has worked out satisfactorily. I see in the various memorials we have before us almost every department complains and gives some different reason. Therefore the system seems to operate unequally?—I have not seen these representations, and I do not know on what grounds the different clerks may put it.

44,469. I should have thought that if the system of the same scale were working well, there would be one memorial from all the different offices taking up the same complaints, but they are all different?—I do not know anything about the documents you refer to. There was a great deal of personal difficulty in establishing these scales when they were established 30 years ago, because we had to force the existing men into our new system, and it was sometimes rather difficult to do so.

44,470. I understood from you that the duties are such as could be mastered by a man of ordinary ability?—Yes, I think so, speaking in a general way.

44,471. Therefore there is no occasion to look out for special attainments when you first appoint to the office, as they could be acquired as time goes on?—Yes; on the whole and in the majority of cases I think it is desirable that the man should have had previous training in some legal office; but I do think it is better to have a leaven of a higher class of man—that type of man who does not allow himself to be too much crushed by routine, to which Mr. Graham Wallas alludes, but a man who, if he is in an office before very long absorbs whatever there is going about. I do not think that in our departments there is great difficulty in a man doing that. I think he has opportunities which are not afforded to him in many of the departments of the Civil Service which have come under our observation.

44,472. I notice before the Committee of 1886 some of the witnesses were asked as to the possibility of a man getting up the work of almost all the different departments, and Mr. Gardiner, whose evidence I read specially, was very clear that the men ought to be interchanged between the offices so that any man could pick up the duties of any one of the offices?—I had forgotten he said that.

44,473. Would the same thing apply now?—That I think would apply now, and at present, under the administration of the existing masters, interchangeability is going on to a great extent, and I believe with great advantage.

SIR KENNETH AUGUSTUS MUIR MACKENZIE, G.C.B., K.C.

44,474. In that case, would there be an objection to the same classes of men being put into the legal offices as are put into the rest of the Civil Service?—I see how you arrive at that, but I can only say that I think the most desirable class of fellows—the men who are most likely to profit and be able to learn by going about from one department to another—are those who have from the earliest practicable age been engaged in that class of business in other legal offices.

44,475. Do you have a probationary year?—Yes.

44,476. Do you reject after probation?—I do not recollect any case of a man being rejected after probation.

44,477. Or any case of a man you would have wished to reject?—In that way it may almost be called a dead letter, not because it is actually dead, but because I do not think we have ever had a case where it was necessary to reject a man.

44,478. (Mr. Shipley.) A question or two about your staff in the House of Lords. Do you have several clerks working under you?—Very few.

44,479. Are they overworked?—Certainly very much overworked when crises I have referred to, like a general election, take place. If you examine one of them I think they would say that I gave them sometimes an unreasonable amount of work, but I do not think they would put it at all in the form of complaint—I do not think there is the smallest spirit of that sort.

44,480. About how much of their total work is due to ecclesiastical patronage?—That is the work of the private secretary. The ecclesiastical business is divided into two parts: There is what is called the patronage—that is, the question whether you shall appoint the Rev. Brown or the Rev. Jones. There are also a large number of questions that may be called permanent questions, relating to the exchange of livings, dealing with the glebes, releases, and things of that kind, which require the Lord Chancellor's approval—questions of every sort and kind regarding the livings which are in the gift of the Lord Chancellor—that are not questions depending very much on the personality of the clergyman, and are not in any sense spiritual questions but temporal questions, which are in the permanent department. Before my time the secretary, who was called the Lord Chancellor's Secretary of Presentations, was an officer whose position was regulated by the statute of, I think, 1852, and his salary was regulated by that statute, and he had duties to perform which were personal to the Lord Chancellor, and also the other class of duties that I refer to. All those permanent and statutory duties were transferred to the Clerk of the Crown when the alterations in the department were made, and those duties are carried on under my superintendence by a small staff of clerks.

44,481. How many livings has the Lord Chancellor to present to?—I do not remember at this moment—hundreds.

44,482. I think they are most of them pretty poor ones?—Mostly very poor. Anybody who talks about ecclesiastical patronage requires to consider what he is talking about. The ecclesiastical patronage of the Lord Chancellor is a great duty to find clergymen who are fit and proper persons for very poor livings. I have nothing to do with patronage, absolutely nothing.

44,483. Is not there a great deal of waste of the judges' time because they cannot find out very closely how much crime there will be at certain assizes? For instance, last month the judge at Cambridge was quite unhappy because his time was wasted owing to the small number of cases to be tried?—It is very difficult indeed to estimate the amount of time. Every kind of device has been tried in my time to get over the difficulty. The present system practically is that an average is struck of the number of days that the business of a circuit is found to require, and then there is a complete scheme for the assizes founded upon that principle. Then, before a circuit is going to take place, the judge consults with his clerk of assize (his principal officer), who has got all the information about what cases have been up to that time set down, and on the basis of that he has power to alter the number of days. But he is subject to the habits and the convenience of the circuit town before and the circuit town afterwards, and it is really quite impossible for him to tell whether on the one hand he may have a day or two to spare, or, on the other hand, whether he may have to sit day after day from 10 o'clock in the morning till 8 or even 9 o'clock at night (which is very bad for him and very bad for everybody else); or have to put off the day of the Commission at the next assizes, which is a most unfortunate thing to do if he can possibly avoid it, because it may upset everything not only at that place but at every subsequent place on the circuit. On the whole, I think the best opinion is that it is desirable to run the risk of occasionally a day, or two or three days, not being occupied at one place, rather than to multiply the occasions when the judge either sits too long or has to alter the arrangements elsewhere. The judge can come back to London and sit in Court and take cases, and there are always cases ready; but, on the whole, even that is not worth very much. Fixed arrangements having been made, and parties having reason to expect that their case will be taken at such and such a time, and counsel and solicitors having made their arrangements accordingly, it is not on the whole worth while that a judge should suddenly rush in and say: "I will take that case to-morrow." The small amount of time—because, on the whole, it is only a small amount—which is not occupied (I will not use the word "wasted") in consequence of what you say, does not really make it worth while to work the circuit judge's time in with the arrangements in London.

44,484. (Chairman.) There is one further point I should like to ask you about. When vacancies occur in any of the legal offices, is there any arrangement by which the necessity of the post in question is considered before it is filled?—There is a section in the Judicature Act on that very subject. When a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court notice has to be given by the senior officer of the department to the Lord Chancellor and to the Treasury, and they have absolute power to do anything they choose with the office for a month. There was a Bill, one of the Bills of the class I referred to, brought in again and again (and it perished amongst the other "innocents"), which extended that clause by getting rid of the limit of a month, and saying that no appointment could be filled until the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury gave leave for it to be filled. There have been occasions, though very few, when the month has elapsed and the appointing authority, not being the Lord Chancellor, has said, with perfect right, "There is the vacancy. I have the right to appoint to it, and I shall appoint."

44,485. But, ordinarily speaking, the interval of a month secured in that way is enough to give the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury the opportunity of considering the position of the department?—Yes. Generally the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor are aware beforehand that there are questions to be decided about that office whenever it should become vacant; therefore, it does not often take them by surprise, though it cannot be said that no such case has ever arisen. On the whole, the relations between the Lord Chancellor and the other appointing authorities is such that it is not at all likely to happen that any difficulty would arise as to whether the office was to be modified or not.

44,486. (Mr. Boutwood.) Mr. Graham Wallas yesterday seemed to be on the track of a gentleman of 95 years of age. In the Bankruptcy Department (Companies Winding-up) there is a Mr. J. Brougham who was appointed on 11th April, 1845. If this statistical table be right, he must be very near that age?—Mr. Brougham is a gentleman of great age, and it is one of those instances that make it so difficult to recommend with absolute confidence a limit of age. Mr. Brougham has always been a most-efficient registrar. He is the senior Registrar in Bankruptcy.

(Chairman.) We shall probably have him as a witness. The Commission desire to thank you, Sir Kenneth, for your most valuable evidence.

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE, called and examined.

44,487. (Chairman.) You are one of the registrars of the Principal Probate Registry?—Yes.

44,488. Will you kindly tell us what offices you held before your appointment as registrar?—I was appointed a clerk in the registry in 1872. Then I was promoted to the second class, and I was attached to the then senior registrar, Mr. Middleton, who had been senior registrar for a good many years; and in 1893 I was appointed registrar.

44,489. You have held the post of registrar since 1893?—Yes.

44,490. You are now the second registrar?—I am.

44,491. First of all will you tell us broadly what work comes to the Probate Registry, including the District Probate Registries. Is it the case that all wills and all estates for which administration is sought have to go to the Probate Registry or a District Probate Registry before probate or administration is granted?—All grants of probate and administration issue either from the Principal Registry or the District Probate Registries.

44,492. And no estates can be dealt with or administered under a will without a grant?—No estates in England or Wales can be dealt with without a grant. That is the operation of the jurisdiction of the Probate Court in England.

44,493. What number of estates go through the registry in a year?—I have the return for the year 1913, when there were 37,578 grants in the Principal Registry, and in the district registries there were 34,489.

44,494. That is, roughly, 70,000 grants divided half and half between the Central Registry and the provincial registries?—Yes, rather more in the Principal Registry.

44,495. Does that include the grants in the case of small estates?—Yes.

44,496. I observe in the judicial statistics that the grants in small estates are stated separately. Is that figure included in the figure you have given of the total estates dealt with?—The figure must be included. I do not at the moment know why the small estates are stated separately in those statistics.

44,497. Is there a difference of procedure in the case of small estates?—No. I suppose the figure was wanted for some purpose by the compilers of the statistics for the Home Office.

44,498. Is there any procedure by which very small estates can be dealt with without coming to the Probate Registry at all?—No grants can be made without coming to the Probate Registries. The post offices have certain facilities for paying small sums out without the production of a grant. Application may be made through an Inland Revenue office, but it is forwarded on to the personal application department or to the District Registrar.

44,499. And the work of dealing with the applications for probate or administration is the greater part of the work of the registry?—It is the greater part of the clerical work, but not of the registrar's work—that is to say, in the Principal Registry.

44,500. Apart from that which is non-contentious, there is also contentious work connected with probate?—All the business connected with the Court either in probate or matrimonial causes.

44,501. That, broadly, is the division of the work of the registry—the major part of the clerical work is dealing with the grants of probate or administration?—And of course filing away the documents and recording them afterwards.

44,502. All operations connected with that work?—Yes.

44,503. And the smaller part is the contentious work in the Court of Probate or Matrimonial Causes?—Yes, including ex-parte applications and motions to the Court and that sort of thing.

44,504. In connection with the non-contentious probate work, every will has to be presented to the Probate Registry with a copy prepared by the solicitor who presents it?—Yes.

44,505. The original will is preserved in the registry?—Yes; that is provided for by the statute.

44,506. Where the will is preserved in a district probate registry is a copy of it preserved in the Central Registry?—Copies of all wills proved in the district registries are forwarded to the Principal Registry and preserved there.

44,507. An alphabetical calendar is prepared, I think?—It is a lexicographical calendar prepared of all grants in the registries—not a separate one for the Principal Registry.

44,508. That is a record of grants made by all the registries?—Yes.

44,509. That is prepared by the central registry?—Yes, that is prepared in the Principal Registry.

44,510. So that the operations may be broadly divided into the receipt of the papers for the purpose of obtaining the grant, the operations in connection with the giving of the grant, and the operations connected with the custody, preservation, and accessibility of wills and other documents after the grant?—Yes.

44,511. Does that give a fairly complete account on broad lines of the nature of the work which comes to the registry?—Broadly, except with regard to the preparation of the grant. That also includes the examination of the will, dealing with the question of its validity, and others of that kind. Before the preparation of the papers the clerks of Seats have to see that the will is duly executed, and whether there are any documents incorporated, or whether the alterations have been properly attested.

44,512. They have to verify the validity of the will so far as regards its execution?—Yes, and, if it is a question of foreign domicile, they have to see whether the will is made validly according to the testator's domicile at the time of the death. All those questions have to be dealt with in the "Seats" before the grants can be prepared.

44,513. You have prepared and handed to us a more detailed statement of the work, showing in what departments the work connected with those operations you have described is carried out. Perhaps you will put that in for the use of the Commission?—This is only a comparatively short account of the work. I can give it in more detail if desired (handing in the statement).*

44,514. You begin with the work of the registrars, and you mention that one of the registrars is in attendance at the courts on the hearing of probate actions and matrimonial causes, and also in the Appeal Court. Do the registrars take that duty in rotation?—Three of the registrars take it in rotation. The senior registrar, as a rule, does not attend the court.

44,515. Is that duty continuous?—One registrar attends for the sittings, and another registrar attends the next sittings.

44,516. For what portion of the year do the sittings continue?—It is the same as the general sittings of the Law Courts. I am in attendance now, and I shall be there up till Easter. After Easter, for the next sittings, another registrar will be in attendance.

44,517. And the Court sits for probate and matrimonial business practically every day during the term?—Every day during the term.

44,518. And sometimes there are two courts sitting?—Sometimes there are two courts sitting in connection with our business. We have two judges, the President and Mr. Justice Baggallay Deane, who is often hearing Admiralty cases, but when there is no Admiralty work there are two courts sitting to deal with probate and divorce cases.

44,519. When two courts are sitting, what is the arrangement?—I have to be in one, and my clerk in the other.

44,520. Does it frequently occur that two courts are sitting?—It does frequently occur. It happened yesterday and the day before that two courts were sitting. It just depends upon the Admiralty work.

44,521. Referring to the judicial statistics again, I see that the number of days on which the courts sat, counting the days when two courts sat as two days, amounted to an average of 251. May that be taken as a fair average at the present time? That was for the five years 1908 to 1912?—I presume that was correct at the time it was made up.

* Vide Appendix XCV.

MR. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

44,522. That figure would seem to show that it must be comparatively infrequent for the two courts to be sitting at once?—Not very, because the sittings would not amount to 251 days.

44,523. How many days do the sittings amount to?—If you exclude the Long Vacation and the Easter and Christmas vacations and 52 Sundays there are considerably less than 250 days.

44,524. (Mr. Coward.) Off-hand I think it is somewhere about 140 or 150 days, or something like that number?—It would not amount to anything like 251 days.

44,525. (Chairman.) Your statement gives some details of the work of the registrars who are not sitting in court. Does much of that work consist, as we have been told the work of the masters in the Central Office consists, of work of a judicial character? Does it imply making decisions of a judicial character?—Certainly, a great many.

44,526. Is that over points arising on contentious proceedings before they come to trial?—Not always before a trial. There are questions of variation of settlement and maintenance; alimony would be before trial. Questions of ownership of property are referred to us under the Married Women's Property Act.

44,527. Are they questions which are referred to the registrars by the Court, or which come to the registrars under the rules?—They are referred to the registrars by the Court, and we have to take the evidence of the parties to the dispute and hear counsel.

44,528. As regards the work which the registrars do on the non-contentious side, do they, in signing grants, take any detailed responsibility for them. Do they examine into the grants, or do they take them on the responsibility of the clerk of the Seat?—We do not undertake to find out clerical mistakes. A simple grant ought not to require much examination to see the grant is a proper grant. If there are complicated grants we go into them closely. We could not examine every grant closely; there are about 130 which we have to sign during the day. We see that they are proper forms of grant, that the title is proper, and that they are properly initialed by the clerk of the Seats—all those things we look at.

44,529. In difficult cases if the clerk of the Seats is in doubt, does he refer to the registrar?—Yes, there is one registrar in attendance specially every day for seeing any of the solicitors or the public, and to deal with any cases referred from the Seats.

44,530. Then the clerks of the Seats and their staff are the people who deal with the substance of the applications for grants of probate and administration?—Yes.

44,531. How is the work distributed between them?—There are six Seats, where the work is divided according to the initial letters of the name of the deceased person. They are alphabetical divisions. In each Seat there is a principal clerk with four assistants. The senior assistant practically helps in the work of the principal clerk in the Seat, and does a portion of his work. They go through the cases, the more simple ones being done by the assistants.

44,532. In a simple case does the clerk of the Seat accept the grant on the assistant's report?—The first assistant would refer it to the clerk of the Seat if there was any difficulty, but if it is quite a simple case he will have authority to deal with it as he would when the principal clerk of the Seat is away on leave when the second assistant has to take charge of the Seat.

44,533. Does he initial it or does the actual clerk of the Seat initial the grant?—The first assistant initials it in the absence of the clerk of the Seat.

44,534. He has authority to initial?—Yes.

44,535. With regard to the junior clerks, who are in the third class, is their work quite distinct from the work of the assistants who are in the second class?—It is distinct from the work of the first assistant.

44,536. But apart from the first assistants the work of the juniors is not distinguishable?—They have to prepare the grants and records and search caveat books, and prepare memoranda for the printed calendar and forward it on to the other departments.

44,537. I think your statement as regards the other departments into which the work is divided explains in sufficient detail the system for the present purposes of the Commission?—There is one thing I omitted to say with regard to registrars, and that is as to the hearing of summonses. We hear summonses in the same way as the masters do.

44,538. What is the nature of the summonses you hear?—Summonses as to particulars, discovery, and all those sort of questions, and interrogatories arising in the course of probate and divorce proceedings.

44,539. Are those points which go to the registrars under the Rules of Court, or are they specially referred to them by the Court?—Under the Rules of the Court. They also hear motions in certain cases in vacation, and that is I think under the powers of the surrogate by the transfer of the old Ecclesiastical Courts. Certain matters on motion, in the absence of the judge, and during the long vacation when the judge is away, are heard by the registrar.

44,540. Matters which in term would be heard by the judge?—Yes.

44,541. With regard to the registrar's clerk, you mentioned that the registrar sits in court and when there are two courts his clerk sits in the second court?—Yes.

44,542. When there is only one court sitting what does the registrar's clerk do?—The clerk sits in the same court with the registrar; the registrar very often is required to see solicitors, and has appointments in the room at the back. He cannot be the whole time in court.

44,543. And in that case the clerk takes his place in court?—Yes.

44,544. The registrar's clerk's duties are considerably varied and important?—They want a general knowledge of all the work of the registry to be of real use to the registrar.

44,545. They act as personal assistants to the registrars?—Yes. They have to draw up all the orders made on summonses when the registrar is hearing summonses, and on taxation they go through the bill and see that it is properly brought in. They have to look through divorce papers when brought in for the registrar's certificate, to see that the pleadings are in order. They also check the certificates on the grants as to the property set out in the Inland Revenue Affidavit before the registrar signs. There are innumerable duties that they have to do in the way of assisting the registrar before actual documents are signed.

44,546. Are they specially selected from the general staff?—Those are selected to be registrars' clerks who are likely to be suitable and intelligent.

44,547. (Mr. Coward.) Are they first class clerks that you are dealing with now?—No, they are clerks who have been represented by the President and Lord Gorell as clerks who ought to be in the second class, but they have only been allowed to be in the third class.

44,548. (Chairman.) What is the method of making the appointments of clerks in the registry?—They are first of all nominated by the President, and then they are sent to the Civil Service Commissioners to obtain a certificate. On the certificate being obtained they are appointed by the president.

44,549. The President keeps a list of candidates I suppose?—Yes, for nomination.

44,550. Are any steps taken to notify or advertise vacancies?—I do not think so. It would be done by the President. It is not done in the registry, and I think he has quite sufficient applicants. He has a long list of candidates for the vacancies.

44,551. By whom is the list of candidates kept?—By his secretary at the court. We do not have a list at the registry at all.

44,552. Is that his personal clerk?—His personal secretary. He is an official secretary—Mr. Pilcher, at the present moment.

44,553. If the list is not kept in the registry, perhaps you are not familiar with the method of dealing with candidates?—I should not like to say how the President deals with his list of candidates.

12 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

44,554. You are not aware what steps are taken to ascertain the qualifications of the candidates?—Their references in all cases may be inquired into.

44,555. Does the President consult the registrars or the senior registrar with regard to appointments?—Not with regard to initial appointments, but only with regard to promotion.

44,556. Are the initial appointments invariably to the third class?—Always to the third class.

44,557. Do you consider the result, as regards the quality of the candidates appointed, to be satisfactory?—I think very satisfactory.

44,558. You are quite satisfied with the appointments?—Quite satisfied.

44,559. Have the candidates appointed, as a rule, had any previous legal experience?—Not many. A few have been called to the Bar, and a few have passed as solicitors, but they are very few.

44,560. What is the usual age on appointment? I think the age limits are 20 to 30?—Yes; and I think it would be better really if they were allowed to come in a little younger—18 to 30—because the promotion is so slow in the lower class that they get old before they have a chance of getting on to the higher work.

44,561. Have they, in fact, been appointed at a rather higher age?—You cannot find several people exactly 20. Sometimes they are appointed at 22 or 23.

44,562. In some cases the candidates are appointed at an age approaching the higher limit?—Not often. Those cases are exceptional.

44,563. But you would be in favour of appointment at a lower age than 20?—I think the limit ought to be rather lower than 20, and the result would be that the largest number of appointments would be somewhere about the age of 19 or 20.

44,564. I gather from that that you do not attach importance to any previous professional experience?—Not for the third class. I think you want someone who has been well educated, and is intelligent and able to learn his work quickly.

44,565. A candidate of that kind of good general intelligence and good education can perfectly well learn the work of the registry?—Certainly.

44,566. As regards the work of the registry, would the experience that a candidate had had in a solicitor's office be of any particular advantage?—He would be rather better at the beginning, but I do not know that he would have an enormous advantage.

44,567. When working in a solicitor's office, probably no large part of his experience would have related to that particular work which comes to the Probate Registry?—That is so.

44,568. So you would attach much more importance to the general education and intelligence of the candidate than to any previous experience?—Certainly.

44,569. As regards appointments to the higher posts, I understand that no appointments are made direct to the higher classes, including the principal clerks of Seats?—No, they are all filled up by promotion.

44,570. In the case of the registrars themselves, are their posts as a rule filled by promotion, or are appointments made direct?—Are you referring to the Principal Registry or the District Registries?

44,571. The Principal Registry.—I think I have been the only instance of an appointment from the staff.

44,572. I see two of the registrars were district registrars before appointment.—Two were district registrars, and I think they were both barristers before. The senior registrar also was a barrister.

44,573. The two other junior registrars had not served in the Principal Registry before becoming district registrars?—No.

44,574. Is there any legal qualification for appointment as registrar—any statutory qualification?—They must either be a barrister or a solicitor, or a clerk in the Principal Registry after five years' service.

44,575. So the road of promotion to a registrarship is open to clerks provided they are highly qualified persons?—Yes, it is open.

44,576. As regards the question of appointment, two suggestions have been put before the Commission with reference to appointments to third class clerkships in a legal office: (1) that appointments should be made by open competition; (2) that they should be made not by the individual appointment of the head of the division on his own responsibility solely, but that there should be a responsible committee which should place recommendations as to candidates before the President. With regard to the first of those suggestions as to appointments to the third class by open competition, what would be your view?—I think the present system much more likely to produce satisfactory clerks to suit our department. I do not think it is necessary to have somebody with enormous cleverness or able to pass a high degree; they are not so likely to do the work well. To start with, there is a great deal of mechanical work, and anybody so very clever and superior will not take the trouble to do it.

44,577. In fact, you think by open competition you will get too high intellectual qualifications?—Not in all cases, because you get them both. You get some highly intellectual in passing certain points of the examination, but you want really somebody who is well educated, intelligent, able to understand how to do the work, and who is a gentleman. Such a man makes the better clerk for us.

44,578. Have you any reason to think that open competition for other offices has not produced candidates of general intelligence and education?—I would not express an opinion about any other office. Why I mention it with regard to our office is this: There is a very large lower class—the third class—and of the successful candidates under open competition, the people who pass best, and who are entitled to get a good place, would not come to us to begin with; we should only get the inferior clerks.

44,579. Perhaps in that answer you are assuming that it would be the same examination as the examination for the higher class of the Civil Service in general. That is not a necessary assumption; there might be a separate competition?—If it were not, we should get a lower class of clerk than we do now.

44,580. What reason is there to think that if you had an open competition you would get a different class competing from those who now apply for appointment under present conditions?—I think the average clerks, if it was open competition, who would be satisfied with the lower rate of pay which they have to take when coming into our office, would, in general, not average so high as the persons now appointed, a great many of whom have been to the university. We should not get that class of man if it was open competition.

44,581. But if the pay attracts them under present conditions, why should it fail to attract them if the entrance was by open competition?—Well, I have expressed my view, and I cannot say more.

44,582. If open competition has yielded results which have been considered satisfactory in the case of men in the Civil Service in general, both in the higher and the intermediate and lower grades, is there anything special in the work of the Probate Registry which would render that general principle inapplicable?—I was not taking it as an accepted fact that in all the other branches it was satisfactory. I only want to express an opinion with regard to my own department.

44,583. It has been taken as an accepted fact to this extent, that it is the method which has been applied practically in all other departments, with one or two exceptions?—Like most other things, it has some advantages and some disadvantages.

44,584. But you are not prepared to indicate any special circumstances in the work of the Probate Registry which would render it entirely distinct from the general body of Civil Service work?—The only sort of distinction I could draw is, as I have already said, that there is a large lower class with a good deal of mechanical work to go through in the first instance, and it is out of that class we have to pick a certain number of people who are capable of doing better work, and a few able to do quite high-class work. It is not as if we could be satisfied with a lower class man all round; that we do not want, and the whole of the work is not good enough to get the higher class in an open competitive examination. For this particular sort of office with a large lower class and a lot of mechanical work, and a few higher places for which they have to be selected and work up to, I think the present system is by far the best.

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

44,585. Your objection to open competition is that in the first place you would get too good a class of men for the mechanical work?—If we got too good a class of men they would be discontented with the lower class of work and would not do it, and it would result in our getting a class of men not so good as at present.

44,586. And such men would not be good enough for promotion to the higher places?—Yes.

44,587. Are not those two objections somewhat incompatible with one another? You can hardly get too low a class and too high a class at the same time?—I think you get now the sort of man who is more suitable—who is well educated, but not so clever as to be dissatisfied with doing mere elementary work.

44,588. As to the other suggestion which has been made of a responsible committee, including probably the head of the department—in this case, I presume, the senior registrar—to lay before the President recommendations as to candidates, the ultimate responsibility for appointment remaining with him, which would be your view as to a system of that kind. Do you consider that it would have advantages over the present system or not?—I do not think it would help much; what sort of test would be proposed?

44,589. I presume if a committee of that sort were created then the list of candidates would be accessible to them, and they would be able to obtain any information they desired about them, and probably interview the candidate personally, and would lay before the President their opinion of the respective candidates, the President not being necessarily bound to follow their advice?—I do not think there has been any occasion requiring it. I do not say anything against the system.

44,590. Is it not possible that that would produce greater continuity in the system of appointment?—As far as it has worked, I think the present system has worked very well.

44,591. As regards the question of promotion, on what principle is promotion made?—Promotion from the third class into the second class is by seniority and efficiency—that is, the senior, unless there is some reason against it, or some special claim on the part of another one, would be promoted. From the second class to the first class or to the post of Chief Clerk of the Seat, we should also have to consider a man's fitness for the special post which may be vacant.

44,592. As a matter of practice are clerks ever passed over for promotion from third class to second?—Occasionally. Sometimes if complaints have been made they have been passed over, and sometimes they are passed over because they do not want to be promoted. That is not often, but there is one now who is at the top, who specially did not want to be promoted; he wanted to remain in his department.

44,593. Was that because he had congenial work, which he did not want to leave?—I do not know the reason, but he specially asked not to be promoted.

44,594. At present is he the only one who has been passed over?—He is the only one. It has been done sometimes in the case of one or two vacancies, and then they have been promoted afterwards.

44,595. Are there any cases of passing over in the case of promotion from the second to the first class?—Yes, a great many. It depends where the vacancy in the first class is, as to who may be qualified to fill it. There was a promotion from the Personal Application Department a short time ago, when a principal clerk of the Seat was appointed, and his place was taken by a clerk, who was promoted because none of the senior ones were qualified to take the head of the Personal Application Department.

44,596. That was the case of a man being qualified for particular work?—Where the vacancy was in the first class. If the vacancy had been one of the positions in the Calendar Department, or somewhere where the work is not so important, one of the others might have been promoted.

44,597. Who makes the promotions?—The President makes the promotions, but he consults the senior registrar.

44,598. What steps does the senior registrar take to ascertain the relative merits of the men?—They are known as they deal with the work of the department; he is in perpetual touch with them.

44,599. He has sufficient personal touch?—Cases are reported upon. There are great differences in some of the work. Every junior clerk has an opportunity of learning the work of the Personal Application Department or the Seats. If he does not choose to take it he may have difficulty in getting promoted into the Seats later on. They all have an opportunity at an early stage, only at first the work there is rather more heavy, and they are kept late, and they do not always like it when they are juniors, and they go to some other of the departments where they do not learn so much and where they have less work to do.

44,600. Are the junior clerks transferred freely from one department to another?—The junior clerks are not actually appointed to departments; but if they do not take advantage of their opportunity of getting into a department which is likely to lead to promotion, then if they want to get in afterwards they are ousting other people.

44,601. Does it depend upon personal choice to some extent which department they go into?—It depends upon the seniority of the junior clerks. A certain number are in the Seats Department, and when a vacancy occurs you go down the lists, and it is those coming on below the last junior in the department who have the opportunity of going. If they object to going sometimes it may lead to their being passed over later on.

44,602. Does that mean that there is a certain recognised seniority between the different departments?—No; I mean, assuming there is a vacancy in one of the Seats and we want a clerk for a junior clerk, we should go down the third class until we got to the lowest name who was at the present time in the department or in a certain department. The next senior one, if well spoken of, and recommended by the head of the department where he is doing the work, would have the opportunity of moving.

44,603. Then there is a question of seniority between the departments. The Seats are recognised as being the proper place for the more senior of the third class clerks, and you give them an opportunity in order of seniority of going into the Seats Department?—There are certain departments, such as the Seats and Personal Application, where they learn better-class work, and there is the registrar's clerk's work also.

44,604. Those are regarded as more important than the other branches?—Yes, all those; but certain work in certain departments is considered more likely to lead to promotion because, when it comes to a question of filling up the appointment in the first class, you cannot appoint somebody who is not able to take the head of the department.

44,605. As between the other departments which are of less importance, are clerks moved about from one to another?—They are all transferable.

44,606. Do you make it a principle to move a clerk about so that he may learn the work of the whole department?—He should try to learn as much as possible. They cannot learn very much if they are in the strong-room all day looking after wills.

44,607. That is merely getting out and putting back documents, I suppose?—Yes.

44,608. Perhaps I am anticipating a subsequent part of your evidence, but I understand that the clerks in the Principal Registry are not infrequently appointed to District Registrarships?—Yes; they are from time to time.

44,609. So that may be regarded as another outlet of promotion to some extent for the clerks in the Central Registry?—It helps promotion enormously.

44,610. Those appointments rest with the President of the Division?—They rest with the President entirely.

44,611. Can you say in what proportion of the cases a clerk from the Principal Registry is appointed?—It is rather difficult to say just lately, because in some of the last appointments the President has shifted certain District Registrars. He has appointed one to another post, and filled the first post up with a solicitor sometimes. If you count them all as vacancies, there have been very few appointed from the registry lately. In a former period, when Lord Gorell was President, he always appointed from the registry; he considered that that was the best appointment.

12 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

44,612. But of late it has not been done so frequently?—It has been done, but not quite so frequently.

44,613. As regards the subject of organisation, the question has been raised on some previous occasions whether a portion of the work done in the Principal Registry at present, in the department concerned with contentious work, should remain where it is now or be transferred to the Central Office. I think the Committee of 1878 made a recommendation in that sense. Has any portion of that work been transferred in consequence of that recommendation?—No; none. The question was raised when Lord St. Helier was President, and objections were then made and nothing was done.

44,614. I think the Act of 1879 actually contemplated such a transfer?—But none of our duties are performed in the Central Office; they only issue the writs.

44,615. In fact, objections have been found which prevented the recommendation of the Committee of 1878 from being carried out?—I do not know exactly how it was that the recommendations of the Committee were thought necessary. Our work is so different from the work of the other divisions. The other divisions only have to deal with contentious work. Our probate contentious work is mixed up with non-contentious work. The wills have often to go from one department to the other, and you cannot put it quite on the same footing as the work in the Central Office.

44,616. Does any inconvenience result from the issue of writs in the Central Office?—I think it would be more convenient if they did not issue them, but I do not see much inconvenience. That is only one paper. They cannot issue the writ without coming to us for authority, and so it entails two attendances of solicitors instead of one.

44,617. As regards the other work connected with the contentious business, you think it would not be desirable to transfer that?—The work that was suggested to be transferred at the time I am referring to—Lord St. Helier's time, I think in 1901—was that all the taxing should be done in one department; but our taxing registrar also has all those questions of alimony and maintenance, which they do not have in other divisions, which work must be performed by someone. I do not suppose they would transfer the work of taxation and keep us with the same number of registrars; and if they are going to reduce the number of registrars I do not know how the work I am referring to, of maintenance and alimony, is to be done.

44,618. Is taxation an important part of the work?—The work done by the registrar who deals with taxations and those questions is very heavy.

44,619. Is the taxation proper a heavy part of it?—It does not take so much time as some of the other questions.

44,620. I see the number of bills taxed in a year is not much over a hundred?—That is not the chief part of the work of the taxing registrar.

44,621. The actual taxing of bills does not amount to very much if the number is not more than that?—I should have thought there were more than a hundred bills taxed in a year. There must be more, I should think.

44,622. In the judicial statistics the annual average from 1908 to 1912 appears as 113?—Is that referring to probate, or both probate and divorce?

44,623. That is under the heading of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty?—Both probate and divorce.

44,624. Apparently?—I should have thought there must be more than that.

44,625. (Mr. Coward.) It is the three, because it is headed "Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty"?—We should not have the Admiralty brought into our return.

44,626. (Chairman.) Will you look at Table D, page 74. Does that include divorce?—I should say that that must include divorce. I must say that I am surprised at that number. I thought there were more. But the taxing is not the greater part of the work done by the taxing registrar; it is the other questions that take the longest time—the appointments which lead up to the cross-examination of parties on questions of maintenance.

44,627. You are of opinion that there would be considerable inconvenience in transferring that work?—Considerable inconvenience, especially on another point, and that is that there are a great many small bills of a wife's costs up to the setting down of the cause, and they want to get almost immediate appointments to tax those when the case is in the list. One is able to do that having entire control of this work, but whether that could be done in a general taxing department I do not know.

44,628. Do you consider that the present classification is satisfactory as regards the number of clerks in the different classes, and the correspondence of those classes to the work to be done?—The only thing I do not think satisfactory is the provision made for registrars' clerks. I think they ought to be admitted to be entitled to second class pay, and there ought to be four additional places in the second class provided for them.

44,629. (Mr. Boutwood.) They do not appear in the statistical paper?—They are appointed as classified clerks. They would appear either as third class or second class clerks. They are not appointed as registrars' clerks.

44,630. I thought there was something peculiar about their status?—They are selected. The point first cropped up at the time of the organisation in 1881, when there was a reclassification. Before that we had four classes, and the registrars' clerks were always selected from the fourth class and promoted into the third. At the time of the organisation in 1881 it was proposed and recommended that in fixing the number of the second class places there should be sufficient to include four registrars' clerks; but that was rejected, and therefore it was said that they ought to be third class clerks. More than one application has been made by the President, and a very strong representation was made by Lord Gorell in January 1907, but without any result. Therefore they still are only third class clerks.

44,631. But are they not eligible for promotion to the second class?—They are eligible for promotion, but when they are promoted they have to do other work, because there are not sufficient second class places to include the registrars' clerks.

44,632. (Chairman.) Is there a clear distinction between the work of the second class and the work of the third class clerks?—There is a clear distinction in some instances, and not so much in others. It is rather difficult to define in some cases.

44,633. Are there cases in which a third class clerk is doing better work than a second class clerk?—I say the registrars' clerks are doing very much better work.

44,634. Are there other cases in which they are doing much the same work in the same department?—All the clerks in the department are interchangeable. There are no actual appointments made, and sometimes a junior clerk may be doing work entitling him to second class pay, owing to his knowing the work a little bit better, instead of being shifted to another department—that is, temporarily. Therefore, in some of the departments the division of second and third class clerks as regards work is not actually fixed.

44,635. For instance, in the calendar and searching department, in which there are three second class and six third class clerks, is there any clear distinction between the works of the second and third class clerks?—There is there. That is a sort of double department which is grouped together so as to get a larger staff of juniors to render each other assistance when wanted. One of the second class clerks is practically head of the searching department, and the other is the first assistant to the head of the calendar department.

44,636. In the record-keeper's department, which is one of the larger ones apparently, there are three second class clerks and seventeen third class clerks. In that department would the second class clerks be doing better work than the third class?—I think so, certainly.

44,637. So that you would say, generally speaking, there is a distinction between the second and third class work, but that there are exceptions to it?—Certain places in each department are considered as being entitled to second class, and those we try as far as possible to keep always filled by second class clerks, and the other places filled by third class clerks; but it may happen sometimes that somebody has been promoted to second class who has not always been transferred immediately through it not being convenient to make, in the way of work, a transfer at the moment.

44,638. As regards the distribution of the work, do any of the higher officers do work which could be devolved upon officers of a less high class?—I do not think so. There was a suggestion at one time, whether the grants could not be signed by clerks of Seats, but it was objected to because the registrars' names had become so recognised in the Colonies and other countries with regard to the grants.

44,639. The grants are sealed as well as signed?—They are.

44,640. Would not the seal carry the authority of the Court, whatever signature accompanied it?—I do not think there would be anything gained very much, supposing it were introduced. If the grants were to be signed by the clerks of the Seats they would want larger salaries, and the actual signature would only relieve the registrar of a very small part of the work.

44,641. Does the actual signature take up much time?—There is the looking through the grant and becoming responsible for it, and if it were signed by the clerks of the Seats, there would be a difficulty in the registrar being responsible and in having full control over the work in the registry, and it is a question whether the seal could be attached without the signature of the registrar.

44,642. As regards the hours worked, what are at present the office hours in the registry?—10 to 4, and during the vacation 11 to 3.

44,643. Have recommendations been made by previous committees or commissions on the subject of the hours worked?—I think there was something recommended in 1893 or 1894.

44,644. Did not the Committee of 1893 recommend that the same hours should be worked during the vacation as at other times?—That is so; and with regard to the vacation hours, during one vacation the office was open from 10 to 4, and it was closed again by the president on the representation of a number of solicitors.

44,645. On what ground?—On the ground that it was a hardship on them because it kept them late, and they had to deal with their correspondence after the office was closed, and they petitioned the president to close the registry.

44,646. Are the solicitors obliged to come when the office is open?—I do not know whether they are obliged to, but I suppose they have to wait for certain things in the office, and it made them later. That is what happened.

44,647. What would you say on the question of making the office day a seven-hours day instead of a six-hours day?—The difficulty about that is that we have a great rush of people in the middle hours of the day, and the suggestion in this Report of 1893 as to reduction of number of clerks would be quite impossible.

44,648. How many of the departments are in direct contact with the public?—The Seats, the Personal Application, and the Public Hall; in fact almost all the departments excepting the Calendar Department, which is about the only one where they do not have to see anybody.

44,649. Is not the Calendar Department in contact with the public as regards searches?—The searches in the Calendar Department are searches made by the clerks, not by the public searchers.

44,650. Do not the clerks who make the searches come in contact with the public as regards the searches to be made, or is it done by correspondence?—It has nothing to do with the public. The searching done by the Calendar and Searching Department is a search made on every application for a grant. Before the grant issues a search is made to see that there is not an existing grant. That search is made by a clerk and paid for by fees.

44,651. It is a search made by a clerk on behalf of the solicitor who applies for the grant?—The calendars have to be searched from the date of death up to the present time.

44,652. In order to see that no previous grant has been made?—Yes.

44,653. If someone wishes to find a will, to which department does he address himself?—That would be in the public hall where the public go.

44,654. Which department deals with that?—The Record Keeper's Department.

44,655. If I wish to find a particular will, I should apply to the Record Department, giving particulars of the will, and they would find the will for me?—Yes.

44,656. (Mr. Coward.) Would they find the will?—A book is provided. You get a search ticket first, and then the book is searched and the name produced, and in the first instance you are entitled to see the registered copy of the will.

44,657. If I go into the office to-day, I have to sign first of all a search form?—Yes, and you get a 1s. search ticket.

44,658. Then I get an index and I look through the index myself, and I see if there is a will there, and, if so, I say, "That is the will I want, will you kindly get it"; and then somebody comes and gets that will. That is the process?—Yes. They get the registered copy, because there is an additional fee if you want to see the original will.

44,659. (Chairman.) The searching of the index has to be done by the actual applicant, and not by the clerk in the department?—Yes.

44,660. (Mr. Coward.) What rating of clerk is it in the office who does that work. I go in and get my ticket; who is the clerk who gives me the ticket. Is he a third class clerk?—He is a third class clerk, and there are some "book-showers" in the hall who help you with the book; they are of the nature of messengers.

44,661. Then somebody goes to get the copy of the will?—That would be a book messenger.

44,662. (Chairman.) As regards the number of hours worked, your point is that the pressure from the public comes in the middle hours of the day, and that it would be difficult to reduce the staff at those hours in the proportion that would be suitable if the hours of attendance were extended?—Yes; and also in a busy department they stay considerably after 4 o'clock.

44,663. Is there much work to be done of the kind that a bank does, for instance, after it is closed to the public, in clearing up the work of the day—entering records and so forth?—That applies to the departments like the Receiving Department, where there are a lot of accounts. They have to deal with the purchase of stamps, and they are rather bustled in the early part of the day. They have a certain amount of work of that kind after four. Also both the "Seats" and the "Personal Applications" are frequently kept at work long after four.

44,664. And the Calendar Department?—The Calendar Department not so much, because that is work which is not so much current. It is the work that has to do with current business in departments which must be done from day to day. There is nothing in the Calendar Department except the searching which must be done day by day.

44,665. And the work of the "Seats"?—That must be done day by day.

44,666. But that is not primarily dependent on the public?—Yes, solicitors come in to see them as long as the office is open.

44,667. Does the public or a practitioner actually personally come in contact with the Seats Department, except in a small minority of cases?—Yes, there are a lot of questions to be asked. The clerks are perpetually being interrupted in their ordinary work by solicitors coming in to ask questions, either about a case which has been brought in or a case which they are about to bring in.

44,668. Do not the great majority of cases, once the papers have been lodged, go through without any further question?—A great number do, but I do not know that I could say the great majority. There are lots of little slips and mistakes in the papers which have to be seen to.

44,669. Are not these seen to for the most part before they come to the Seats Department?—No.

44,670. Is it not the duty of the Receiving Department to see to that?—They have not to see that there are mistakes in the papers; they have only to see that they have the proper fees and the Inland Revenue affidavit showing that duty is paid if necessary.

44,671. From the Receiving Department do the papers come along to the "Seats"?—The papers for administration come on to the "Seats," and the cases as to wills have to go to the Scrivenery Department for the engrossment to be examined with the will, and after that examination it is forwarded to the "Seats."

44,672. So the correction of any errors in papers is done by the "Seats"?—Yes, they check the papers and scrutinise the will.

44,673. Are there often errors, or omissions, or incorrectness, in the papers?—Frequently.

44,674. I see in the evidence before the previous Commission it was stated that at that time—that was in 1873—errors were much more frequent than they used to be in the previous days of proctors?—That is going back some time. One ought to presume that solicitors know more about it now.

44,675. The suggestion at that time was that the general practitioner had not become familiar with the probate procedure. Has that difficulty remedied itself in course of time since then?—It may be partly remedied, but it does not prevent a great many mistakes being made in a number of cases which are referred to.

44,676. Have you attendance books in use?—Yes.

44,677. Are those scrutinised and acted on in the case of bad attendance?—Yes.

44,678. Is that matter under the senior registrar?—It is under the senior registrar. Each department keeps its own book, which is forwarded to the senior registrar from time to time.

44,679. How many days in the year are allowed as leave?—The leave is 36 working days.

44,680. Does that apply to all classes?—That applies to all classes.

44,681. As regards compulsory retirement, is there any age limit in force?—There is no actual compulsory retirement with us.

44,682. Are many of the clerks above the age for Civil Service retirement?—It depends which age you take, whether 60 or 65. There are very few over 65 now.

44,683. There would appear to be two of the principal clerks of Seats over the age of 65?—That is so.

44,684. No first class clerks?—There are two in the second class.

44,685. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) What would be the age of entry of a man who is now 65? Did they enter at the age of 20 in the old days? We have the dates of entry, but not the age?—There is one copy of the Establishment List marked with the ages.

44,686. (Chairman.) There appear to be two second class clerks over the age of 65?—Two. In the third class there is no one, except the clerks not eligible for promotion.

44,687. So that in the whole of the clerical staff there would appear to be only four above the age of 65?—Yes.

44,688. As regards the registrars themselves are there any over that age?—I know my own age now is 61, but I do not think I know the ages of the others.

44,689. What would be your view as to applying the usual Civil Service rule which permits of retirement on pension at the age of 60, and requires it at the age of 65?—If it was introduced I would rather suggest that instead of making a hard and fast compulsory retirement at 60, it should be at the time that you are entitled to a full pension. If they come in at 24, it seems rather hard that they should not be able to serve their 40 years to get their full pension.

44,690. If your recommendation as to earlier appointments were carried out, that would solve that difficulty?—It would help it.

44,691. Would you regard it as an advantage to impose a limit?—It is certainly an advantage with regard to the ordinary classes, but there might be cases of clerks of Seats whom it would be desirable to keep over the age of 60.

44,692. Would you think it advisable to keep them beyond the age of 65?—I should think it would not be really necessary.

44,693. The Order in Council permits the retention of a Civil servant beyond the age of 65 where it is essential for the public service?—I think on those conditions I should have no objection to some scheme of compulsory retirement being introduced.

44,694. Cases would be very rare where it was essential in the interest of the public service?—Very rare.

44,695. And fixed retirement on an age limit would be beneficial in improving the flow of promotion through the office generally?—Yes, it would improve the promotion.

44,696. Promotion from the third class is somewhat slow?—Very slow.

44,697. As regards the arrangement for the clerical work of the office you have a Scrivenery Department?—Yes.

44,698. Was that formed as the result of the recommendation of the Committee of 1893?—Yes.

44,699. Has that proved advantageous in practice?—It has been very satisfactory.

44,700. What is the organisation of the Scrivenery Department. The work is done, I think, mainly by piecework?—They are paid by piecework. All the examining and copying is done in the Scrivenery Department.

44,701. There is, I suppose, a large amount of copying in making the registered copies of wills?—Yes, and a large amount of copying for the public.

44,702. The public can have copies of wills made for them on paying a suitable fee?—Yes.

44,703. The registered copies of wills are now typewritten?—Yes, now. That was also the result of the report of the Committee of 1893.

44,704. Has that proved satisfactory?—Quite.

44,705. At the time some doubts were expressed whether typewriting would be sufficiently permanent for that purpose. What has been the experience in that respect?—There is nothing up to now to show that it will not answer well. There are no signs of deterioration at present.

44,706. And that has enabled the registered copies to be kept in a smaller space and in a more convenient form?—And also having it done by piecework has prevented the arrears, which were always a trouble before.

44,707. Are you entirely free from arrears now?—Entirely free now.

44,708. Besides the registered copies of wills, is it the case that the engrossments of wills which have to be furnished for the purpose of obtaining the grant are done for the public where personal application is made?—Yes; in that case the engrossment is made in the Scrivenery Department.

44,709. In the case of an application by a solicitor an engrossment has to be presented with the will?—It is made by the solicitor.

44,710. Are those which are made in the case of personal applications in typewriting?—No, in manuscript.

44,711. Is there any reason why those should not be done in typewriting, too?—That I should rather like to hold back my answer about. I know they were originally done in manuscript, and I am not certain that they were not tried in typewriting, but I will let you know about that.

44,712. As regards the rates paid under the piecework system, how do those compare with the rates paid by outside stationers for similar work?—I do not quite know what they charge.

12 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

44,713. (Chairman.) In the case of manuscript engrossment I see you pay 2d. per folio. Do you know what is the rate paid for typewriting?—The ordinary rate for typewriting is 1d. a folio of 90 words.

44,714. And for manuscript 2d. per folio. Are you aware what the rate paid in the Scrivenery Department of the Central Office is. I rather think that is 1½d. per folio for manuscript?—I do not know.

44,715. Have you any knowledge of what the average earnings are under this piecework system?—I have had a petition sent in by the examining clerks complaining that their rate of payment is not large enough.

44,716. That is for examining work, and not copying work?—It is rather a suggestion that the examining work, which ought to be considered as rather higher class work than the typing, ought to receive more money, instead of which it receives rather less.

44,717. Could you give us a statement as to the average earnings?—I can get that for you.

44,718. Are any female typists employed?—There are two female typists.

44,719. What would be your view about extending the employment of female typists?—I do not think it is so desirable, because in our system the solicitors' clerks and the public who order copies of wills are at liberty to read over with the copying clerks, and they are in the room with the copying clerks reading over and comparing their copies. There is another objection also with regard to divorce papers. There are a great many divorce papers which have to be copied, where the matter is not particularly suitable for female typists.

44,720. The copying work in connection with matrimonial causes goes to the same Scrivenery Department?—What now is done by the female typist is rather special work—copies for the registrars of odds-and-ends of documents. They do a small amount of the registered copies, and they repair torn and fragile wills which are brought in. There is a good deal of work of that sort which has to be done by these women.

44,721. As regards typing the registered copies, which is the great bulk of the work, is there any reason why that should not be done by female typists?—Some of that might be done by them, but I do not see that there would be much advantage in it. There is also the question of the payment. I think payment by the piece is so much better for the copyists, and most female typists are paid by salary.

44,722. Are the two female typists employed at present paid by salary?—Yes, they are permanent clerks paid by salary on a different basis to the others.

44,723. The Commission have received a representation from the clerks in the Scrivenery Department, which I think you have seen?—Yes, I also have one myself.

44,724. The principal point to which they refer is the question of pension. What are your views on that point?—If they could be put in the same position as our old registering clerks were, I think it would be a very good thing. Our old registering clerks were entitled to pension, although they were paid by the piece. They were considered permanent civil servants, and they were entitled to pension on the basis of their average earnings.

44,725. What has become of those clerks now?—They are all absorbed, I think, now, or have been got rid of. There is one still who is a third class clerk. When clerks in the Scrivenery Department have served eight or nine years their position in the registry is almost the same as if permanent Civil servants.

44,726. As a matter of fact, do they all serve continuously for long periods?—Yes. If a clerk comes in in the first instance he either is kept for very long service or else he is got rid of shortly, if he is not satisfactory. There is no case of getting rid of them afterwards. If he is found satisfactory he practically stays.

44,727. Is there any great fluctuation in the volume of work of the Scrivenery Department?—It is kept level. There is a certain amount of registering which is given out so that it never gets into arrear; there is always enough for the clerks to do.

44,728. I pass now to the District Registries. There are a considerable number of District Registries scattered over the country, I think?—40.

44,729. The location of those was inherited from the Ecclesiastical Courts, I take it?—The districts were, of course, set out in the Court of Probate Act, which depended on the old County Court jurisdiction at the time. There is a Schedule to the Act of 1857 giving a list of the registries, and it describes the districts, and there is a note to say that when they refer to a county it is the county described in the County Court jurisdiction.

44,730. Why were those particular places selected?—I should say, mostly, at all events, they had been diocesan ecclesiastical registries. I am not quite certain whether all were, but most of them, no doubt.

44,731. Is the distribution convenient?—They work very well. Whether it is possible to merge some of the smaller ones into the larger ones I do not know.

44,732. Looking at the list, it strikes me that a certain number of them are at very small places, and places without specially good railway communication?—Originally they wanted these registries to be accessible to the poor people so as to be very close to them, but now that they can apply through Inland Revenue offices I do not think the nearness of the registry is quite so important as it was. As a proposal (I do not know quite how it could be worked out), I do not see why some of the smaller registries should not be merged into suitable larger registries.

44,733. That has, in fact, been recommended by some previous Commissions, I think?—They have recommended amalgamation with the High Court or County Court registries. I do not know whether they have recommended the merging into larger Probate registries.

44,734. I think the Commission of 1873 recommended the merging of some of these registries?—I could not say; but, as far as my opinion goes, I think that would be more preferable than amalgamation with of the County Court or the High Court registries.

44,735. You think that a certain number of the smaller registries could be merged in larger ones?—Yes.

44,736. As regards merging, or uniting them with the County Court and Supreme Court registries, what do you say?—I do not think that would work so well.

44,737. What would be the inconvenience attaching to that?—The work is different; and, having perpetual communication with the Principal Registry with regard to the grant and notice, it is much better to keep our work entirely distinct.

44,738. How is the salary of the district registrars fixed?—The salary of the registrars was fixed originally by the Treasury and the judge for the time being.

44,739. Are they all fixed salaries?—Yes. They were not originally; I think they took fees; but the salaries were fixed in or about the year 1866.

44,740. And the holders are at liberty to carry on other work also?—In all the recent appointments they have been precluded. In all the appointments made by Sir Samuel Evans he has always insisted upon their giving their whole time to it.

44,741. Even in smaller registries?—Yes.

44,742. But in the smaller registries the work can be hardly sufficient to occupy their whole time?—That I cannot say, but I think I am right in saying that where the President has made an appointment he has insisted upon their not doing any solicitor's work. I do not know about any other private work.

44,743. As the Commission must now adjourn, will you come again to continue your evidence on the afternoon of Wednesday the 24th February, if convenient?—Yes.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 18th February 1915.

PRESENT :

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.
 Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
 Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.
 Mr. CECIL COWARD.
 Mr. RICHARD DURNING HOLT, M.P.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
 Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
 Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.
 Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.
 Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Master THOMAS ANSDELL ROMER, called and examined.

44,744. (Chairman.) What is the position you occupy?—Senior Master of the Supreme Court, Chancery Division.

44,745. For how long have you held the post of master?—I shall have held it 29 years next June.

44,746. You have kindly given the Commission a very careful statement* as regards the work of the masters and of the office. I think the most convenient course will be if we treat it as handed in, and I will ask some questions to bring out the most salient points, in order that they may be present before the minds of the Commissioners in any further questions they may have to ask?—If you please. I should like to add that this description of our work was settled by all the Chancery masters in conference, at which every one of the masters was invited to express his opinion, so that this is a statement of the evidence of the whole body of Chancery masters.

44,747. This is a statement by the Chancery masters as a body?—Yes; not by me specially, but of the body. I want to make a point of that.

44,748. The Chancery masters are the same officers as those who were formerly called chief clerks?—Yes.

44,749. The change of title was made in 1897, I think?—Yes, it was.

44,750. And the position of the masters is that in all that they do they exercise the authority of a judge of the court?—That is so.

44,751. And the work which the masters do, as I understand, is determined substantially in this way, that all matters which come into chambers come to a master, unless, under certain rules or exceptions, they are reserved for the judge?—That is so; but in the first instance they come to the master. Although the judge deals with them, in the first instance in all proceedings up to the trial of the action they come before the masters.

44,752. And if they fall within certain categories, which are partly determined by rules and partly by the master's discretion, he then passes them on to the judge?—Yes.

44,753. The principle is that all matters are dealt with by the master except those which under these rules or under this discretion go on to the judge?—Yes.

44,754. And, in fact, as you tell us in your statement, the Chancery master is a judicial officer exercising all the powers of a judge in chambers except those he is precluded from exercising?—Yes, that is well described.

44,755. And in the cases where the matter goes on to the judge, the master makes a note for the assistance of the judge in dealing with it?—Yes, that is so.

44,756. Is it the case that the matters which are dealt with by the master himself without referring them to the judge include far the greater number of subsidiary matters arising in the course of the action?—They include almost all matters before the case reaches the judge for trial, and almost all matters after the judge has pronounced his judgment. In fact, the working out of his judgment is done by the Chancery master.

44,757. Do the matters arising on the working out of judgments constitute the larger part of the work, or the matters arising before judgment is reached?—I think the matters after the judgment are by far the most complicated and far the larger bulk of the work.

44,758. May I refer you for a moment to the Judicial Statistics, page 40, table 10. I see there certain statistics regarding proceedings in chambers, and I see that the number of orders made "of the class drawn up by the registrars" is given as 5,193, and of the class drawn up in chambers 7,376?—Yes, I see that.

44,759. In those numbers there is no distinction drawn, I think, between orders made in chambers by the judge, and orders made in chambers by the masters?—There is no distinction between the orders made by the judge in chambers and those made by us.

44,760. Out of that total number of orders, 12,500 in all, would far the larger number be made by masters?—I think far the larger number. You see, the judge only makes orders in chambers on the days that he sits in chambers, which is Monday in each week, whereas the masters are making orders all through the week.

44,761. So that the orders made by the judge would be a very small number out of that total of 12,500?—I should think a very small minority.

44,762. Then besides the matters of which we have been speaking already, the judge in some cases refers to the master for accounts or inquiries?—Yes, formal orders are made by the judge, and drawn up ordering accounts and inquiries; it is not a mere direction, it is an order to take certain accounts or to answer certain inquiries.

44,763. Does that constitute an important part of a master's work?—The most important.

44,764. As regards the time occupied, is it important?—Yes, I should say it takes up far the largest portion of our time.

44,765. Those accounts and inquiries, I suppose, are often very intricate matters requiring a large amount of time for each individual case?—Some of them are most onerous and most intricate. I have brought with me specimens of the certificates answering some of these inquiries in some of the most usual and important cases.

44,766. As regards accounts and inquiries, is the detailed work done mainly by the master himself or by the office staff under him?—By the masters. The whole of what is difficult in law, depending upon questions of law and of evidence is done by the masters, who make notes of what they have decided, and the detail is handed on to the clerks to work out.

44,767. In the case of an account, would the greater part of the work be detail work that would be done by the clerks?—The details would be done by the clerks, but all questions of principle or difficulty are always decided by the masters.

44,768. And the clerk who is dealing with the matter would refer to the master on any point of difficulty which arose in the course of it?—Yes, he is in close touch with the master; he sits in either the next room or a room communicating, and he has access to me at any time on any of these questions. If the questions are likely to be difficult, the matter is adjourned to me. I wish to say that in answering these inquiries, while I am speaking for myself, all the masters do the same sort of work; the work is equally distributed, and when I say that I do a thing I mean that all my colleagues do the same or nearly the same; they may do it of course according to their own characters, but we all deal in substantially the same way with the same sort of matters.

44,769. In the case of matters which come before you, apart from accounts and inquiries, is the distribution of work determined by the distribution between the three sections of Chancery judges?—Yes, the whole of the work is practically equally distributed amongst the six Chancery judges, and the four masters attached to each group of two judges.

44,770. How is that equal distribution arranged between the four masters attached to one group?—Alphabetically, according to an equal division of the alphabet.

44,771. Does that apply to accounts and inquiries also?—It applies to everything.

44,772. Everything is divided alphabetically?—Everything amongst the masters is divided alphabetically and equally.

44,773. And that in practice ensures a fair distribution of work between them?—Yes. The masters have a great number of meetings in the year in order to keep the practice uniform in all of the divisions.

44,774. At those meetings do individual masters bring forward points that have arisen on which they wish to consult the general body?—Yes. They give notice to me of the points they wish to have discussed, and I send a Minute to all the masters of what we are going to discuss at the meetings.

44,775. How often do those meetings take place?—They always take place once during every sittings, that is four times a year, and there are a great many other meetings called as well.

44,776. As regards the time occupied by the work, what are the hours during which you actually sit in chambers to hear matters?—I come at half-past 10, and I sit till 4 or half-past. The clerks come earlier, they come at 10. But my work by no means ends there.

44,777. Those are the hours during which you are actually sitting and hearing cases?—Yes, actually sitting, accessible to the public.

44,778. You remain accessible to the public till what hour?—Till 4, or later if necessary. If I was in the middle of a case and it was urgent, I should sit on to half-past 4, or even 5 o'clock, if necessary.

44,779. And after you have finished that part of the work is there further work to do apart from the work in which you are in contact with the public?—Yes, very often.

44,780. Work of what nature?—Difficult pedigree cases, for instance. I remember a case in which I had to go back to the reign of Charles the Second to trace a pedigree. It took me two or three months; it took two hours a day of my private time for two or three months. I have a case here I can show you if you like, a pedigree case which was an extremely difficult one, not one of the worst, but it is a good representative case. Then there are all sorts of things, of course, as well as pedigree cases. There are accounts and inquiries in debenture-holders' actions, and many others; administrations of deceased's estates, and inquiries in foreclosure and redemption actions. On that point I may as well show you now the few I have got here. Here is an inquiry, for instance, as to who was the heir-at-law of a certain person. This is rather a typical case; I will explain why. First of all one man claimed, and I had to go through and consider all the rules of descent of real property. The testator in that case left a daughter who died, and then I had to observe the next rule of descent; he left no lineal descendants, and I had to go to another rule of descent, through which I had to try and get the nearest paternal ancestor.

44,781. In fact, in pedigree cases such as that, complicated questions of the application of the rules of inheritance are involved, which take a large amount of examination and time?—This particular case took me about three weeks, a couple of hours each day from half-past 4 to half-past 6.

44,782. Does it occur frequently that matters of that kind keep you at your office till a much later hour than half-past 4?—Pretty frequently, I think. I should think probably about once a month.

44,783. Would that be the case with your colleagues also?—Exactly. Whatever I say of myself my colleagues are likely to have the same thing. I only speak of myself, because it is easier to speak of oneself.

44,784. Then as regards the vacations of the courts; what is the practice of the masters during vacation?—There is always one master sitting in the Long Vacation.

44,785. And with the exception of that one master, the other masters have the benefit of the Long Vacation?—The others have the benefit of the Long Vacation.

44,786. And of the other vacations also?—No; at Christmas one master sits; but there is a little vacation at Easter and one at Whitsuntide, and then one master sits in each division; that is to say, three masters are sitting.

44,787. So that with the exception of the one master who sits in the Long Vacation and the Christmas vacation, and the three masters who sit in the Easter and Whitsuntide vacations, the masters have the benefit of the legal vacations?—Yes. At all other times, of course, all are sitting. I have been sitting for nearly 29 years, every day and every hour.

44,788. Then you give us a detailed statement which we have before us, of the classes of cases in which the Orders are made by the master without referring the cases to the judge, unless at the request of a dissatisfied party?—Yes.

44,789. Those represent the principal typical cases in which the master makes the Order without reference to the judge?—Yes. I think you can thoroughly rely on that statement as an accurate exposition of our work.

44,790. Then we will turn now to the work of the staff. Here, again, we have before us a detailed statement which you have presented to the Commission. As regards the first class clerks, it appears that part of their work is the hearing of summonses of a simple character?—Yes, for time and for discovery, and unopposed stop Orders and Discharges. They all require care. There is sometimes considerable contest about time, you know; solicitors try, I will assume for proper reasons, to delay cases, perhaps to get up evidence; no doubt all for proper reasons, but there is considerable contest sometimes.

44,791. Those cases require some discretion to deal with them?—Certainly.

44,792. Then the statement enumerates a variety of other matters which are dealt with by first class clerks, including the drawing and settling of certificates?—Yes; that is done from our notes.

44,793. Does that refer principally to accounts and inquiries?—Yes; all those are accounts and inquiries which we are ordered by the judges to take.

44,794. The actual document in which the reply is embodied, after the substance has been determined by the master, is drawn up by a first class clerk?—Yes, from most careful notes. In fact one of my colleagues who has now retired, used to say, "The draft certificate is a copy of my notes." I perhaps ought to add that great skill is required in drawing up these documents. The master has made it perfectly clear in his decision; but, as you know, sometimes form is very important, and if the draft certificate is not put in the right form it may cause great confusion; therefore it has to be done very skilfully.

44,795. Then the work of the first class clerks is of considerable importance?—Most important, I consider. I should not like to rely upon any but two clever experienced men. The masters are responsible practically for most things; that is to say, for any delay or any mistakes, or anything of that sort. If there is any complaint made, or if there is any undue delay, the judges send for us and we are responsible. They never see the clerks, and if these clerks of ours make mistakes the masters are held responsible. Therefore you can quite understand that we like to have a very reliable man.

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

44,796. Quite so. I see that assessing costs is one of the items contained in the statement of a first class clerk's duty?—Yes.

44,797. What does that refer to?—That refers to small amounts of costs up to about 20*l.* or more, if the judge directs it, which for reasons of expedition and saving of expense are directed to be assessed in chambers.

44,798. Without going to the taxing masters?—Without going to the taxing masters.

44,799. Does that represent a large number of cases?—There is a good deal for a first class clerk to do in that respect, and that requires naturally very great experience, because solicitors, of course, expect that to be well done and fairly done.

44,800. Then, as regards the duties of the second class clerks we have an enumeration before us. Are those, broadly speaking, of decidedly less importance than the duties of first class clerks?—Yes, I think they are of less importance; but, of course, they have to be very carefully done.

44,801. I see in the enumeration the drawing up of chamber orders?—Yes.

44,802. What is meant by chamber orders?—Those are orders made by the masters in chambers.

44,803. Does that apply to all orders made by the masters?—No; in chambers the more complicated and difficult orders are made by the masters, and all orders for payment into court and out of court, which have to be acted upon by the Paymaster-General, are finally settled and passed and entered by the registrars.

44,804. Then does the phrase "chamber orders" mean such orders as are not required to be settled by the master?—No; they mean all orders made by the masters and first class clerks, some of which, as I said before, are passed and entered by the registrars; but most of them are settled and signed by the master in chambers.

44,805. Perhaps we may come back to that question of the exact manner in which orders are dealt with later, when we are considering the question of organisation?—For some other purpose, some time ago, I made a memorandum on this point, and it is to this effect: "At the present time about one-half of the orders pronounced and made in chambers, of which half about one-third are orders which deal with the payment out and the division of funds in court, are passed and entered by the registrars, and the remaining one-half are settled and signed in chambers." I endeavoured at that time to get a pretty accurate statement about that. This is a private memorandum of my own, which you may take as correct.

44,806. Then are the "chamber orders" which are drawn up by second class clerks the half which is dealt with entirely in chambers and does not go to the registrars?—Yes, that is so.

44,807. The other half goes to the registrars?—The other half goes to the registrars.

44,808. Then, coming to the third class clerks, their duties are apparently more mechanical, consisting in issuing summonses, preparing lists, and matters of that kind?—Yes; but they are very important; they have to be done by a very intelligent man. They are the clerks that the solicitors, perhaps, see most of.

44,809. Would it be correct to say that their work deals rather with the machinery for carrying on business than with the substance of the business?—Yes; I think it would be so.

44,810. From the detailed statement that would appear to be the nature of their work?—Yes.

44,811. Is the distinction between the work of the three different classes clearly and accurately maintained in practice, or is there some overlapping and variation in the distribution of the work between the three classes?—No; this statement represents the general distribution throughout all the divisions. Sometimes there is a little varying; sometimes a second class clerk might do a little bit of the work of a first class clerk, and sometimes a first class clerk might do a little of the work of a second class clerk, but there is no appreciable variation.

44,812. Would a second class clerk ever draw up a certificate?—Certainly not.

44,813. Would a first class clerk ever draw up a chamber order?—Yes, he might, but it would be a very difficult one.

44,814. If it was a difficult one the second class clerk might bring it to the first class clerk for assistance?—Yes, if it is a very difficult one I very often refer it to a first class clerk.

44,815. Do the second and third class clerks act under the general instructions and guidance of the first class clerks?—No, they all act under the directions of the masters. They help one another, of course.

44,816. If a third class clerk or a second class clerk had a point of difficulty, would he bring it direct to the master, or would he bring it to a first class clerk?—He would very likely bring it to one of his colleagues first, but if it was extremely difficult he would bring it to me. I am absolutely accessible; we are all close together, and in any case that was difficult they see me at once, and I settle it.

44,817. At the end of your statement you have set out the nature of the proceedings in four typical actions?—Yes.

44,818. Would it be correct to say as a general inference from those statements that in the majority of cases, as the result of an order of the Court, the whole of the proceedings in the remainder of the action are carried out by the master?—Yes, that is correct.

44,819. And that in certain cases, such as foreclosure proceedings, the whole of the proceedings are carried on without any reference to the judge himself unless the parties desire it?—All these matters are carried out entirely by the masters with the assistance of their clerks, without any reference to the judge. It is our business not to trouble the judge if we can help it.

44,820. In carrying out matters connected with estates, have the masters to exercise what I may call a business discretion as well as a judicial discretion?—Certainly.

44,821. For instance, supposing it is a question of a sale of property, has the master to exercise his discretion as to whether the price is an advantageous one to accept?—Completely. He has to exercise his discretion and what common sense he possesses.

44,822. Then, dealing with investments, has he to exercise discretion how investments should be varied, what should be sold and what should be bought, and so forth?—Entirely.

44,823. Does he exercise that on his own knowledge and experience, or has he expert advice?—As a general rule he exercises it on the strength of his own experience and discretion, and when necessary he has expert advice.

44,824. On questions of investment of funds would he, as a rule, take expert advice?—He might in some extraordinary question of investment—some investments in some unusual stocks or shares; but of course the funds in court are invested in funds which are authorised by general orders of the Court as proper investments of trust funds, and those are varied from time to time by the inclusion of further securities which are considered proper for investment of funds in court or trust funds.

44,825. As between the funds which are authorised he would exercise his discretion?—Yes.

44,826. And has he to deal with questions of the management of landed property?—Certainly.

44,827. Is that done as a rule through agents, or does he deal with those directly?—That is done through agents who make affidavits on a question of management which has to be decided.

44,828. If there is a landed estate in court, supposing there is some question of expenditure on repairs or improvements, has the master to decide it?—Certainly, assisted if necessary by expert evidence.

44,829. On any important question would he call expert assistance?—Certainly he would.

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

44,830. On a large question of improvement?—Yes, he would require the affidavit of an experienced estate agent.

44,831. But would the practical day-to-day management be in the hands of an estate agent?—Yes, the details of it would be.

44,832. If a farmer wanted a gate mended he would go to the local estate agent, he would not apply to the master?—No. You see for many of these estates in Chancery there is a receiver and manager appointed, and he passes his accounts for little minor things; he does not come to the master for any minor question, but such expenses are included in the account, and if they are proper they are passed and sanctioned by the master.

44,833. Then, in practice, the day-to-day management would be in the hands of the manager and receiver, and questions would come before the master on the question of passing the receiver's or manager's accounts; would that be the case?—Yes, or it might be that trustees might still be managing the estates under the supervision of the Court and the trustees would exercise their discretion, but you may take it that if there is any question of difficulty or doubt in which the parties (receiver or trustees) might think that if they took the wrong course they might be liable, they would certainly come to the master, because the master is so ready of access; we are always there.

44,834. (Mr. Coward.) Not perhaps because he is ready of access, but because they want the authority of the Court to do it?—Yes, that is one of the reasons.

44,835. (Chairman.) We come now to the question of appointment. In the case of masters is there a statutory qualification?—Yes, there is, by the Act of Parliament which constituted the masters (the old chief clerks, our predecessors), the 15th and 16th Victoria, Chapter 80, Section 17.

44,836. "No person shall be appointed chief clerk to the Master of the Rolls or any Vice-Chancellor unless he shall have been chief clerk to one of the masters in ordinary of the said court, or have been admitted on the roll of solicitors or attorneys in one of the courts in Westminster Hall, and practised as such solicitor or attorney for the period of ten years at least immediately preceding his appointment." That is the section you refer to?—Yes, that is the section.

44,837. By whom are they appointed?—By the Lord Chancellor.

44,838. Do you consider that the statutory qualification is essential? Of course, it is at present essential as a legal qualification, but do you think it is desirable to maintain it in its present form?—I think so, and I will give my reasons. I think that the practical experience and sense of responsibility which a man can alone get by having practised as a solicitor is necessary for him, so as to give him self-reliance in his judgment and experience to enable him to decide the difficult questions which he has to decide as a Chancery master.

44,839. At present a barrister is not qualified for appointment as Chancery master?—No, the Act excludes him; the Act confines it entirely to solicitors.

44,840. Do you consider that that exclusive qualification of solicitors should be maintained—that the exclusion of barristers should be maintained?—Personally I think so, for the reason that a barrister does not get the business experience that a solicitor does.

44,841. So far as regards the qualities of self-reliance and power of forming a decided judgment which you mentioned, would a barrister's training and experience be as good as a solicitor's?—It ought to be equally good on legal matters, of course.

44,842. But on the business side you think a solicitor's experience more valuable?—I think so, with all modesty.

44,843. Of course a barrister does not have to deal with the management of estates and property?—No, a solicitor is in a very responsible position; he is liable to an action for negligence. If he makes any mistakes he is liable to an action for negligence, with very serious consequences. But beyond that the interests of his clients are, of course, of all importance to him; he has to consider the interests of his clients not only at the time he is consulted, but he has to think of their interests in the future as well. I mean that he might even cleverly win an action for a client, but it might not be the wisest thing to do for that client; it might lead him to make enemies, which might be bad for his business; it might, looking at it as a family matter, cause even, if he was successful in certain proceedings, unhappiness in his client's family; and in all these matters a solicitor feels a great sense of responsibility to his client.

44,844. Has a master to consider matters from that point of view?—Certainly. I exercise the same care in my work that I did when I was a solicitor.

44,845. That is to say, that part of his work which deals with administration?—Yes.

44,846. Because, I presume, in the judicial part of his work that aspect of the matter does not arise?—No; it is quite different looking at it from the legal, litigious, side, where, when the master has done his best to arrive at a correct decision, he has done all he can; those consequential circumstances which I have mentioned with regard to a solicitor in practice do not, of course, obtain when you are a Chancery master. I hope I have made myself clear.

44,847. Yes, I think I take your point, that in the part of the master's work which deals with administration rather than litigation, he is bound to think of the interests of the parties concerned, apart from purely legal considerations, in the same manner that a solicitor has when he is dealing with his client's affairs?—Yes.

44,848. That is an aspect which is more constantly dealt with by a solicitor than by a barrister, and for that reason you think that a solicitor's training and experience is more valuable, having regard especially to that part of a master's work, than a barrister's training and experience?—Yes, I quite agree with the way you put it. I, perhaps, ought to add, when I am on the point, that a very important part of the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division concerns infants, wards of court, and in those matters we have to exercise quite a paternal jurisdiction.

44,849. In the cases of wards of court does the master fulfil the functions that a guardian would fulfil in the case of an ordinary ward, or is an outside guardian appointed by the Court?—Yes, a guardian is appointed, but that guardian acts according to the directions of the master, and if necessary of the Chancery judge.

44,850. Does that apply to personal matters such as education as well as to matters of property?—Education, maintenance, putting out in the world, property, in fact everything that concerns the welfare of the child.

44,851. In cases of that kind does the guardian frequently refer to the master for directions?—Always when it is a matter of importance.

44,852. If it was a question of what school a child should go to would he refer to the master?—Yes, in most cases he would, because the question of the school at the particular moment of that child's life may be of paramount importance to the child. Many of the most difficult questions with regard to the custody and maintenance of infants of course are dealt with by the judges in person with our assistance.

44,853. Do you think that the present system of appointment has been satisfactory in its results?—Well, it has stood the test of over sixty years, and has been found to work well, and therefore I conclude the results are satisfactory.

44,854. The suggestion has been made that for dealing with appointments of this nature, professional appointments, the appointing authority should be assisted by a committee?—That is to say the Lord Chancellor.

44,855. The Lord Chancellor in this case; that he should be assisted by a committee who should report on the candidates, and that the Lord Chancellor should consider their report before making an appointment. Would you consider that there would be advantage in creating a system of that kind?—I would rather confine myself to appointments in Chancery, and I will speak as to Chancery. At present there is nobody of that kind to advise the Lord Chancellor on appointments, but when Lord Haldane took office he originated a system by which all candidates for appointment in Chancery chambers should be referred to me as the senior master.

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

44,856. You are speaking now of the clerks?—Yes, they are referred to me, and a series of questions according to a form supplied to me by the Lord Chancellor are put by me to the candidates. They all come and see me.

44,857. You see them personally?—I interview them, and I interrogate them very searchingly on all these points.

44,858. To turn back again to the question of masters; would you consider it advantageous that the Lord Chancellor should have the assistance of some person or body who would exercise in the case of masters somewhat the same preliminary examination into their qualifications as you do in the case of candidates for the lower posts?—I have had so much experience with large bodies; it is very difficult to get them to agree.

44,859. It need not be a large body; it might be a small body?—No, I do not think it would be an improvement on the present system. The present system is like the appointment of judges. The Lord Chancellor finds out all about the solicitor who seeks to be appointed; he can ask questions of other solicitors, and the solicitor is probably well known as practising before the Chancery judges and the Chancery masters. The Lord Chancellor can ask questions of the judges, or if necessary of me or any other of the masters. I do not think I am prepared to say at the present moment that a committee of that sort would be an improvement.

44,860. You think that the Lord Chancellor has sufficient means of information about candidates without creating a committee of that kind?—Certainly.

44,861. To turn now to the clerks, they also are appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

44,862. They have to pass a qualifying examination, I think?—Yes they have the Civil Service examination.

44,863. Is that examination valuable?—Oh, yes.

44,864. The standard is not a high one?—No, but of course it is valuable; it ensures the fact that they have all been reasonably educated, which is necessary of course.

44,865. What are the qualifications that you require for the clerks in the office?—The best class of clerks in Chancery chambers are clerks who have been clerks in practising solicitors' offices of at least five years' service; such clerks should not be debarred from appointment in the first instance to second class and first class clerkships, should occasion arise. That is the evidence of the masters as a body.

44,866. To develop that a little, is it because of the mental training, or because of the actual knowledge of legal procedure that they acquire that you think training in a solicitor's office is desirable?—Because of the experience that they have acquired both in the practice of the law and in business matters, the same kind of experience as I have spoken of as necessary for the masters, only, of course, in a different degree—in a rather lower degree.

44,867. If a young man of good intelligence and general education entered the office at the age of 19 or 20, could he learn the work in the office?—He would be no use whatever at first.

44,868. How long would he take to learn the work of a third class clerk?—I should think quite three years.

44,869. As much as that?—I think he would be a nuisance to the master and a nuisance to the other clerks, and a nuisance to the solicitors who practise, for some time through no fault of his.

44,870. Is there anything in the work of a third class clerk, as enumerated in your list, that would take as long as three years to learn?—Yes, I think so. They have got to know something about the nature of actions and originating summonses and proceedings in Chancery; they have got to see whether the right parties are joined in the actions; they have got to see that all the parties have entered appearances properly; they have got to see, in a case of infants, that they have properly appeared by guardians ad litem; they have got to see, in the case of people of unsound mind, that they have also properly appeared by guardians ad litem, and they have got to give the proper returns on these various proceedings. Some of them are returnable for appointment before the master on an originating summons in eight days, some ordinary on summonses in two days, and so on; and if mistakes are made in these things the proceedings have to be done all over again. For instance, if they make a mistake and return an originating summons for appointment before me, say in seven days, that is not legal; it will all have to be served over again, and a lot of expense incurred about it. Details of that sort are too numerous to mention where mistakes made would be very disastrous.

44,871. Would those details be learned in a solicitor's office?—Completely, because these clerks have been acting as Chancery clerks, who carry out these things every day and know as well as the clerks in my chambers all these details that I have been speaking about; they know it all, and therefore it is all done properly and mistakes are not made.

44,872. Their work in a solicitor's office would include a great many other kinds of work as well, I presume?—Yes, their work would include probably conveyancing and all the general business of a solicitor's office.

44,873. Conveyancing, again, is a branch in itself?—Yes; and in the general business that comes into a solicitor's office they get to know a vast amount about the details of the management of estates, and about all kinds of things that are dealt with in chambers.

44,874. Then in five years in a solicitor's office they would have learnt not only all the work done by a third class clerk in your office, but also a very great amount of other matters too?—Certainly.

44,875. Then why is it that in five years in a solicitor's office they can learn so very much more than they could in three years in the office itself?—Owing to the greater variety of matters which are dealt with in a solicitor's office.

44,876. The greater variety, I should have assumed, would have made it more difficult to learn, and take more time to learn?—I suppose in doing constantly in Chancery chambers the work I have described they would learn that particular thing a little bit quicker than as clerks in a solicitor's office, because there they would have been doing not only the Chancery work but something else as well.

44,877. In a solicitor's office they would be doing a great deal besides?—Of course the larger the solicitor's office the more a man is confined to certain things, but he has to be a handy man in a solicitor's office.

44,878. Then you regard the previous training in a solicitor's office as a very important matter in the qualification for admission to your office?—I think we all clearly do.

44,879. Do you think it would be desirable sometimes to make direct appointments to the second and first classes?—Well, we have had to sink our little differences somewhat in our conjoint evidence, naturally some of us think a little differently about that. It seems to me that it is a little unfair to the third class clerks who expect to get their promotion; it blocks their promotion if men are put up per saltum above them directly.

44,880. Personally you would prefer to fill the higher classes by promotion rather than by direct appointment?—Yes, I think so, because they have the proper qualification to begin with, a good foundation, and then they learn the higher working in chambers.

44,881. Do you consider that under the present system of appointment you get the right men for the office?—Yes, I think if the whole of the Chancery chambers were manned by that kind of man, the solicitor's clerk class, we should get about as near perfection as is possible.

44,882. As a matter of fact, have recent appointments been of that class?—Yes, I think they have.

44,883. Since the system was instituted by the Lord Chancellor of referring candidates to you, have all the candidates appointed been men who have had previous experience in a solicitor's office?—I should think so, but of course I do not know exactly what may have been done in other chambers.

44,884. I am speaking of your own office, Chancery chambers?—There has been no appointment in my own division for a long time.

44,885. When was the last appointment?—I happen to have a list here. My third class clerk was appointed to the public service in 1902; that was in the Registrar's Department; he was first appointed there, and then he was appointed into my chambers as third class Chancery clerk in 1909; he has been with me, you see, six years.

44,886. There appears to have been one appointment in 1914?—Yes, there are several, I see.

44,887. Were those recent appointments men who had had experience in a solicitor's office?—I am afraid I cannot say; probably, I should think, but I cannot say. There are other chambers. I, of course, as senior master, know a good deal about the clerks generally, but I cannot know everything.

44,888. Among the candidates who are sent to you by the Lord Chancellor to be interviewed, are there many candidates from outside who are not at work in a solicitor's office?—I think most of those who have come to me have come from solicitors' offices, but some have not, and I think on the whole I have reported in favour generally of those who have been in solicitors' offices.

44,889. Are a considerable number of candidates sent to you to be seen?—I have not had many lately, but about a year ago I had a good many; about, say, one a month comes to me.

44,890. Are those candidates who have applied for the Chancery chambers?—Yes, principally Chancery chambers.

44,891. Is it only those candidates who are sent to you by the Lord Chancellor?—I think some of them have been candidates who wanted a post at the Law Courts generally; but I think that the candidates for the King's Bench Division are sent to Sir John Macdonell, the senior King's Bench master.

44,892. It has been suggested that for the appointment to clerkships competition might be applied, either open competition or competition between persons having a certain qualification: for instance, five years' service in a solicitor's office. What would be your view as to that suggestion?—I think you have no absolute guarantee of a man's capacity by merely a system of competitive examination or limited competitive examination. You have no absolute guarantee of his efficiency for the purpose that you want him for. I have spoken to a good many high authorities on this subject, some of the Chancery judges, and they seem to hold the opinion that the solicitor's clerk class is the best. I do not care to mention names, because, of course, it is not evidence what other people say; but I have spoken to the head of a very important administrative department on the subject who is a friend of mine, and he takes exactly the same view as I do. He says: "I fill my office with experts. If I want a solicitor, I have a solicitor. If I want a man to advise on investments, I get a man who has been in a stockbroker's office. If I want a good man for accounts, I get him from a bank or insurance office." He says: "I have not much confidence in the man who has simply gone up for a competitive examination." So that you see a good deal of high authority takes the same view as the Chancery masters do, and as I do.

44,893. In the reports which the Royal Commission has already made, they have drawn a sharp distinction between posts requiring special knowledge and experience, corresponding to the posts which you have mentioned—a man to advise about investments or a man with legal knowledge—and the great mass of men required for general clerical work. It is to the latter class that the Commission hitherto has thought the system of competition applicable and the best system?—Yes.

44,894. Would not there be a similar distinction between the higher posts in the legal offices, and the main body of clerks who do the mass of everyday work in these offices?—I have endeavoured to point out that even the third class clerk in Chancery requires some knowledge.

44,895. Of course, all work requires some knowledge?—But knowledge of the particular character I have mentioned—I thought I had made that clear—the work in a solicitor's office. What I mean to say is, that third, second, and first class clerks all require, in my opinion, some legal knowledge and knowledge of business, something more than the man who just comes from the university or public school. That is what I mean in the case of the Chancery chambers.

44,896. Would that requirement not be met by competition between men who had the qualification of, say, five years in a solicitor's office?—Now, I am going beyond what the masters have agreed, and this is only my personal opinion: I should see no objection to a man who gets in in a competition or a limited competition, provided that he has got a certificate of legal and business capacity of the kind I have prescribed.

44,897. It is experience rather than capacity that you are speaking of now. If he has a certificate of certain experience in a solicitor's office, would you then consider that competition was a suitable method of selecting between persons who have that qualification?—I see no personal objection to that. But I mean it should not only be experience, but capacity too. I consider—I may be wrong—that there are plenty of men who are very good hands at passing an examination. I have known men who are exceedingly clever in passing examinations in book knowledge and all that, who, to put it in a homely way, were no good whatever in the matter of business.

44,898. They have not the particular kind of capacity you require?—They have not the capacity. You must recollect that in the Law Courts they are put into contact with very clever and astute men—the solicitors and solicitors' clerks—and they have to hold their own in transactions with men of very great intelligence. I think a young man who has no previous experience would find himself in rather an uncomfortable position in dealing with solicitors and solicitors' clerks, who are men, of course, of great experience and astuteness.

44,899. You think you can discover the particular qualities necessary for dealing with them by selection rather than by competition?—Certainly. In favour of that view I should argue that the solicitor who gives his certificate that a man is fit is personally interested in giving that certificate, because that clerk who is appointed to the Chancery Division would in all probability be a clerk who would have to transact some of that solicitor's work, and if he certified an incompetent person his own work would be badly done. I put that forward as a reason. Besides that, the solicitor is an officer of the Court, and it is not only his wish but his duty to give the Court proper and reliable information. There is a fiduciary position between him and the Court to give the Court proper information with regard to the clerk that he certifies, just as it is his duty to give the Court reliable information about everything else.

44,900. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the salaries of the lower classes?—I think the masters agreed something about that. If you turn to the heading of "Appointment" in our statement I should like to read it. The masters here begin by saying: "The system of appointment works well except as regards appointments from other Government departments directly to second class clerkships which have at times been made, and which do not appear to be quite fair to the third class clerks. Complaints have been made that at the present time there are third class clerks in Chancery chambers who have served for 14 years; whereas in the central office the longest service for third class clerks is under eight years." I think I had better read the next paragraph also.

44,901. We have all this before us?—Yes, I know; but I want to bring out another point. "The salary of third class clerks in Chancery, namely, 100*l.* a year to commence, rising by 10*l.* a year to 200*l.*, is insufficiently attractive to secure the best men, and it is suggested that the salary might be raised to 150*l.* to commence with, rising to 250*l.*"

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

44,902. What do you suppose would be generally the salary of a clerk in a solicitor's office who has served five years?—Probably it would not be more than these third class clerks get now, but there is a member of the Commission who is better able to answer that question than I am.

44,903. We shall no doubt have some evidence from solicitors?—I have not been in the profession for 29 years.

44,904. On what is that opinion, that the commencing salary of 100*l.* a year is not sufficient to attract the best candidates, founded?—I know one third class clerk very well; he has been in the public service about 13 years or so, his salary is now 200*l.* a year, and I think he is decidedly worth more than 200*l.* a year. There are some other third class clerks who are equally good, and I think they are worth more than their maximum of 200*l.* a year. I think after service for some time they ought to have a higher salary. I think the superiority of the maximum salary of the second class clerk—400*l.* a year—is too great.

44,905. In fact you would increase the scale of third class clerks and diminish that of the second class clerks?—No, I would not diminish the scale of the second class. I do not mean that, but that I would increase the third.

44,906. Did not you say just now that the maximum of the second class clerk was too great?—Looking at it from the point of view that a third class clerk's maximum ought to be increased; but I do not mean that the second class maximum is too great. If I led you to that impression I correct it by confining myself simply to saying that the third class clerks ought to have more. I do not for a moment suggest that the second should have less. If I did say it, I should like to correct it.

44,907. (Mr. Boutwood.) You meant that the difference between the two scales was too much?—Yes, I think I meant that only.

44,908. (Chairman.) Do you, as a matter of fact, find that you do not get the best candidates for these posts in the third class?—I think that is the opinion of some of the masters. Personally I am in favour of getting a competent man into the third class and then letting him work up. I think that is fair, and it is an incentive to the third class clerk to work up. Many are good, and one or two I speak about will, I know, go up to the first class and be very first-rate clerks; and I think every encouragement ought to be given to them to get up.

44,909. That brings us to the question of promotion. Is promotion by seniority or by merit?—I think I had better read from the Report about that: "The clerks are at present promoted from class to class according to seniority, provided they are considered fit for promotion."

44,910. As a matter of fact, is promotion invariably by seniority?—Yes, it is at present, certainly.

44,911. None have been passed over?—Provided the candidate is fit.

44,912. Are there any who have been considered unfit?—I am sorry to say there have been—very few, though.

44,913. Is that in the third class or in the second class?—In the third and in the second, too, but they are very few. There are always a few weaker vessels in a large body of men.

44,914. So to that extent a selection is made?—Yes. Promotion is by seniority provided they are fit.

44,915. Promotion is made by the Lord Chancellor, I think?—Yes, but what we report here is, "Shortly after Lord Haldane, the present Lord Chancellor, took office, he directed the masters to report to him whenever there is a vacancy, and make recommendations for his consideration as to filling it. This has been deputed to a sub-committee, consisting of the senior master and three masters in rotation, one from each division."

44,916. Do you consider that that system works satisfactorily as regards promotion?—Yes, I think so.

44,917. At present a clerk is not eligible to be appointed a master?—No, he has not got the statutory qualification.

44,918. If the statutory qualification was out of the question, if it did not exist or were repealed, do you consider that any of the clerks would be suitable persons for appointment as masters?—Of course, that is a very delicate question.

44,919. It is not a practical question at this moment because of the statutory qualification; but, without dealing with individuals, do you consider any of the clerks would be suitable for such promotion?—I am very much in favour personally of giving every man a chance. I think the qualification ought to be maintained; I do not see why a clerk should not get promotion, but I think if the qualification is not statutory he ought to have the experience of a solicitor first. I know that is only another way of blocking him. He could not leave the office and become a solicitor and get that experience.

44,920. Have any of the clerks with technical qualifications before their appointment served for 10 years as solicitors?—I am not quite sure. I know of one man who is a first class clerk who has been a solicitor. I should doubt whether any have had the 10 years' experience.

44,921. But, apart from that technical point, do you think that the experience and training they have in passing up the office and doing the work of the office would fit them for the work of a master?—I am sorry to say I do not think so, because I attach so much weight, as I told you, to the experience and responsibility that a solicitor gets.

44,922. In what respects would the work in the office be insufficient as a qualification for subsequent appointment to a mastership?—The clerks never have to come to any conclusion on any difficult matters; they are all referred to the master. They have not had that experience of constantly revolving a difficult question over in their minds and coming to a conclusion on it. Of course, there may be exceptions; some of them may be very brilliant. Some of those first class clerks I do not know of may be very brilliant men, but those I have come across I do not think are qualified for the reasons I have given.

44,923. On the whole you would maintain the present system under which the clerks are not eligible for appointment to the position of master?—I think so; I am not aware of a better.

44,924. Their work extends over the whole field of a master's duties except that in important and difficult matters it is the master who has to come to the decision and not the clerk?—It extends over the whole field in a subordinate manner.

44,925. Is it the fact that they have not the responsibility for decisions in difficult matters, which, in your opinion, makes their experience an insufficient qualification for the work of a master?—Yes, that is what I mean.

44,926. Turning now to the question of organisation, the work, as you have already described, is divided into three groups, four masters being attached to each group?—Yes.

44,927. Has each master a separate staff attached to him, or is the office staff attached to the group?—Each master has a separate staff attached to him—two first class clerks, one second class, and one third class.

44,928. Do you consider that that is the best means of applying the office staff, or would there be any advantage in a distribution by functions rather than a distribution by groups. The first class clerks perform a number of different functions; two of them are attached to each master, and those two have to perform the whole of those functions which fall to a first class clerk?—Yes.

44,929. Another possible system would be to have a first class clerk doing a certain class of work for all the masters, and another first class clerk doing another class of work for all the masters. That is a division by functions, instead of attachment to a particular master?—No, I cannot imagine a better arrangement than the present. You have to work out certain cases, and those cases are best worked out by the master and those under him. You cannot distribute the work right through the division by putting all the first class clerks together and saying that they shall do the certificates, and that the second class clerks shall do something else; it must be according to the present arrangement, the four clerks working under the master.

44,930. You think that the most convenient arrangement?—Certainly.

44,931. Is there any waste of staff under that arrangement?—None whatever.

44,932. Each master can keep the whole of the clerks attached to him fully employed?—Absolutely.

44,933. Take, for instance, the work of a third class clerk in preparing the daily lists. Does a third class clerk prepare the daily list for each master?—Yes, his own master; he does not know anything about the other masters at all.

44,934. Are not those lists united in one general list?—Yes, but only for the convenience of the public. I have brought with me a copy of the daily list, and you can see exactly how it is worked (producing same). It begins with the chambers of Mr. Justice Joyce and Mr. Justice Eve.

44,935. (Mr. Coward.) Each master has his own list, but they are all included in the one general list?—Yes, in the printed list.

44,936. (Chairman.) They are only united by the printers?—Only by the printers in that document.

44,937. And each master's list is prepared by his particular third class clerk?—Yes, and all the appointments before each master are given by his third class clerk. Any other system of giving appointments would lead to utter confusion. The days have all the appointments allotted out for short appointments and long appointments, and those appointments are either given by the clerk, or, if I adjourn a case and give the appointment, myself. I adjourn to an appointment of sufficient length for me to deal with it, as I know how long it is likely to last even better than the clerk; but, of course, I have to trust to the clerk's experience in giving the original appointments before me. That is a matter which a man from outside would not know anything about. He would probably put down something that an experienced man would know would take two hours for five minutes, and I could not, of course, deal with it in that time, and then the parties are irritated if they have an appointment and the master has to adjourn it. I avoid all that by having a skilful clerk.

44,938. That knowledge is presumably knowledge that he has acquired in the office?—Yes.

44,939. Would he acquire that knowledge in his previous experience as a solicitor's clerk?—He would acquire a great deal of it because he knows how the masters divide their cases. He can see the papers, and would never dream of giving an appointment for five minutes to a case which by his experience he would know would last a couple of hours; he can tell by the very look of the papers what it is.

44,940. On another question of organisation, various committees have before the present time inquired into the Chancery offices, and I think each of those committees has considered the question of a possible amalgamation of the Chancery chambers and the Chancery Registrars' Office?—Yes.

44,941. I should like to ask your opinion on that point, but, before giving your opinion, will you kindly explain to us the exact relation at present between those two offices?—As you know, this question was not an original question asked. This has not been before all the masters. You will understand that.

44,942. Yes; so anything you say we will take as an expression of your personal opinion?—Yes, on this question it is entirely my own opinion, and I have not had much time to think of it. Of course it is a very serious question. I think Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie gave a very good description of the registrar's office in his memorandum prepared for the Chancery Registrar's Committee.

44,943. That is the committee over which Mr. Justice Kekewich presided in 1907, I think?—He seems to me to give a very accurate account of the registrar's office—a better one than I could give at the present moment.

44,944. The principal work of the Chancery registrars is the drawing up and settling of orders, after they have been made by a judge or a master?—Yes.

44,945. Taking the orders which are made by a master, is it the case that a certain number go on to the registrars to be drawn up and settled, and that a certain number are drawn up and settled in chambers?—Yes, half I think I said previously.

44,946. You said something like half. How is the line drawn between those two classes of orders?—All orders which have to be acted upon by the Paymaster-General are drawn up by the registrars; that is the practice.

44,947. Is that the distinction; are those all the orders that go to the registrars?—No, there are other orders. Perhaps I may describe them as the longer and more difficult orders.

44,948. Are they not defined by some more accurate definition than that?—Yes, I think they are defined by a document somewhere, but I am afraid I have not got it with me.

44,949. We may take it that half the orders, and those the longer and more difficult ones, go to the registrars to be drawn up and settled?—Yes, that is what I ascertained.

44,950. In your opinion is that necessary?—That is a very difficult question to answer. I should not entrust those orders to any but the two first class clerks to draw up if they were done in chambers, and those clerks have not time to perfect them at present.

44,951. Possibly more staff might be required if that work were done in chambers?—Yes.

44,952. But on account of the nature of the work is there any reason why it should not be done in chambers?—I think the first class clerks ought to be paid more if they are called upon to do it, because it would be quite a new duty and entail a great deal of extra exertion on their part. Of course this is nothing but my personal opinion.

44,953. We quite understand that?—I do not think myself, even if they were paid more and were willing to do it, they have the time; I think it would interfere with the other work.

44,954. Is not that a question of the numbers of the staff. On the question of organisation would it be desirable that this work should be done in the same office as the master's work in general, or is it desirable to keep up a separate office for this particular work?—I think it would entail more work on the clerks, which might be remedied by numbers; but it would also entail more work on the masters. I suppose these orders would have to be looked at by the masters—they might or might not be. If you treated the first class clerk just like a registrar and relied on him for the accuracy of the order, then we need not be troubled, and I do not see why we should be troubled, because after all it is only the detail; the correctness of the order depends upon us; we make the orders, and I do not see why the details should not be left to clerks to draw up.

44,955. I see part of the work of the first class clerks is preparing memoranda of orders made in chambers to be drawn up by the registrars. Would the preparing of the memoranda be materially different from the actual drawing up of the order?—I think I can better explain this by referring to something I have brought here. I have a report of my own on the subject which I am coming to presently. I do not know that we want any such heroic remedy. Here, for instance, is an order which we very frequently have made by the judge for inquiries in a debenture holder's action (producing same). You will see the nature of the order for such an inquiry.

44,956. Was this drawn up by the registrar?—Yes, because that is an order made by a judge in court. This order is not made in my chambers.

44,957. And this order would have been drawn from the notes made by the registrar in court, and from the documents?—Yes.

44,958. (Mr. Coward.) The endorsements on counsel's briefs?—Yes, partly from the briefs.

44,959. (Chairman.) In the case of a master's decision, the material on which the registrar draws up the order (if it is one of the class of orders that go to the registrar to be drawn up) is apparently memoranda prepared by the first class clerks?—Not necessarily by the first class clerks. In my chambers the second class clerk does that, except in the case of very difficult orders. That inquiry is brought into chambers to be worked out by the master, and an affidavit is brought in. This is neither an enormously big nor a very small case, but about an average case. I will hand to you now the answer to the inquiry (handing same to the Chairman).

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

44,960. May I go back to the point we were on. Is there any reason why a separate office should be maintained for that particular part of the work—the drawing up of this order?—If you will allow me, I will just explain this particular transaction which is a little complicated. I am coming to your point in a minute. Here is the certificate (producing same). This is our certificate in answer to that inquiry directed by the judge, signed by the master; it is a long document. That says who all the debenture holders are. It is very difficult to ascertain them; sometimes they are all over the Continent, and have to be advertised for, which causes a lot of trouble. Here is the draft certificate prepared by a first class clerk, which really comes before the other document (producing same). That certificate is an official document and is filed in the Central Office. When that is filed an order is made in chambers to pay the debenture holders. This order is made by the master and not by the judge at all, and you will see this one is signed by Master Hulbert. All this work is done in chambers by a first class clerk under the master's directions. Minutes are brought in by the solicitors, and then I say, "Order according to those minutes." Then the first class clerk is responsible for those minutes. Then the clerk—a second class clerk in my case—puts the names of the solicitors on it, and in most cases puts in the evidence on which it is founded, and that is sent to the registrar.

44,961. And on that the registrar prepares the order?—Yes. Then it goes to the registrar, and apparently he makes a working copy (producing same). Eventually this document is produced which is all perfected in the registrar's office. I have tried to find out what he does, and it is this: The registrar gets it re-drafted; any queries raised by the registrar are settled; he gets it printed; the solicitor gets it stamped with the court fees; it is then sent to the entering seat; the original order is kept first at the entry seat, and eventually at the Central Office; a duplicate order is sealed with the court seal and handed to the solicitor; this duplicate is then regarded for all purposes as the original order. That printed document I have shown to you I obtain from the solicitors; there is a duplicate of that in the Central Office. Therefore you can see how much is done in chambers and how much the registrar does.

44,962. Will you now tell us whether in your opinion there is advantage in that part of the work, which is done by the registrars, being done in a separate office?—I do not see any advantage in it being done in a separate office, only you must have the men to do it.

44,963. But assuming you have the men, there is no reason why it should not be done in the same office?—I personally do not see any reason. This is very important, but my colleagues may not agree with me over this—I think there is a considerable waste of time through the registrar's office, in respect of orders which are made in chambers, being separate from us. At present the registrars are independent officers; they are under the judge, and they are not in any sense under us; they are men of the same social position as we are, and their office is a very old one, and we always regard them as our equal officers. As I need not explain, the consequence is that the relations between the masters and the registrars are quite different from the relations between us and our clerks. Now it very frequently happens that when this draft order from chambers has gone to the registrar, the registrar puts what he calls "queries" on it. In most of those queries there is nothing very much, they are simply queries which, if the clerk in chambers raised them, could be put an end to in a few minutes by the clerk coming to me and asking me about them.

44,964. But under the present procedure it causes some little difficulty and loss of time. We need not, perhaps, go into the precise nature of the points?—No;

I think I had better not trouble you with the details, but they are well known to me.

44,965. Generally it causes difficulty and loss of time?—Yes.

44,966. And that difficulty and loss of time would be avoided if the offices were amalgamated?—Yes, and also avoid a little bit of friction. I feel very great diffidence in saying this, as I do not want to interfere with any other man's daily bread at all; I have great reluctance to do it, and I desire to be quite fair to the registrars. They often come themselves, although not obliged to, and see the masters over these queries. On some of these orders a good many queries may crop up, and after the registrar having been to see me, he being an independent officer, I do not like to ask him to come again, and I go, as a matter of courtesy, as between one gentleman and another, to see him. But, perhaps, it is a couple of days before I can go and see him in his office to catch him just after luncheon time or just before 4 o'clock; we are so busy with these lists, that you have seen that it is extremely inconvenient for a master to leave his work and go to the registrar, so, perhaps, I cannot go for two or three days, and that leads to delay.

44,967. And that inconvenience would be avoided if the two offices were amalgamated?—Yes; but now I come to a thought of mine, for what it is worth. As I said before, you must have the men to do it, whether the offices are amalgamated or not. That I follow; but I do not see why you should want such an heroic remedy for it, because I think if the registrars were, to a certain extent, attached to the masters for the purpose of drawing up these orders, and could manage to see the masters at convenient times, like the master's clerks see them, a great deal of this waste of time and friction would be avoided. By friction I mean that the registrars, some of whom are very clever men, raise sometimes subtle questions. Lawyers are all alike; every man can find fault with something another one has drawn. They raise these subtle questions, and they are raised by the solicitors' clerks sometimes, and some of those clerks I have been speaking of, who are not very clever people, and do not understand the queries, come into my room when I am in the middle of hearing an examination in some crucial case, and they say: "Sir, the registrar will not draw up the order; it is a great shame, but it is because of this or that." I say, "It is very inconvenient;" and they say, "It is most urgent." I have to stop my work and settle this query—which all leads to delay. I cannot help thinking that if the registrars were approached, being sensible men, they might make some suggestions (rather than have their office abolished) by which they could agree to sink their dignity perhaps a little bit, treat the matter in a businesslike sort of way, and avoid the friction and delay. It seems to me so easy to do it. The only difficulty I can see about it is that the courts have all been constructed for the administration as it is, and the registrar's office is a little distance away. Instead of—as with my clerks—being adjacent to me, the registrars are some little distance off.

44,968. I think we understand your view on that point?—If we had another clerk for drawing orders or the registrars were attached to us, we should have to rearrange the rooms.

44,969. We need not go into that. Will you turn now to the remaining question I wish to put to you, and that is as regards the age for retirement. In the case of clerks, to begin with, do you think it would be desirable to have the ordinary Civil Service rule of a fixed age for retirement?—The body of masters have said "No" in their answer. My own personal opinion is strongly this, that the duties of the masters and clerks, as you can see, are purely intellectual, and the longer a master or a clerk goes on with those duties the more experience he gets, and, what is quite as important experience, tact, patience, and those qualities which are absolutely necessary to get through the work without friction. It seems to me, as long as a man has those qualities, what is the use of compelling him to retire? I do not like being personal; I am 66 myself, but I am worth twice as much as I was as a master 20 years ago.

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

44,970. Putting aside for the moment any present masters or clerks, have you ever in the past known any master or clerk stopping on after he was past his best work?—That is a very difficult question to answer.

44,971. Putting aside any present members of the office?—That is a matter of opinion. I do not suppose their own opinion would be that, as a rule.

44,972. Is not that the difficulty which arises—sometimes a man's own opinion on the subject does not coincide with the opinions of others?—No, but I think he is made to learn their opinion, and I think he goes. I know one or two cases where that opinion has been conveyed politely to the gentleman, and, reluctantly, he has retired, and some of them live a long time after, too.

44,973. Your opinion is that there is no necessity for imposing an age limit?—That is our opinion, I think. I cannot contend for a minute that when a man is past his duties, whether a master or a clerk, he ought not to go. I quite agree he ought to go, and when either I or my friends come to that conclusion about myself, I shall go, but not until then.

44,974. (Mr. Matheson.) You said there were instances of fully qualified solicitors acting as clerks?—Yes, I think I know one or two solicitors.

44,975. Did they come in as third class clerks, or at what stage?—One man I am thinking about, and whom I know very well, I think came in as a third class clerk.

44,976. Having got his qualification before he came in?—Yes.

44,977. Do you think that if the prospects of promotion were better, there would be more instances of that sort?—Yes, I think there would be; but I think the man who is article'd and who intends to be a solicitor and likes it is very much wanting in ambition if he were to come into the Chancery chambers, where the utmost he can get is 600*l.* a year. I do not think solicitors, as a rule, would be content with making 600*l.* a year.

44,978. What do you consider is the attendance of your clerks. What sort of hours do they keep in the day?—They are obliged to keep certain hours. There is a book. They have to be there from 10 to 4. They have to sign a book.

44,979. Supposing you want to keep them after 4? They have to stay if I want them after 4, and they willingly do that.

44,980. There is no system of overtime?—There is no payment for overtime, but they are all very conscientious men. The idea of every one of us is to get the work done. We are obliged to get the work done; if we do not get it done there are complaints. The judges complain and send for us, and want to know why there is any delay.

44,981. (Mr. Coward.) First of all, a word with regard to the appointment of the masters. Formerly was it not the judge who appointed the masters?—Yes, I believe it was before the Judicature Act.

44,982. Can you tell us whether that system worked satisfactorily or not?—Yes, I think that worked satisfactorily.

44,983. The judges are accustomed to have the managing clerks of the solicitors before them?—They are.

44,984. And they know their capacity and know all about them?—That is so.

44,985. And are able to form their own conclusions?—Yes.

44,986. So that if there was a vacancy in the office, one would think that no one could be more able to determine who was a fit man than the judge who had heard these people constantly?—Yes.

44,987. Of course the appointments would be made from the offices of solicitors of large practice?—Yes.

44,988. And I suppose nobody would think that anyone could know of their fitness better than the judge before whom these people come?—The judge would know, and we know too.

44,989. I suggest to you that it would be very desirable that the judge should have a voice in these appointments?—Yes; they had it once. That is a question, of course, between the judges and the Lord Chancellor.

44,990. The Chairman asked you as to appointments from the Bar to masterships. I think perhaps you will agree with me that the men at the bar who have been 10 years or any lengthy time at the bar, if they had succeeded, would not want to take a master's place, because the prizes at the bar are so high?—They certainly would not.

44,991. Again, if they had not been successful their experience would be slight, certainly compared with the experience that a man in a large solicitor's office would have?—Certainly. They would not have the business experience.

44,992. You have rather astonished me upon one point, and that is the very long hours that are kept by the masters in chambers. At 11 o'clock you begin?—I get there at half-past 10, and then I have all sorts of things to do.

44,993. I suppose your first appointment would be at 11 o'clock?—Yes, as a rule, except in urgent cases. I might see a solicitor at a quarter to 11.

44,994. And your last appointment would be about 3.30 or a quarter to 4?—Yes; I confine the afternoon to long appointments.

44,995. How many masters should I find, out of all the masters, if I went down there at five minutes past 4 to-day, doing work?—You would find a good many there.

44,996. Should I really?—You would very likely find me there. I seldom, on an early day, leave before half-past 4. There is always something to do.

44,997. It is not an overworked office, is it? I do not wish to say anything unkind about it?—I do not know. It is a very well-worked office. I have plenty to do.

44,998. Then the vacations are very long?—Yes; but our work, as I explained to the Commission, is not only from 10 to 4; about every month I, and so do my colleagues, have some sort of case upon which we have to work a good many hours and a great number of days altogether. That does not occur every day. It is a well-worked office—I will put it in that way. I do not want to exaggerate it; but I know, because I have been there 29 years.

44,999. Nice short hours and good long vacations?—No, and yes.

45,000. There is another thing arising out of this question of vacations which I think I ought to suggest. There are altogether in the Chancery Masters' Office 60 people—masters and clerks?—Yes.

45,001. In the Long Vacation of ten weeks there is one master there?—Yes.

45,002. And a clerk or two?—All that master's staff of four clerks.

45,003. His particular staff?—His particular staff.

45,004. That is to say, two first class clerks, one second and one third class clerk?—Yes.

45,005. But all the others are away for the ten weeks?—Yes, they are away.

45,006. Except that the masters interchange?—Yes.

45,007. With regard to the work that is done by the masters. I am not at all sure that the Commissioners quite understand it. Every attendance before you, and every time you are engaged upon any work, the solicitors or the solicitors' clerks are before you?—Yes, and often counsel.

45,008. You deal with those matters just as if you were a judge?—Yes.

45,009. So when you talk about exercising your discretion you are exercising your discretion upon affidavits that are brought forward by them and arguments addressed to you by them?—That is so.

45,010. It is not your discretion in any other sense than that?—No, I mean it is founded on the principles of English justice.

45,011. On every application that comes before you that is one of real difficulty, as a rule you do not have to exercise your discretion or your judgment upon it, because it is always adjourned to the judge—speaking generally?—There are certain things that by the rules have to be adjourned to the judge, and we have to prepare notes and see that the right parties are there, and assist the judge generally.

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

45,012. Take for instance such a question as arises upon the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act passed the other day; you adjourn it to the judge?—Yes, that is a new Act. But I ought to explain that, as you know quite as well as I do, just as great difficulties arise in “accounts and inquiries” as in matters before the judge.

45,013. But all these things are done in precisely the same way; in all “accounts and inquiries” you have the vouchers, and all the vouching of the accounts is done by your juniors?—Yes, but there may be difficult questions of principle on an account.

45,014. If it comes to be a difficult question of principle, the master would decide it or refer it to the judge?—The practice now is to certify. The judges will not have the questions thrown at them. You have to certify on most difficult questions, on the law of partnership and other things.

45,015. With regard to the appointment of these clerks, if you are going to appoint from the third class to the second class you have got only 12 clerks from which to make the selection?—Yes.

45,016. Would you not be much more likely to get a satisfactory clerk to go into the second class if you had a more extended range from which to select him?—That is so.

45,017. Instead of taking one from 12, there being 5,000 in the City of London from whom you might select, would not you get a better selection?—Yes, you would.

45,018. I should think it speaks for itself?—Yes, I think you would, only you see the little unfairness in that to the third class man.

45,019. I do not know that there is more unfairness there than there would be, for instance, in my office. I do not see any distinction to be drawn at all. Why should there be?—Supposing you have a very capable man.

45,020. Then he would go up?—If you have a very capable third class clerk, it is a little bit hard on him if his promotion is retarded by a man being appointed per saltum to a second class clerkship.

45,021. What you have to consider is not his promotion, but what is going to be most beneficial to the Service?—But to treat people fairly is beneficial.

45,022. At any rate, there is the point?—Some of my colleagues have little differences of opinion about that.

45,023. There may be a question as to whether all these clerks who are in this office are really essential for this purpose, because you must remember they have very short hours and very long vacations?—I cannot guarantee the work of my chambers being done as well as it has been done for nearly 29 years if you take away any of my clerks; it will be done, of course.

45,024. I think you would agree with me in this, that the more experienced the man the more efficiently will the work be done, and the more economically in point of time?—Yes, I agree with that.

45,025. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Your clerks are appointed at the same salary as the clerks in the Central Office?—Yes; I think so.

45,026. I suppose the men appointed to the two offices are about the same kind of men?—Yes; I should think so. I have nothing to do with appointments in the Central Office.

45,027. Of your clerks one-half are in the first class, but in the Central Office one-sixth are in the first class?—Yes; I believe that is so.

45,028. Do you think there is some reason why you should have more first class men than the Central Office?—Yes; because there is quite enough of what I call difficult work for two first class men to do; that is to say, the most difficult work, which I think must be entrusted to a first class clerk, requires two men to do it. I think the work that one of my first class men does is equally as difficult as the work done by the other first class clerk.

45,029. In your judgment there is a larger proportion of difficult work to be done in your department than in the Central Office?—There is no doubt whatever about that.

45,030. And, therefore, the men ought to be paid more?—Certainly.

45,031. But they are the same type of men, and appointed under the same conditions?—Yes; the same type of men, only more experienced.

45,032. When the clerks become candidates they are referred by the Lord Chancellor to the senior master?—Yes, they have been by Lord Haldane, but not before, I think.

45,033. How long have you been senior master?—Two years ago last October. I became senior master in October 1912.

45,034. You put the clerks through a careful examination as to their qualifications?—Yes; as severe an examination as I can.

45,035. And that careful examination of their qualifications is, in your judgment, a better guarantee of capacity than a competitive examination would be?—Yes; I think so.

45,036. Since you have been senior master one clerk has been appointed in the chambers of the Chancery judges?—Yes.

45,037. He was therefore referred to you?—I suppose he was; but I have the answers of all the candidates carefully kept in a drawer, and I can tell you for certain whether he was.

45,038. Was he a solicitor's clerk?—There are so many of them I cannot tell without reference to my list, but I will look it up and let you know.

45,039. I see by the list that two have been appointed since you have been there?—Yes, and according to the regulations they ought to have been referred to me.

45,040. When you put them through your severe examination into their qualifications it constituted a better guarantee of their efficiency than any possible competitive examination?—Yes, I put very practical questions.

45,041. Was the second one a solicitor's clerk?—I am sorry to say I cannot tell without looking at the file. I have all the questions and their answers. I shall be very pleased to let the Chairman know.

45,042. Can you tell me when the second one was appointed?—All I know about their appointments is the fact of their coming to me, and then I do not know anything further about them unless they come to my chambers. I should only hear by accident about their being appointed in any other chambers.

45,043. The second one must have been appointed a few weeks ago, because his name is added in manuscript on our list?—I will look at my list and send the particulars to the Chairman.

45,044. I was anxious to discover what trace the process had left on your memory?—About thirty have been before me, and the qualifications are all so much alike.

45,045. Each master has attached to him a group of four clerks?—Yes.

45,046. When a third class clerk in that group becomes qualified for the second class, is he moved to a second class vacancy in another group, or is he retained in the original group?—He is moved to wherever the vacancy occurs. If he is in my division and the vacancy is in the division of, say, Master Fox (who happens to be here) he would take the vacancy in Master Fox's division and I should have a fresh third class clerk sent to me.

45,047. But are clerks ever moved for any other reason than promotion from one master to another—for instance, to gain experience?—No, generally speaking it is to fill up vacancies. I do not think they are moved for any other reasons.

45,048. Do you ever in your work employ a shorthand secretary?—No.

45,049. Do you think it would help you in your work if you did?—Curiously enough I do not think it would, because we have to write down our opinions and the principal data in coming to our decisions, and I think it would only worry me to have a clerk sitting by me. I can put it down just as quickly. There is a good deal of correspondence, but I generally draft it, and can do that almost as quickly as a shorthand writer. He would be a luxury perhaps if we had him, but he might not be employed, and if not employed he would be a nuisance.

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

45,050. Before the masters in Chancery were appointed your predecessors were called chief clerks?—Yes.

45,051. And those chief clerks were appointed by the Chancery judges?—Yes, they were in that day.

45,052. That, you think, is a custom which might be revived?—That is a delicate question between the Lord Chancellor and the Chancery judges. I fancy some of the Chancery judges think it is a mistake that it was altered.

45,053. You say the judges did in fact know all about the various solicitors who appeared before them?—They would have equal opportunity of gaining knowledge as we have.

45,054. As a fact was not it an accident of that widely extended knowledge that they almost invariably appointed relatives of their own or their wives to these posts?—That is a criticism of my superiors. I do not think I can well answer that. It is like a colonel; he must not challenge what his general says or does.

45,055. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Did I understand you to say that you had been 29 years in your present position?—To be quite correct, 28 years and eight months. It will be 29 years in June.

45,056. Were you a solicitor in practice before that?—I was.

45,057. Might I ask what age you were when you went into the Chancery chambers?—About 37½.

45,058. Did you go straight to the position of a master?—Yes.

45,059. Do you remember what your initial salary was?—It was 1,200*l.* a year.

45,060. Do you remember the circumstances of your nomination?—Yes.

45,061. By whom were you nominated?—I was nominated by the Lord Chancellor.

45,062. Do you remember the way in which you approached the Lord Chancellor, or how you succeeded in getting a nomination?—I had, of course, some good influence. I think Lord Morley of Blackburn was one of those who assisted me to get my appointment.

45,063. (Mr. Holt.) Lord Herschell was Lord Chancellor at the time?—Yes.

45,064. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) And your qualification was that you had been a solicitor?—I had been a solicitor for over 10 years. I made my own practice.

45,065. Was that statutory condition we have heard of this morning in operation at that time?—Yes, it always has been since the Act of 15 and 16 Victoria which constituted the masters.

45,066. Have you ever known of any case where an official, subordinate to a master, has been appointed to the position of a master?—No; he cannot be, because he has not got the qualification, which must be 10 years' practice as a solicitor.

45,067. I understood you to say that all the masters except one have leave during the vacations?—Yes, during the Long Vacation and the Christmas Vacation; but during the Easter and Whitsun Vacations there are three of us there.

45,068. But all the clerks are still at the office when the master is away?—No, the clerks are away, too. The masters in attendance and their own individual staffs are there, but the other masters and their staffs are away.

45,069. Do I understand that during the vacation the only clerks who are there are the clerks serving under the master who happens to be there?—That is so.

45,070. All the other clerks are on vacation also?—Yes, they are away.

45,071. Including third class clerks?—Yes, all the other clerks are away.

45,072. Am I to understand then that the third class clerks will get, say, 10 weeks' vacation in the year?—Yes, they get nearly the same vacation as we do, except that they may have to stay a day or two later and come back a day or two earlier.

45,073. And in addition to this vacation holiday are they entitled to any ordinary leave during the sittings of the courts?—No, they have no right to that except for illness.

45,074. Are all your third class clerks men who have served in a solicitor's office?—No, not all.

45,075. But I understand you to say that you look upon that as being a very necessary qualification for a third class clerk?—Yes, we do.

45,076. Then will you explain why clerks have been appointed who have not this essential qualification?—I think you will have to ask the Lord Chancellor.

45,077. But I understood that you and one or two of your colleagues were the selection committee?—For promotion we are, but not for appointment. With regard to appointments, since Lord Haldane came into office he sends candidates for appointment to me to be examined.

45,078. Precisely; and then Lord Haldane acts upon your recommendation?—He has his own discretion about that.

45,079. That I understand, but he must to a certain extent be guided by your decision?—I think that is his desire, and he endeavours to follow it.

45,080. Have any candidates been sent to you by Lord Haldane who did not possess the qualification of previous experience in a solicitor's office?—Yes.

45,081. Then how do you reconcile that with your statement that you regard such experience as being absolutely necessary, and that, if a clerk appointed does not possess that experience, he is a nuisance to the office for three years?—We regard it as the necessary qualification, but we are not the actual appointing parties.

45,082. That I quite understand, but have you approved candidates that Lord Haldane sent to you who have not had that previous experience in a solicitor's office? You have had 30 candidates before you, you say?—I have reported more favourably as to candidates who have been in a solicitor's office than I have with respect to those who have not. I have always told the Lord Chancellor that that was a great drawback, but I have told him that they had other qualifications, and then it is entirely in the discretion of the Lord Chancellor whether he appoints them or not.

45,083. But they have been appointed?—I am not aware that any have been appointed recently. This new system has been only going on about two years. I must make further inquiries about it.

45,084. (Chairman.) It would be convenient to the Commission if you would give us a list of the appointments in the last 10 years, showing in which cases candidates have had experience in a solicitor's office, and in which cases they have not, and what was the length of their experience. Perhaps it would also be convenient if you added in each case the age of the candidate at the time of appointment?—Yes, I will let you know that.

45,085. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Have you an age limit for candidates?—Are you referring to the masters?

45,086. No, to third class clerks?—I am not aware of any age limit.

45,087. Do you make appointments direct to the second and first classes?—We never make the appointments; the Lord Chancellor makes the appointments.

45,088. Does anybody make appointments direct to the second and first classes?—Yes, there have been some such appointments made. I can find that out for you.

45,089. (Chairman.) Perhaps you will add to the paper you are going to give us details of any appointments made direct to the second or first class during the last 10 years?—Yes. I remember before the 10 years one solicitor being put into a second class clerkship.

45,090. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) You told us you thought that your system of ascertaining the capacity of a candidate by personal interview was better than any system of examination. Could you give us some idea of the method you adopt when a candidate comes before you. What is the nature of your own examination as to his capacity?—I did not know that I should be asked the question, and I am sorry I have not brought the form of questions with me. I was supplied by Mr. Liddell, the Lord Chancellor's private secretary,

18 February 1915.]

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

with a list of questions, and those are the questions I put to the candidates.

45,091. Could you supply the Commission with a copy of that form of questions?—Certainly I will. As I recollect the questions they are, of course, name and address, age, what education, what experience legal or otherwise, what certificates of merit and capacity. Those are the principal questions that come to my mind at the moment.

45,092. In coming to a conclusion as to the fitness of a candidate for appointment, are you guided at all by your general impression gathered from conversation with him?—Yes, to a large extent, certainly, by my general impression of him. I may tell you that as to the first two or three candidates I took the trouble to go and see the people from whom they came. But the Lord Chancellor told me not to take quite so much trouble as that; he was satisfied if I got answers according to the form he gave me, but I still make inquiries a little beyond; I ask other clerks whether they know the man and what they think of him, but I no longer go to their principal, whoever he is.

45,093. The initial salary for a third class clerk is 100*l.* a year?—Yes.

45,094. And, generally speaking, you insist upon five years' experience in a solicitor's office?—That is what we think is proper.

45,095. Do you think that an initial salary of 100*l.* a year, with no very rosy prospects, and in view of the fact that they have had five years' experience in a solicitor's office, is sufficient to attract men of capacity?—No, I do not think it is. I think we have expressed in our evidence an opinion that it is not enough.

45,096. I see in your evidence you make some reference to clerks being brought in from other Government departments?—Yes.

45,097. Is that a fairly common practice?—Yes, I think it takes place fairly often.

45,098. But these transfers are only made on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, I assume?—That is all.

45,099. That is to say, these candidates have to go through precisely the same form as though they were not in the Government service already?—Of course they would have to pass their Civil Service examination first, but they would not be sent again to me to be examined. I have a list I might hand in, and you will see when they were appointed in the public service and when appointed to Chancery chambers (handing in a list).

45,100. I see the masters are unanimously of opinion that an age limit for retirement is not desirable?—That is so.

45,101. What is their reason for that?—We do not give any joint reason. I have given mine—that the duties are entirely intellectual, and that the older a man gets, as I said before, the more experience he gets, and the more tact he gets, and, as long as he continues to possess all those qualities, he is qualified to hold his post.

45,102. You know there is a general Civil Service rule of retirement at 65 years of age and after 40 years' service?—Yes.

45,103. Can you give me the reason why that should apply generally throughout the public service and not apply to your department? The reason you gave just now was that the longer a man is in the Service the greater knowledge he acquires, and, therefore, if compulsorily retired, he would be a loss?—As I have said, it is expert knowledge that is wanted in chambers, and in time they get more of that expert knowledge, like, for instance, an eminent surgeon who, I suppose, gets more experience every day, or an eminent professional man of any sort, up to a point, and then, I suppose, he declines like many unfortunately do.

45,104. Then, if we all decline when we have reached a certain point, would not you consider that a strong argument why a man should be compulsorily retired at an age when his faculties are likely to be impaired?—I agree when they have become impaired, but I have been looking at the ages and I happen to know a particular gentleman whose age is put at 71, and I know he has always been a very first-rate clerk, and, as far as I can see, he seems as alert as ever. I should say, so far as I know, he is quite as efficient as he ever was, plus more experience.

45,105. But I suppose the men who are below him in the scale consider that he is stopping the way of their promotion?—Yes, that may be so.

45,106. Although one might assume what your reply to this question would be, do you consider that the number of first class clerks and masters is not an unnecessary proportion of the total staff?—No, the number of masters and first class clerks I think are wanted to cope with the business.

45,107. What are your views about the question of the removal of the statutory qualification and thereby opening the way to the mastership for well-qualified first class clerks. Supposing, for instance, a first class clerk has been in the office for 20 or 25 years and has turned out to be an exceptionally able man, do you not think it desirable that the barrier should be removed which now blocks the way for further promotion for that man?—Generally speaking, I am averse to a barrier against any man who has ability; I can only say that the only difficulty I can see is that a clerk, however good he may be, has not had the experience that a master, who has been for 10 years a solicitor, has—the experience of responsibility and relying on his own judgment, and the clerk does not get any more experience of that particular character, of relying on his own judgment, as a clerk in chambers because he never does rely on his own judgment over anything that is difficult. I do not say that he might not be right, but he never does so rely; that is all I can say. I should imagine that a man who is constantly exercising the function of relying on himself and coming to a decision is more likely to be practised in so doing than a clerk who has never done it. I believe one of the most necessary qualities for anybody in the position of a master or a judge is to be able to come to a decision. There are heaps of very clever men I have known who cannot come to a decision at all. Therefore the quality of coming to a determined decision is very necessary in my opinion.

45,108. They belong to the class, I assume, who would not have any hesitation in coming to a decision provided they heard only one side of the case?—No judge or master would be foolish enough to say a word until he had heard both sides—I never do. You have touched upon a very delicate question, and that is the matter of my own appointment; I never expected to be asked, but as the subject has been broached I think I must say a little more about it.

45,109. (Chairman.) I do not think it necessary for us to go into the particular instance of your appointment, but if there is anything bearing on the general question which you wish to add we shall be glad to hear it?—I had other practical supporters; my cousin, the late retired Lord Justice Romer, supported me, and my brother-in-law, who was a master, who of course knew me and my capacity very well, supported me. I was also supported by the late Sir William Agnew, who knew me better than anybody else, because I had acted as his solicitor for 10 years in London, and anybody who knew Sir William Agnew knew he was a pretty shrewd judge of the capacity of a man to do business, and of his practical experience. I also had about 20 or 30 certificates from counsel and solicitors who knew me very well. I should add that I passed in honours at my final examination for solicitor. So that I had plenty of credentials. I remember also that I was going to be appointed to the chambers of Mr. Justice Kay, a very shrewd judge, and I had an interview with him. So, I think, there was pretty searching criticism.

45,110. (Mr. Boutwood.) There was one point in your evidence I did not quite follow, and that was about the appointments when the Lord Chancellor refers men to you. Do I understand that candidates for third class clerkships specify which side of the Court, whether King's Bench or Chancery, they wish to be appointed to, or do they simply make a general application?—Clerks applying for the King's Bench, I think I am right in saying, would go to Sir John Macdonell, the senior master of the King's Bench Division.

Master THOMAS ANSDALL ROMER.

45,111. So when a clerk applies for appointment in the Supreme Court he does specify whether he wants to go to the Chancery or the King's Bench side?—I should think he would specify if he wanted the King's Bench or the Chancery. If Chancery he would be sent to me. Some of them have a very vague idea where they want to go, but they want to get somewhere—I have had some of them—and they would come to me very likely.

45,112. This list you have handed in seems to be a list of your 12 third class clerks, but the question put to you was about the clerks who had been brought into the second class from other Government offices. This list does not throw any light on that?—That was only prepared for our guidance in advising the Lord Chancellor about promotions, so that we could judge how long they had been in the public service and how long in Chancery chambers. You will see it referred to in our evidence as to the methods of promotion. It does not pretend to go any further.

45,113. But one wants to know about appointments from the other Government departments to second class clerkships. I should like to know: (1) How many of those appointments have been made; (2) Were they first class or second class men, or writers, and what was their position in the other Government departments; and (3) did they have to go through the usual Civil Service examination? Those three points arise on that, and this list, of course, does not help one?—I am going to give the Chairman a list of appointments for the last 10 years.

45,114. That is to be a list of appointments during the last 10 years to the third class, but now we are talking about appointments from other Government departments directly to second or first class. That is a separate thing?—I can get that if you like. I cannot answer it off-hand.

45,115. (Chairman.) You are going to give particulars of all direct appointments to the first and second class in the last ten years. Perhaps you will add whether the clerks so appointed had had any previous service in any Government department, and, if so, what?—Yes.

45,116. (Mr. Boutwood.) Do you know what happens when a man is brought in from another department? Is he brought in under Clause 7, or does he have to sit at your usual examination?—I should say if he has not passed the Civil Service examination, he would have to pass it.

45,117. But you have not had to deal with a case like that yourself?—No.

45,118. There is another thing in this statement you handed in which I do not quite understand. One sentence reads as though promotions were rather slower in the Chancery chambers than in the Central Office, because you say, "Complaints have been made that at the present time there are clerks in Chancery chambers who have served over 14 years, whereas in the Central Office the longest service of a third class clerk is under eight years." That looks like a complaint of slow promotion?—Yes; in Chancery chambers it is a complaint of slow promotion.

45,119. You have only 12 third class clerks, 12 second, and 24 first. Those figures suggest fairly rapid promotion. They suggest that the clerks in chambers ought to have better chances than the clerks in the Central Office, where there are fewer higher posts. Why is it that promotion is slower in Chancery chambers than in the Central Office?—I believe one of the causes is by promotion right away to second or first class clerkships. Another cause is men being brought into the third class from other Government departments, and also the fact, I suppose, that the staff is not nearly so large, being only about 60 in Chancery chambers, whereas, in the Central Office, it is very much larger. Of course, promotion in a smaller body would not be so quick as in a larger body, and lawyers are all very long-lived people, too—after clergymen—which is another reason.

45,120. (Mr. Holt.) When the office of master falls vacant, is there any general public advertisement issued that there is a vacancy for a master, and are applications invited?—No.

45,121. Therefore the applicants are confined to persons who get private information on the subject?—Yes; I think so.

45,122. Are any of the present masters persons who were in practice in the provinces as solicitors, or were they all in practice in London?—I think all in London—looking through the names.

45,123. It is rather curious that no provincial solicitors should ever have been appointed to this position?—It is, when you look at it, but it never struck me before.

45,124. There are plenty of solicitors of repute and capacity in the provinces?—Undoubtedly; but there may have been some appointments before the present list.

45,125. Yes; but you are satisfied that none of the present masters were before appointment solicitors practising in the provinces?—Yes; I think so. It is quite possible that one or two of them may have practised in the country, but I do not think so.

45,126. But at any rate at the time of their appointment you believe they have been solicitors practising in London?—Yes.

45,127. Therefore in practice this appointment is not only confined to a solicitor of ten years' standing but is confined to a London solicitor?—I suppose that is the effect of it, but the country solicitor is equally qualified.

45,128. (Mr. Coward.) The country solicitors are not so familiar with the practice; probably that may be the answer to it?—Yes.

45,129. (Mr. Holt.) I only want the fact; it is for us to draw our own conclusions. When you became senior master, did you become senior master automatically or were you appointed to that position?—Simply automatically. Unfortunately I had been there the longest.

45,130. Supposing by any mischance you were run over in a street accident on the way back, would Master Fox proceed to step into your shoes to-morrow without a word being said by anybody?—Yes, he would have that misfortune.

45,131. Therefore it is not an office to which there is a definite appointment; the Lord Chancellor does not look through the list of masters and say, "That is the best man"?—No merit whatever; purely date of appointment.

45,132. It is mere seniority?—Yes, that is all.

45,133. In the same way when a clerk is appointed there is no public advertisement?—No.

45,134. Supposing one of your clerks retires or dies, what happens next? Do you represent to the Lord Chancellor that you want another clerk?—Yes, I should represent to Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie that there was a vacancy.

45,135. What would happen then?—He would probably consult me about filling it, and no doubt consult the Lord Chancellor too.

45,136. Supposing your clerk was killed or died suddenly, how long would it be before you got another one?—I dare say it would be a month; they take a little time to consider.

45,137. Supposing you lost a clerk by retirement, of which you no doubt get considerable notice?—Yes.

45,138. Would you then have another clerk to come in the day the old man goes out?—No, not the next day, but probably the same thing would happen, as I have described if death happened. There would be a consultation, and then of course it would mean promotion probably. Then I should call a meeting of the sub-committee of the masters to say who in their opinion ought to be appointed, in which case we should consider the question of priority and fitness, and all that.

45,139. Supposing the vacancy arises as the result of an anticipated retirement, are the steps necessary for filling the vacancy taken in advance of the actual retirement or only when the actual retirement has taken place?—I do not know, but I suppose if I knew that a man was going in a few months I should consult Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie about it, and then we should call a meeting of the sub-committee and give the Lord Chancellor an opinion as to who should be promoted. There would be no public notice given.

45,140. With regard to office hours, am I right in inferring that, as a general rule, in your office you take about one hour for lunch or thereabouts?—They are not supposed to take an hour.

45,141. I notice in this list of appointments that, roughly speaking, no appointment is made between 12.30 and 2 o'clock, which rather suggests one hour for lunch?—That is a list of one of the masters. I can explain that. That 12.30 appointment will very likely last until about half-past one. It is just to allow the master time to get lunch; he does not take very long at lunch. We are too busy; we are only too glad to get back.

45,142. Now in this paper you have handed in I see on Tuesday, 16 February, at 11 o'clock you had three appointments which lasted a quarter of an hour altogether?—Yes, those hours are simply approximate.

45,143. Then those three could not have been very difficult cases?—You cannot tell at all how long a case will last. That time table is simply to oblige the solicitors by not bringing them there before the time. It is no criterion whatever of the length the case will take. We endeavour to put the short appointments in in the morning. I generally have short appointments at 11 and half-past, and then I have about three half-hour appointments, or cases which I think will be about half an hour each.

45,144. Do you remember what happened last Tuesday?—No; I have so many cases. I have my notes of everything and I could tell you on reference.

45,145. You have handed in your own list of the appointments. Your own cases are ruled out, does that mean that you succeeded in attending to them and the business was done?—Yes, that means that the business was got rid of that day.

45,147. If there were, roughly speaking, eight cases put through in an hour, they could not have been exceedingly difficult?—But those cases are not disposed of between those times; they may go on much longer. You cannot say how long a case will take; it is quite approximate. You may have a case down there which is very urgent or something, and which will take an hour. Any of those three cases down at a certain time might take three-quarters of an hour or an hour.

45,148. This is an estimate of time which is probably based upon an average of what takes place?—Yes.

45,149. Therefore, taken as an average, it must be approximately correct?—Yes.

45,150. I see Master Ridsdale estimated he would get through seven cases between 11 and 11.30?—Yes.

45,151. If that is so, they could not be very difficult or intricate cases?—I cannot say how any other master arranges his list at all. I cannot answer for him. He is a very able master, but I cannot answer as to how he does his cases.

45,152. But the morning cases for all the masters right through the list show that on an average they are estimated to take something between five and ten minutes a case, ten minutes being rather above than below the average?—Yes, they are put down like that.

45,153. That is the length of time these cases do take?—Yes; but, generally speaking, most of them last a good deal longer.

45,154. There is a gentleman in the master's department—in Master Keen's department—called Mr. Hare; he is a first class clerk, and under his name I see this put down for his appointment, "2.30 to 4, Jury."

Does "jury" mean that he is going to hear a case with a jury?—I cannot speak about any other master's list than my own. If you want to know about another master's list not my own, I think you must ask the master to explain.

45,155. Look at the entry and tell me is the word "Jury" accidentally the name of a person, or does it mean that he is going to hear a case with a jury?—That is the name of the plaintiff.

45,156. Would a clerk ever hear a case with a jury?—No.

45,157. (Mr. Holt.) I find that this Mr. Hare was going to hear a case that was estimated to take one and a half hours?—Yes.

45,158. That would involve a considerable degree of professional knowledge and skill?—Yes. He is a first class clerk, and that would probably mean taking accounts and vouching them, or preparing a draft certificate in answer to accounts, or preparing any other certificate made by the master on a pedigree or anything else.

45,159. When you hear these cases which are put down opposite your name, is one of your clerks present in the room?—No, I sit alone.

45,160. You sit alone, and you yourself record your decision?—Yes, I put it down and make elaborate notes. We put it all down ourselves.

45,161. In longhand?—Yes, we make the notes as concise as possible. The clerk does the framework of the notes for us, what the appointment is about, and the name of the solicitors and the master, if the solicitors appear, puts down that they have appeared, and then they read affidavits, and it is our business to put the affidavits on the notes very shortly and then make a few notes during the argument, which are useful to assist us in the case. Then we say, we "order so and so," and we give the concise epitome of the order which we make.

45,162. Then, when you are dealing with these cases, you get no assistance from your clerk at all, and he does not see what you are doing or how you are doing it?—No, we do not want him then. He is busy doing his own work.

45,163. But it is no part of his work to assist you in your judicial duties?—No.

45,164. (Mr. Shipley.) Do you consider the accommodation for your clerks is satisfactory, that the rooms are well ventilated, well lit, and well cleaned?—Yes, they all have most excellent and healthy rooms, I think. As I said before, I got the best in the building. There are attendants there, and I think the rooms are fairly well cleaned.

45,165. It struck me, yesterday, that the rooms looked rather dark?—Some of them are, but I am glad to say mine are not.

45,166. (Chairman.) That is all we have to ask you.—Do you wish to see any of these other documents which I have brought?

45,167. Perhaps you will leave them with the Commission, and we will return them to you?—This first set of documents is an inquiry as to who are entitled on a pedigree to payments. There is also a foreclosure order, and a redemption order. Most elaborate inquiries have to be made when you have a first and second subsequent mortgagees, giving them all periods to redeem. Those are very complicated, and I may say, with regard to those orders, if there is the slightest error of a figure in those orders, the whole thing has to be done over again, and perhaps nine months' time is wasted. The other papers are an administration order, and a partition order [handing in the documents].

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER, called and examined.

45,168. (Chairman.) What is the post you occupy?—I am Senior Registrar in the Chancery Division.

45,169. How long have you held that post?—I have held the post of senior registrar two years.

45,170. And for what period have you been registrar?—Since the year 1889.

45,171. First, will you tell us what the statutory position of the registrars and their clerks is?—The statutory position is this: we have always considered that we came under 5 Victoria, cap. 5. No one could be promoted to a registrarship except under that Act.

18 February 1915.]

MR. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

45,172. Perhaps you will read the section or the words that apply to the office of registrar?—It is the 38th Section: "And whereas by an Act passed in the fourth year of the reign of His Majesty King William the Fourth intituled an Act for the regulation of the proceedings and practice of certain offices of the High Court of Chancery, six Registrars of the said Court of Chancery were appointed, and provision was thereby made for filling up vacancies in the office of Registrar of the said Court: And whereas it is expedient and necessary that the number of Registrars of the said Court of Chancery should be increased; be it therefore enacted, That from and after the said 15th day of October one thousand eight hundred and forty-one there shall be ten Registrars of the said Court," and the names of the ten registrars are given.

45,173. Without going through the whole of the words, perhaps you will tell us the effect of it. Is it the effect that a certain number of registrars and a certain number of clerks were appointed?—Yes, ten registrars are appointed by that section.

45,174. And for appointment to registrar previous service as a clerk was indispensable?—That is so.

45,175. And the clerks had a statutory right of succession to the registrarship?—That is so.

45,176. Was there any statutory qualification for appointment as a clerk?—The qualification for appointment as a clerk is in the 41st Section, which says: "That the Lord Chancellor shall appoint some proper person who shall have been admitted and entered on the Roll of Solicitors or Attorneys of some one of Her Majesty's Courts in Westminster Hall, or who shall have duly served a term of not less than five years under Articles of Clerkship to some Solicitor or Attorney of some one of the said Courts." That is the section under which a clerkship is held.

45,177. That is to say, the candidate must be an admitted solicitor, or must have served a term of five years under articles?—That is so.

45,178. Does that statutory right of succession to the registrarship still exist?—We maintain it does. I should like to qualify that. It does not exist as regards all the clerks now appointed, because they were appointed without right of succession. I am wrong in saying it does exist, but if a man is appointed a registrar, he can only be appointed under this Act. I should like to make that clear.

45,179. Do any of the present clerks enjoy that statutory right?—I think none of the present clerks have any statutory right of succession.

45,180. I see in the memorandum prepared by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie for the Kekewich Commission in 1907 it is stated: "There is at this moment only one of the principal clerks with the statutory right of succession to a registrarship; five others have been appointed with notice that they have no vested right of succession; three others have been appointed simply as second class clerks in the Supreme Court, and have no better rights than any other clerks in the Chancery Division, except the advantage and opportunity which any of them has of showing himself to be a desirable man to retain and promote in the department." May we take that as a correct statement of the position at that time?—That is correct.

45,181. Has the one principal clerk who had then the statutory right been since appointed registrar?—He has.

45,182. So at the present moment none of them have the statutory right of succession?—None of them.

45,183. There is a point of nomenclature which I should like to clear up. You speak in your précis of evidence of "principal clerks." In the Establishment Book which we have before us it speaks of "clerks to registrars"?—"Principal clerks" is a conventional term to distinguish them from assistant clerks.

45,184. Is "principal clerks" synonymous with "clerks to registrars"?—That is so.

45,185. "Principal clerks" applies to those persons represented in the establishment list as "clerks to registrars"?—That is so.

45,186. Are the second and third class clerks otherwise known as "assistant clerks"?—No; second class clerks are appointed where vacancies have occurred in the establishment. They have no right of succession; in fact they do not come on to the establishment until they get to be one of the first six clerks under the new arrangement.

45,187. What do you mean by the "establishment"?—The Treasury have said that the establishment shall consist of nine registrars and six principal clerks. The others are simply second class clerks appointed as second class clerks.

45,188. On the same footing as other second class clerks in the offices of the Supreme Court?—Precisely; they go up 15l. a year.

45,189. The "principal clerks" or "clerks to registrars," as otherwise called, have a separate scale of their own, which differs from the scale of first class clerks in the other offices?—Precisely so.

45,190. In order to be clear as to the present position, there are now how many registrars?—Nine.

45,191. That is including the senior registrar?—Including the senior registrar.

45,192. I think one of them has been appointed on a different scale of salary?—The junior registrar has been appointed on a different scale, and upon rather different terms, in this way: he was appointed at a salary of only 1,000l. a year, but when he was appointed at that salary Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie wrote to me to say that in three years' time he should then apply to the Treasury to put him in the same scale as the others—that is 1,250l., progressing by 50l. a year to 1,500l.

45,193. Was there also an intention to reduce the number of registrars when a further vacancy occurred?—What I understood him to say in his letter was, "Put him on the same scale whether there was any reduction or not."

45,194. Are you aware whether it is proposed to make a further reduction in the number?—The intention now is to reduce the number to eight registrars and eight principal clerks. Therefore, on the occurrence of another vacancy he will, as a matter of fact, go up to one of the eight, and be entitled to the full pay attached thereto.*

45,195. He would succeed to the full salary and one appointment would be suppressed?—I understood Sir Kenneth to mean that if in three years' time he did not succeed, he would then apply to the Treasury to raise him to the same scale as the others. I should like to add that there was put in the Order at his request a special note that he was not to hold his office after the age of 70. That condition was made in his case, and that was the first time the condition was made.

45,196. Has each registrar one clerk specially attached to him?—Each registrar has one clerk specially attached to him.

45,197. That is to say, the six principal clerks and three of the second class clerks?—Yes. The junior second class clerk has never yet been appointed. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie wrote to me to say he was going to send down a man from the House of Lords who was a qualified solicitor to help; but the Lord Chancellor declined, pending this Commission, to fill up the vacancy. So he is appointed a second class clerk at 250l. a year, and he has not had any increase in the two years he has been there; that is to say, he has been without the usual increase of salary which is attaching to that post.

45,198. You have certain clerks who attend to particular business—a petition clerk and a clerk of entry, and one or two others with special duties of that kind?—Yes.

45,199. Are those clerks separated from the general body, or are they at the same time attached to a registrar?—They are separated entirely from the general body. They are separate clerks altogether. We used to have two clerks of entry, but now we only have one. It was thought the work could be done by one, and I think it can be.

* A letter, dated 24th February 1913, received from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, states that the Treasury were prepared to concur in an order constituting the office with eight registrars (not to take effect until the next vacancy), with a provision of eight senior and three second class clerks.—C. E. F.

18 February 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

45,200. How is that arranged. There are nine registrars, each of whom has one principal clerk and one third class clerk attached to him. There are six principal clerks, four second class clerks, and nine third class clerks. That would seem to leave only one clerk over after allowing one principal clerk and one assistant clerk for each registrar?—It is a little complicated. One registrar is without a third class clerk attached to him, and we have been unable to get him a clerk, because my immediate junior's clerk went, on the occasion of a vacancy at the entry seat, to that seat, and was made a second class clerk. We have never been able to get an appointment from the Treasury of a third class clerk in his place, so the result is that, as regards the junior registrar, they all take it in turns to go up to the seat; they make a sort of rota for him, and they take it in turns to go and assist at his seat.

45,201. Will you say generally what the work of the registrar is. It is partly in court and partly out of court, is it not?—I have sent in a statement as to the registrars' office and their duties as registrars, and that statement, I think, contains exactly what we have to do. I made it as short as I could.

45,202. What are the duties of a registrar in court?—He records the names of the witnesses, swears them, marks exhibits and other documents put in evidence, and notes the documents and evidence put in, and any objections to evidence, consents, waivers, submissions, or undertakings by counsel or directions by the Court. It is also the duty of the registrar to call the attention of the judge to any technical irregularity in the proceedings, and to any order proposed to be taken which seems to be a departure from the accustomed practice of the Court, and to any points which, from his experience of drawing up orders, he sees are likely to arise in formulating the order which the Court makes.

45,203. How many judges do you attend in court?—We have seven courts, six courts of first instance and one appeal court. Sometimes there are two appeal courts.

45,204. Is an appeal court sitting all the time?—Sometimes, when it takes work which is not Chancery work, of course we do not attend.

45,205. You only attend on its Chancery work?—Yes. Occasionally it may take appeals to help the King's Bench side, or workmen's compensation cases from County Courts. But we always attend the Appeal Court on all Chancery matters, and on all appeals from the Palatine courts and in company cases.

45,206. In the six Chancery courts is the registrar always in attendance when the Court is sitting?—Either the registrar or one of his qualified clerks.

45,207. Has a change recently been made which permits a clerk sometimes to discharge the duties in court?—That is under the new rule. After the Kekewich Committee reported, they passed a rule to that effect.

45,208. Does that relieve the registrars of any considerable part of their duty of attendance in court?—We can send our principal clerks into court when actions with witnesses are heard, but there was some feeling, I believe, by the judges, that they did not like a principal clerk in court when the non-witness lists were taken, and I think it is quite right.

45,209. The registrar has to take notes of all essential points in the progress of the action?—That is so.

45,210. And to keep the court straight on points of practice?—That is so.

45,211. Those are his principal duties?—Yes, and swearing witnesses, marking exhibits, and advising the judge upon all questions of practice that arise upon each case.

45,212. Swearing witnesses and marking exhibits are duties for the performance of which it would not be necessary to have a person of the calibre of a registrar?—Quite so.

45,213. As regards the duties out of court, is the principal duty the drawing up of orders on judgments?—Drawing up orders on judgments made in court.

45,214. Besides those made in court, what orders on judgments does a registrar draw up?—Judgments in Chancery actions tried at the assizes upon production of the associate's certificate, and orders on judgments of official and special referees on production of a proper authority from the referee.

45,215. There are certain other classes of orders?—Yes. Orders made by the Lord Chancellor on petitions for transfer, and all orders made on petitions of course.

45,216. What is a petition of course?—That is a petition to tax a bill principally.

45,217. Besides those orders, do you draw up some of the orders made by masters?—All the masters' orders they send up to us.

45,218. What class of orders do they send you?—All orders dealing with funds in court we must draw, and all orders they choose to select to send us. I believe the Esher Committee in 1885 recommended that the orders should be drawn up in chambers, and there was a rule introduced for that purpose, but then the judges qualified that rule, and said that the only orders to be drawn up in chambers were procedure orders.

45,219. We have had it in evidence that roughly half the number of orders made in chambers are drawn up in chambers, and half are sent to the registrars to be drawn up. Would you agree with that estimate?—Last year the number of orders made in chambers by the masters and entered in our office was 2,512. The total number of written orders which were entered in our office—not printed orders—were 5,520, exclusive of orders of course.

45,220. The first figure is the number of orders actually drawn up in chambers?—Yes, procedure orders, 2,512.

45,221. And the orders that were passed on to you to be drawn up were over 5,000?—Of the written orders, including orders made in court which are not orders to be printed. I have not details, and am not able to state exactly which orders were made in court and which in chambers.

45,222. The 5,000 include orders made in court and chambers together?—Written orders—not printed orders.

45,223. What would be the number of printed judgments?—1,566.

45,224. So that, according to those figures, a great many more than half go to the registrar?—Yes, I should have thought so.

45,225. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) If the numbers made in court are about equal to those which come to the registrar the two figures might be reconciled. Those made in court do not go to the masters at all?—I am astonished to hear that the masters said that they send half to us. I should have thought they sent a great many more.

45,226. (Chairman.) Your figure for the orders drawn up in chambers is 2,000 odd?—2,512. That is accurate. It is a statement prepared for me by my entry clerk.

45,227. Are all those orders drawn up in chambers sent to you?—They are procedure orders.

45,228. They come to your department for record?—Yes.

45,229. Are there any orders made in chambers which do not come to your department for record?—Yes. The master endorses the summonses very often, and they put a 3s. stamp on the endorsement, and that goes for the order, but it is never entered.

45,230. Perhaps the master was counting those as orders?—I should think he must mean that, because they make a lot of those orders. That is the only way I can account for his statement.

45,231. Will you tell us of what the process of drawing up an order consists. What are the materials on which an order is drawn up?—The solicitors who have the carriage of the order are obliged to bring their brief to the registrar's seat, where his assistant clerk sits, within three days; after the order is pronounced the assistant clerk collects the part-heard notes from the other registrars. (A case might have gone on for three or four days.) Then he takes the part-heard notes and the brief to the principal clerk, and the principal clerk then prepares the order.

45,232. You are now speaking of a case which is in court?—I am talking of a court order. The order is then sent out for draft, and then it is put before the registrar; at least it is my practice, and I think the practice of most of the registrars, to see the draft before it goes to the solicitors. It would take about one clear day to make a copy, except in special things. The registrar then goes through the draft, puts his initials on the back of it if he sees that it is correctly drawn, corrects it where it is incorrectly drawn, and marks on the back "Appoint to settle." If it is a simple order and there is nothing on it, he will mark it for the order straight off, perhaps, but as a rule he marks it "Appoint to settle." Then the draft goes back to the assistant clerk, and the solicitors having carriage of the order come and fetch it.

18 February 1915.]

MR. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

45,233. Is the order ever drawn up by the solicitors?—Never.

45,234. Your practice in that respect differs from that of the King's Bench Division. In the King's Bench Division I think the orders are in the great majority of cases drawn by a solicitor?—I believe that is so.

45,235. But in the case of Chancery orders they are never drawn by the solicitor?—Never. I should never permit it. I do not say we have never received a draft prepared by a solicitor if he has wanted it in a great hurry just before the vacation or something like that, but I should never permit a solicitor to have anything to do with drawing up my orders.

45,236. The practice is that the draft is prepared by the clerk and revised and settled by the registrar?—Yes, and when the draft is seen by the registrar the solicitors come and fetch it and take an appointment before him to settle it.

45,237. That is in the case of orders where some question arises?—Yes.

45,238. In the case of simple orders they are settled without attendance by the solicitor?—Yes, I generally mark on the back whether I want to see the solicitor or not. Orders on summonses that come from chambers I do not often want to see a solicitor upon, but if there is any point that requires elucidation I then note on the back that I wish to see the solicitor.

45,239. In the case of orders resulting from proceedings before masters, what materials have you on which to draft the orders?—The summons is brought from chambers with the endorsement of the order made, and my principal clerk prepares the order from that endorsement.

45,240. In cases of some complication would there be more than a simple endorsement?—Yes, some minutes would come from chambers as well.

45,241. We have it in evidence from Master Romer that it is one of the duties of the first-class clerks to prepare minutes for the order?—They do so.

45,242. Would those minutes give you the substance of the order?—They give the substance of the order.

45,243. Would there be any great difference in form between the order and the minutes?—Sometimes the minutes are fairly well drawn, but others not, and so we have to alter them considerably.

45,244. That would depend upon the skill and experience of the clerk who drew them?—Precisely.

45,245. After the order has been drawn have you often to refer points back to the master who dealt with the case?—Yes, I have often had to go and see the master about it. Sometimes it occurs to me that the order is not drawn in proper form, or perhaps I suggest to him that the order is wrong altogether. I often have to go and see the masters or send my clerk to see them about it.

45,246. Does that give rise to delay and difficulty ever?—No; I think they are very glad for us to go and see them. I think we look upon them, to a certain extent, as we look upon the judges. We do it as a matter of course if we see any faults in the order. I nearly always go myself, though, if I am busy, I get my principal clerk to go.

45,247. You say that the registrar has to enter the briefs. What does that mean?—He enters in his court-book who the counsel are appearing on both sides and sees that all parties are represented. The first thing I have is the production of all the briefs to see that all parties are before the court.

45,248. Before an order is drawn up?—No, when I have settled the draft. As a rule I only get one brief produced to me at first. It is only the party who has the carriage of the order who produces his brief. The plaintiff as a rule has the carriage of the order, and he brings the plaintiff's brief, and when he comes to me to settle the order I require the production of briefs for all the defendants.

45,249. Then if the parties are satisfied with the order, and you have not required their attendance, the matter is at an end and the order is recorded?—I think as a rule I see the parties over court orders.

45,250. Those are the orders of greater importance?—Yes. As a rule I see them over those, but not over chamber orders unless there is something special upon them.

45,251. And if the parties are not satisfied with the orders do you then hear them?—Yes at once. They can take an appointment to settle before me. I always give strict orders for an appointment at any time to be given to settle the order when solicitors so desire.

45,252. Is there an appeal to the judge supposing that the parties are not satisfied with your decision?—Yes, but if it is a question between plaintiff and defendant as to the form of order I should probably go and see the judge myself. I do that to save time, to save trouble, and to save expense. But if it is really a very important question and there is a great difference of opinion and I think it is a matter that should go back to the court, I tell the solicitors that they must move to vary the minutes, and it comes on before the judge, generally speaking, on motion day.

45,253. Are there many points other than those that are established by the documents before you which you have to go into before settling the order?—I have to see that the evidence is all correct and everything in order, but my principal clerk goes through all the evidence and calls my attention to anything he thinks is not properly proved.

45,254. You have to verify the evidence for the statements made in court?—We look most carefully into it.

45,255. And verify, for instance, certificates of births, deaths, or marriages?—Most carefully.

45,256. On chamber orders from masters do similar questions arise as regards verification of evidence or certificates?—I always take the master's endorsement. He endorses on the summons the evidence of life or death upon which the order is made; I take his endorsement as to the evidence having been produced to him. But some of my colleagues—and I do sometimes—call for the certificate of a death or birth just to verify its correctness. If I am paying money out of court to an infant on attaining 21, I verify it by calling for the certificate of birth or baptism.

45,257. The question has been raised in several committees or commissions that have sat on the subject whether it was desirable to maintain your department and Chancery chambers as separate departments or whether it would be preferable to amalgamate them in some form?—That has been raised.

45,258. An amalgamation I think was recommended by the Committee of 1885?—Yes.

45,259. The matter was also considered by the Kekewich Committee of 1907, and that committee by a majority recommended that the offices should be kept separate?—Yes. That committee took the opinion of all the judges and former judges of the Chancery Division who sat in the Court of Appeal, and they unanimously agreed that the registrars' office ought to remain as a separate establishment.

45,260. The report of the committee does not give reasons for their decision. Can you tell me what the reasons were?—I was examined before the committee for about one and a half hours I may say and I know pretty well the feeling about it. I think the people who really knew most about our office were Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Christopher James. Mr. Justice Kekewich also took the greatest interest in our office, and he was very strongly of opinion—and I dare say you have read his remarks—that the establishment ought to be separately maintained. I may say that I was not even asked a question on this subject because it was disposed of before I was called. Mr. Justice Kekewich said the grouping of registrars and their staff, that is the attachment of registrars and their staff to each pair of linked judges in the division was objectionable on certain grounds.

45,261. Is not that rather a different point?—It is to some extent a different point.

45,262. The attachment of particular registrars to particular judges might take place even though a separate registrars' office was not maintained. The question I was asking you to deal with was the question whether there should be an amalgamation between the two offices?—I do not know whether you could amalgamate them unless you attached a registrar to a particular set of chambers. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie's recommendation (which I read this morning) is that two registrars should be attached to particular sets of chambers; otherwise I do not see how you could amalgamate them.

45,263. I think the recommendation of the Esher Committee was in favour of amalgamation?—I believe so.

45,264. Without necessarily accompanying it by attachment of particular registrars to particular judges or particular groups?—I do not see how you could carry out amalgamation without attachment to a particular group. At the present moment, as you have heard from the masters, they are in three groups—two judges to each group of four masters. If you are to amalgamate you must attach registrars to one group or other, that is if you want to amalgamate all the registrars and masters together. I do not see how, unless you attach them, you could possibly carry out that amalgamation.

45,265. (Chairman.) It will be impossible to finish your evidence to-day, so we must ask you to come again on some convenient day which perhaps you will arrange with our secretary?—Certainly.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTEENTH DAY.

Friday, 19th February 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.

Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. RICHARD DURNING HOLT, M.P.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B., called and examined.

45,266. (Chairman.) You hold the office of senior master in the King's Bench Division?—Yes.

45,267. How long have you held that office?—As senior master about three years.

45,268. How long have you held the office of master?—Since 1889.

45,269. Is succeeding to the post of senior master a matter of seniority?—The office is given in virtue of a statute to the senior master.

45,270. What different kinds of masters are there?—There are three kinds of masters—the masters of the King's Bench, the taxing masters, and the Chancery masters. With respect to the two last I have nothing to do, and I may be permitted to say nothing.

45,271. Then, will you tell us what the duties of a master of the King's Bench are?—The duties of the masters of the King's Bench are, in point of fact, to be assistant judges. Their duties are almost entirely judicial, and for the purpose of those duties legal knowledge and experience are required. In a précis which I have prepared there is an enumeration of some of the principal duties of the King's Bench masters, but it is by no means exhaustive. For example, I have not called attention clearly to the fact that the masters have jurisdiction unlimited in point of amount. I have also not drawn attention to the fact that in hearing the various summonses which come before the masters, they have the advantage of counsel—the chief junior barristers—practising before them.

45,272. It would be, I suppose, only in the more important matters that counsel appear?—In a sense that is true; but the appearance of counsel is a matter which rests very largely in the discretion of the parties. It rests in the main with them whether counsel shall appear. It rests with the master to say whether, if they do appear, a certificate for the allowance of counsel shall be granted—that is entirely in the discretion of the master. I think I have failed to notice in the list of duties certain very important duties which come almost daily before the masters. For instance, one of the duties of the masters is to deal with arbitrations. It rests with the masters to say whether an award in all the many kinds of arbitrations shall be enforced.

45,273. Are those arbitrations ordered by the Court?—And also arbitrations agreed upon between the parties—practically all kinds of arbitrations. There is a Statute of 1889 dealing with all kinds of arbitrations; and I may say that giving effect to that Act rests almost entirely with the masters. If parties cannot agree as to the arbitrator, it rests with the masters to appoint the arbitrator; in the event of there being two arbitrators, and the two failing to agree to appoint a third arbitrator or an umpire, it rests with the masters to appoint an umpire. Another important function of the masters is to hear applications known as applications for certiorari; that is to say, applications to remove causes from the inferior courts—for example, the County Court—to the High Court; it rests with the masters on due evidence to determine whether or not a case shall be taken from an inferior court and brought into the High Court.

45,274. We see from the statement before us, and from what you say now, that the matters which come before masters in their judicial capacity are very varied. Can you tell us generally what determines whether a matter comes before a master or before a judge?—Perhaps I may answer that question best by describing how these duties have come to the masters. I may say that there has been a long process of devolution of duties, originally belonging to the judges, to the masters. That process of devolution began as far back as about 1830 to 1837. During the period between 1837 and 1867 certain judicial duties were placed upon the masters. In 1867 power was given to the judges to devolve upon the masters a considerable number of duties which previously the judges had performed. Since that time there has been a steady increase of the duties imposed upon the masters, so that at the present time the result is that, with certain specified exceptions, notably, criminal matters and appeals from district registrars and one or two other exceptions, all the duties previously performed by a judge sitting in chambers now devolve upon the masters; the consequence being that the work performed by the judge in chambers has been considerably lessened.

45,275. May it be said that in the progress of an action all matters up to a certain point of procedure or of importance are dealt with by the masters, and that they act in that way as an instrument to dispose of the great majority of judicial work which is not of the very first importance, and so relieve the judges of the less important duties?—One might even put it higher than that, and say that, putting aside all criminal matters and all appeals, with rare exception all the applications made in the course of an action until the actual trial in court are made before the masters.

45,276. Besides the judicial work has the master administrative functions?—The master has administrative functions of considerable extent. He has to perform various duties which are his by statute. For example, he has to execute the office of registrar for the purpose of the Bills of Sale Act, and various statutes which have since that time amended the first Bills of Sale Act. A certain number of the masters also have to serve upon the Committee of Control, the functions of which I shall be glad to describe afterwards.

45,277. Do those administrative duties occupy any considerable part of the master's time?—I could not say that they occupy a very large portion of the majority of the masters' time. It is not so; but as regards the senior master they occupy a very large portion indeed of his time.

45,278. Has recent legislation increased the work assigned to masters?—Undoubtedly. Not merely have a large number of rules been passed which devolve more duties upon the masters, but statutes have been passed from time to time which increase those duties. For example, only a few months ago there have been imposed upon the masters certain duties of a very responsible and onerous character in virtue of what is called the Emergency Act. Under that Act it now rests with the master to say, to quote the words of this Act, "in his 'absolute discretion' whether or not a person who has obtained a judgment against his creditor shall be allowed to make use of that judgment. It rests with the masters to say whether a person who is in default in payment of his rent shall have an execution put in upon his house. It rests with the master to say whether, if there is a hiring agreement with respect to furniture, and if there are any instalments in arrears, the owner of the furniture shall take possession, and the rights of the other parties to the agreement be forfeited. Then, too, it rests with the masters to say whether or not if certain covenants in a lease are broken, and when according to the terms of the lease it would be free for the landowner to take possession, the tenant shall obtain relief from the forfeiture, and, if he is to obtain relief upon what terms the forfeiture is to be granted."

45,279. Are there numerous cases under the Emergency Act?—I do not like to use the word "enormous," but they are very many indeed, and it has very greatly increased our work in various ways. Not merely have we to hear the applications in chambers and to read the affidavits and to form an opinion upon the affidavits, but it becomes essential to cross-examine the deponent upon those affidavits. As you might surmise, affidavit evidence is often found to be exceedingly untrustworthy. From time to time it is necessary to examine the books of the debtor, and in fact, as you might expect, we regard that as the very best kind of evidence. All that takes time, and so much new work has been thrown upon the masters that I am sorry to say we get a little behind in disposing of those applications. Hitherto it has been our policy in the King's Bench Division to try and dispose of cases with great rapidity, but the Emergency Act coming on the top of other Acts has, I think, put too great a strain upon our strength.

45,280. (Mr. Holt.) Were these duties imposed upon you by the statute itself or by rules made under the statute?—Both by the statute and by rules. The statute in general terms defines the powers, and then by certain rules those duties are imposed upon the masters. I may say that that is the usual course in recent legislation.

45,281. (Chairman.) You no longer have taxing work?—Taxing work has been withdrawn.

45,282. That was transferred to the Taxing Office?—That was transferred to the Taxing Office.

45,283. Were some of the masters who had formerly dealt with taxing work transferred to the Taxing Office when the work was transferred?—I am not quite sure that I can say that certain masters were transferred, but certain masters appointed in the manner in which King's Bench masters are appointed were put aside to tax costs.

45,284. How many masters are there now?—At the present time there are six King's Bench masters in addition to the Master of the Crown Office.

45,285. Is that in addition to, or does it include the senior master?—Six, including the senior master. At the time when Lord Coleridge's Committee reported there were 18.

45,286. There are also two assistant masters?—Yes; but these two assistant masters give practically no aid to us. One of them gives none. One of them has to take part in the work of the Court of Appeal with which we have nothing to do, and another is mainly occupied in making arrangements for the sittings of the judges, with which, of course, we have nothing to do.

45,287. Was that work performed by the masters at the time you speak of when there were 18?—That was before my time, and I am not quite sure about that. In all probability I think the duty was discharged by certain clerks under the supervision of the masters, but about that point I speak with some little caution.

45,288. What reduction in the staff of masters in the Central Office was represented by the transfer of the taxing work?—It is very difficult for me to say, but I should think it would probably be about two.

45,289. Has the master duties also in connection with proceedings by or against poor persons?—One of the masters is, under the rules, appointed the prescribed officer, and as such he has very large administrative duties. He has to endeavour to form throughout the whole kingdom a staff of solicitors and counsel who are willing to act as volunteers in examining the cases which are submitted to them, in order to determine, first, whether the particular applicant is a poor person within the meaning of the rules, and, secondly, whether or not there is a prima facie case for action. That involves a great deal of administrative work; but each master, on a certain day in the week varying with each master, has put before him the reports that have been made by the various solicitors and counsel who are acting under these prescribed rules, and also the documents which have been submitted to those solicitors and counsel, and upon reading these reports and documents he has to make up his mind as to whether an order shall be made giving the applicant the benefit of those rules and exempting him from the payment of fees.

45,290. And these duties are taken in rotation?—Yes.

45,291. Will you tell us what the special duties attaching to the office of senior master are?—In the first place, he has every morning, and throughout the day as occasion presents itself, to conduct a large amount of correspondence, first with solicitors in regard to particular cases, then with regard to the parties in person, plaintiffs or defendants as the case may be—and I may state that that is a steadily growing form of correspondence.

45,292. Is any correspondence of that kind conducted by the other masters, or is it all done by the senior master?—Practically all of it is done by the senior master. There might be cases in which a plaintiff or a defendant whose case had come before a particular master might write to that particular master, and, dealing with the matter of which that particular master only was cognisant, the correspondence might take place between him and that particular master, but broadly stated, it is correct to say that the correspondence of the various kinds indicated in my note has to be conducted by the senior master.

45,293. (Mr. Coward.) What sort of correspondence is it? To what does it relate? I was trying to remember whether I had ever received such a thing as a letter from a master?—I do not think I have had the honour of receiving a letter from you. But, first, there are letters from solicitors—country solicitors especially—asking what our practice is with regard to a particular point. When new rules come out we have in all probability letters from various country solicitors asking what we are doing in regard to such and such a thing. We have letters from time to time calling attention to certain orders that we have made—perhaps complaining.

45,294. I only wanted to say that personally I do not remember ever having received a letter from a master. I think you will bear me out?—So far as you are concerned, I think not. The correspondence, so far as the solicitors are concerned (the extent of which I do not want to make too much of), would chiefly be with country solicitors about points of practice.

45,295. (Sir John Hewett.) What is the nature of the correspondence with the parties to an action?—That is of a most varied character. They write to say that they are unable to attend the hearing of a particular summons and they state what their case is, often at very considerable length; they write stating that for the first time they have heard such and such an order has been made against them, and ask the master to stay the order. Many are complaints, and many are explanations.

45,296. Every item of that correspondence has to be dealt with by the senior master?—It comes before the senior master.

45,297. (Chairman.) I suppose replies are drafted and correspondence is dealt with by the office staff before it comes to you as a rule?—The correspondence is gone through in the morning by a clerk or clerks; the clerk comes to me before I go downstairs to sit in chambers, and I go through these letters with him. Sometimes I simply indicate what the answer should be; but some of the matters require very great consideration indeed and take a long time to answer. In referring to this subject I have not referred to perhaps the most important portion of the correspondence. I may, for example, have a letter from someone connected with the Irish Court, the procedure of which is in theory much the same as ours, and a question will be put to me as to what under particular circumstances in the High Court we do. Many letters come from the district registrars, who administer the same rules as we do, putting certain points and asking what, under certain circumstances, is our practice.

45,298. Then you also have some correspondence with public departments—the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office?—I may say that I have a considerable amount of correspondence with the Lord Chancellor's secretary. There is a steady flow of correspondence from the Foreign Office dealing with cases in which a foreign court desires to obtain evidence here, or in which evidence has been obtained by foreign courts in English suits. A large portion of that correspondence is of a routine character, but each letter has to be considered, and occasionally there may be many important questions to deal with.

45,299. Have you also special duties in connection with the internal arrangements of the business in the office?—There are 69 clerks, and they are moved from time to time from one department to another, and little difficulties from time to time arise. Fortunately things work smoothly, but all questions connected with the control of the office arising out of the business arrangements come to me, and have to be determined by me.

45,300. Have you the assistance of any special officer in dealing with those matters of internal discipline in the office, and so forth?—I am not sure I appreciate your question.

45,301. In many of the Civil departments there is an officer called a chief clerk who, under the head of the department—the permanent secretary or whoever he may be—is responsible for the details of discipline, management of duties, and leave, and so forth?—I think I may be allowed to say that if we had such an official he would greatly relieve my duties, and would probably be an advantage, but there is no person exactly corresponding with that.

45,302. Then have you to go into all the minute details of discipline yourself?—I have to go into all these details.

45,303. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Could not you create such an official by simply asking one of your clerks to do that duty?—If we had any surplus clerk we could do so, but at the present moment I do not quite see anyone who could fulfil that duty.

45,304. (Chairman.) You think it would be useful to have an officer specially charged with that kind of work under your direction?—I should like to consider all the consequences more carefully, but as it is presented to me the suggestion seems to me to be good.

45,305. You also hold the office of King's Remembrancer?—Yes, I hold that office as senior master.

45,306. Can you give us a general idea of the duties that fall to you as King's Remembrancer?—The duties of the King's Remembrancer's Office are of a very technical character. The King's Remembrancer has to hear all interlocutory applications in revenue suits, and in proceedings for the recovery of various kinds of taxes; he has to peruse and sign Orders of Court in revenue matters; from time to time there are questions of practice arising out of revenue suits; and he has also to supervise all matters connected with that office, in which there are three clerks.

45,307. Those duties refer generally to matters arising on Crown litigation and, in particular, revenue litigation?—That is so. Perhaps I might just say that the procedure in that office is of an entirely different character from the procedure under the Rules of Court in the King's Bench Division. The Crown in most instances is the plaintiff, and the Crown is armed with large powers not possessed by the ordinary litigant. One important difference between this and any other department is, that whereas the writs of execution in the King's Bench Division are only against property, goods, land, and chattels, the writ which issues from the King's Remembrancer's Office requires a sheriff, in the event of goods and land not being found in the sheriff's bailiwick, to seize the body of the debtor. In other words, the form of writ known as a capias, which originally existed in the other division, is retained in the King's Remembrancer's Department, and, it is needless to say, anything to be issued in the nature of a capias is of an extremely delicate character.

45,308. Are those extraordinary powers frequently exercised?—The number of executions in the course of a year are considerable. I am not prepared to give the exact number, but they exceed one or two hundred.*

45,309. I think you also edit the Judicial Statistics. Is that one of your duties as a master?—Yes, but not as a master, and I think I ought to add that so many duties are imposed upon the senior master that I have more and more to perform a certain part of my duties at home.

45,310. Will you tell us what is the statutory qualification for appointment as a master?—The statutory qualification is that the master must have been a practising barrister or solicitor of five years' standing, or five years as a special pleader. But in point of fact none of the six masters who now hold office were appointed until they had been 15 or 16 years at the Bar. I think, in the case of one who had a very large practice, he was not appointed until he had been 23 years at the Bar.

45,311. They were all barristers?—All the six are barristers.

45,312. And the assistant masters?—The assistant masters are barristers.

45,313. You, yourself, practised at the Bar?—Yes.

45,314. (Mr. Holt.) Does a statutory requirement apply to the assistant master?—That is a question of law. I could not say off-hand whether it is so. I should not like to decide that question. In point of fact, they are barristers.

* In 1913 they were 375.—J. M.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,315. (Chairman.) What is the usual age of appointment as a master?—In fact all those six were appointed after they had been practising at the Bar 15 or 16 years, and in one case, I think as I say, after 23 years' practice.

45,316. So that they would usually be men of 40 to 45 years of age?—Yes.

45,317. With whom does the appointment rest?—The appointment rests in rotation with the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls.

45,318. Is the appointment of the master of the Crown Office an exception to that rule?—That is an exception; that rests with the Lord Chief Justice.

45,319. In your opinion does that system work well?—It seems to me that it does. The nominating authorities have every opportunity of judging of the fitness of the barristers who are appointed masters, and also of ascertaining what the Bar may think of them.

45,320. It has been suggested to us in evidence that it might be desirable to adopt the system which the Commission has already recommended for appointments to professional offices in other parts of the Civil Service namely, that the high officer with whom the appointment actually rests should, before he makes the appointment, receive from a standing committee a report as to the qualifications of the candidates, that standing committee, speaking generally, to include some high officer connected with the department to which the appointment is to be made, and other independent authorities, including the Civil Service Commission. What would be your opinion as to the application of a system of that kind to this present case?—I speak with very great deference of such a proposal, but I doubt very much whether any such body would be competent to form really so good an opinion as the present nominating authorities, who have the very best opportunity of, in the first place, knowing what are the duties to be performed, and secondly, of knowing who are the men most likely to perform them.

45,321. Does the rotation in the appointing officer produce some degree of discontinuity in the principle applied to the selection?—Speaking from experience, I see no reason to think so.

45,322. Speaking generally, you consider that the results under the present system have been satisfactory?—I think the result on the whole has been satisfactory.

45,323. You have spoken of the process of devolution which has gone on from the judges to the masters. Has there been any corresponding process of devolution from the masters to their clerks?—To this extent, that before Lord Coleridge's Committee made its Report masters sat in court and performed work which now is performed by various clerks belonging to the Associates' Department.

45,324. And it has worked satisfactorily, to transfer that court work from masters to clerks?—I have no reason to doubt it has.

45,325. Have there been any complaints on the part of the judges?—About that I could not speak. Such complaints would not come before me.

45,326. But the complaint would be of a clerk who is subordinate to you?—That might be so.

45,327. So, if there had been a complaint, would not it have come to you?—No, the judge would probably not consult me.

45,328. To whom would the judge address his complaint? Supposing a judge found that a clerk who was doing the duty in court was not performing that duty satisfactorily, what steps would he take?—You put a case the details of which I have never had to consider. All I know is that no complaints have been made to me.

45,329. (Mr. Coward.) Might we ask what duties he would have to perform in court?—Upon that part of the subject I can only speak generally, because I never sit in court; but no doubt one duty he would have to do would be to prepare the certificate of the judgment, or verdict, as the case may be.

45,330. That is not a very onerous duty?—In many cases not very onerous. In some cases—speaking as I do with not much experience—it might be a difficult one. If the verdict was a clean verdict, it would be an easy task. If there were findings upon different issues it might be a somewhat difficult task.

45,331. Surely not. The questions are usually put to the jury by the judge in writing, and, if the judge is not there to receive the answers, the associate takes them?—I can only fall back upon experience. Sitting as a taxing master many years ago I had to give effect to judgments and certificates, and I found that in many cases it was an exceedingly difficult thing to give effect to them; and in some instances the judge had to be consulted, and he had to give directions explanatory of the issues.

45,332. (Chairman.) You are not aware of any complaint having been made of the way in which those duties have been discharged?—I have not heard of any complaints.

45,333. Could that process of devolution be carried further?—Not so far as I know, except, speaking now of my own office and also that of the masters, I do think that the time of each of the masters is, to a certain extent, wasted, because each of them has not a clerk specially attached to him. The taxing masters and the Chancery masters have such. The consequence of there not being a clerk attached to a master is that often in the middle of important business he is stopped, in order to settle some appointment or to make certain arrangements. It may be, for example, that while he is trying an action or a reference, and while a witness is being examined or cross-examined, he has to stop in order to look at his diary, and to make some arrangement with respect to certain other cases. It would be an advantage if each master had some clerk specially attached to him, who would settle a number of minor matters which are now settled by each individual master.

45,334. Who now makes the masters' appointments and draws up their lists?—The masters themselves.

45,335. Does a master draw up his own list?—In one sense he does. He will write down "chambers A to F," and then after that he will say "appointment in such and such a case," or "appointment in such and such a case." That paper will be taken downstairs, and then in the Summons and Order Department the clerks will enter all the summonses in A to F, which are returnable on that particular day.

45,336. The actual book with the list for each day is kept in the Summons and Order Department?—Yes, but the master has to keep a diary, in which particular appointments, not included in the list of summonses, are made.

45,337. Where it is a particular appointment for a particular time?—All special appointments.

45,338. And not a case forming one of the cases in the ordinary list for the day?—Quite so.

45,339. You think you could be relieved of troublesome work if a clerk were told off for that purpose?—I think so, if each master had a clerk attached to him, as is the case with the Chancery masters and the taxing masters.

45,340. That work, I presume, would not take up the whole time of the clerk?—Probably it would not. I do not think it would take up his whole time, but I am not quite sure about that.

45,341. Could what I may call auxiliary duties of that kind not be combined with the existing duties of some of the clerks?—It would be difficult for this reason, that the clerk, to be of any use, ought to be, as is the case in the Chancery Division and Taxing Office, in a room adjacent to the master's room. He must be there the whole of the day, because at all hours of the day parties will call asking for appointments or, what is often the case, asking that certain appointments which have been made shall be varied or put off. If he were engaged in another department, I am not quite sure how those duties could be properly carried out.

45,342. We heard yesterday that in Chancery chambers certain of the simpler kind of orders are made by the clerks and not by the masters. Would it be possible in the Central Office for your first class clerks to deal with certain classes of the simpler orders?—No. I do not think that could be done.

45,343. Do they at present deal with any class of cases?—No.

45,344. Do not they deal with cases where judgment is given by default?—The signing of judgment by default is done by the clerks and the clerks only, but that requires very little exercise of judicial functions.

45,345. And those cases do not come before the masters at all?—No, the masters have as a rule nothing to do with those.

45,346. My question was this. Are there any other classes of cases which are perhaps not so entirely matters of course as a judgment by default, but on which there is very little more discretion to be exercised, which could be dealt with by clerks instead of masters?—No, I think not, for this reason. Certain orders—nine out of ten—may be very simple, but the tenth may involve a most difficult question. I am not aware of any class of orders which could be clearly marked and put aside so that there would not be a possibility from time to time of important questions arising for consideration.

45,347. Numerically, is a large part of the work coming before a master of comparatively small importance as regards the magnitude or difficulty of the points involved?—The difficulty depends very largely on the individual master; but, speaking broadly, there is a very small amount which is of a very simple character, and at any moment a case, which may appear to be simple, is found to have difficulties connected with it.

45,348. In the less important cases, what is the average time that an application occupies?—It is difficult to say. A case which seems to be simple, instead of occupying five minutes, may occupy half an hour; nobody can say beforehand what time it will take.

45,349. Is it the practice of the masters to deal with the less important cases in the morning?—If the standard of important cases are cases which are attended by solicitors and solicitors' clerks, as distinguished from those attended by counsel, undoubtedly the first are taken in the morning.

45,350. In the masters' list of cases in the morning, would there be something like 20 cases to each hour?—Yes; there would be that number.

45,351. So those would be disposed of in an average of three minutes to the case?—Not quite so, because probably of that 20 a certain number would be adjourned into the master's room at a later hour, or on some other day.

45,352. When the other day we saw Master Archibald at work, we saw him dispose of, perhaps, one dozen cases, each of which occupied not more than two or three minutes. Would not a large majority of the cases dealt with in the morning be of that sort?—No doubt; and, in the case of a master of the experience of Master Archibald, a very large number. Much depends, to speak plainly, on the experience of the master.

45,353. One master will dispose of his cases much more rapidly than another?—Yes; and the master with small experience will find that his list will take a much longer time. If a master has been sitting for some years, he comes to know the people who are before him, and they know him. They know the orders that in certain cases he is likely to make. He knows the people who appear before him, and, no doubt, business goes on more rapidly than would be the case with others.

45,354. But you do not see any means by which the less important work, which is not really deserving of the attention of an officer of the importance of the master, could be sifted out and dealt with at a lower level?—No; on the contrary. That gives me an opportunity of saying, and saying emphatically, that if our work were dealt with in some respects as I should desire to deal with it, much longer time would require to be taken. One of our forms of summonses is called a "summons for directions." It was introduced some years ago with the object—and, it seemed to me, a very good object—of ensuring that at one sitting a large number of matters should be dealt with, instead of being dealt with in separate summonses issued from time to time. Owing to various reasons that "summons for directions" has not been so satisfactory as, I think, it ought to be, largely owing to our inability to give sufficient time to the hearing of it. On the "summons for directions" we were instructed, as far as practicable, to settle all interlocutory applications; to settle the form of pleadings; to determine whether there was to be discovery; to determine the mode of trial; and to determine the place at which the action should be tried. To carry out that idea properly, it occurs to me that a much longer time should be given to the hearing of these summonses.

45,355. (Mr. Coward.) Might I suggest to you that the difficulty really arises from the inability of people, at the outset of litigation, to know exactly what will be required?—That, undoubtedly, is one of the causes.

45,356. That is the real thing. It is not a question of the masters not having sufficient time, surely?—What you suggest is one of the causes, no doubt.

45,357. The principal cause?—It may be the principal cause. The one to which I refer is a very real cause.

45,358. (Chairman.) What is the present position as regards a limit of age for retirement in the case of masters? Is there any limit?—There is no limit. In point of fact the ages of the masters range from about 55 to 68.

45,359. There are none at present over 70?—None over 70.

45,360. And only two, I think, over 65?—Two over 65.

45,361. Do you recollect that the Coleridge Committee of 1887 recommended that retirement should be compulsory at the age of 70, with power, I think, to the Lord Chancellor to extend the tenure of office by any period not exceeding five years?—Yes.

45,362. That recommendation has not been carried out?—No; that has not been carried out. I think occasion to carry it out has never arisen. There was certainly one case where it might have been carried out, but it was not.

45,363. What is your opinion as to the desirability of carrying it out?—It seems to me that it would be unnecessary to lay down any hard-and-fast rule on the subject. In the first place, I recall one case of a master, lately dead, who performed duties after the age of 70, and in my experience there never was a more efficient master at the time when he ceased to perform his duties.

45,364. Have you ever known a case in the contrary sense, where a master became less efficient in the performance of his duties before retirement?—I may have known cases at a very early age.

45,365. Not necessarily at an advanced age?—No, not necessarily at an advanced age.

45,366. The Lord Chancellor has, I think, the power of requiring a master to retire?—Yes, the Lord Chancellor has the power of requiring masters to retire.

45,367. But that power would, I suppose, be only exercised in very extreme cases?—Of that I cannot speak. But there is another check: If a man were to become inefficient, it would mean that his colleagues had to perform a portion of his duties, and after a certain time there would be pressure, which, probably, would be effectual, brought to bear upon him.

45,368. What is the position of masters as regards pension?—That position is substantially this: They are entitled to a pension of one-sixtieth of the salary every year, and also there is a proviso under a certain statute by which they may have added to that an increment of a specified number of years, not exceeding 20, in computing the amount of pension payable to the officer. In point of fact, the increment has in recent years, at all events, been not 20 but seven. For a time, I believe, the increment was ten years.

45,369. In your own case how many years do you receive?—If I read the statute as I think a lawyer would read it, the authorities would direct their minds to each particular case; but I understand that a fixed figure of seven years has been adopted.

45,370. That was the figure in force at the time of your appointment?—No. I believe it was ten years at the date I actually received my warrant, but that is a question about which I do not speak with confidence.

45,371. Is the seven years still in force. If an appointment were made to-morrow would it apply to that?—I am not quite sure about that.

45,372. Then are you of opinion that, in the case of masters who are appointed after long professional experience, a liberal allowance of added years should be added for the purposes of pension?—A fair allowance of added years should be made.

45,373. Do you consider that an allowance should be fixed for masters as a class, or fixed specially in the case of each individual appointment?—I think it should be fixed in each individual case.

45,374. The determining facts being the age at which the individual is appointed?—That should be the determining factor.

45,375. (Mr. Boutwood.) And should it be fixed when he is appointed?—That would be the preferable arrangement. I might observe that the judges are entitled to full pension after 15 years' service.

45,376. (Mr. Holt.) Are they entitled to any pension before that?—If a certain medical certificate is obtained, the exact terms of which I am unable to describe, then they may get it before.

45,377. But if they retire of their own accord they do not get any pension?—I presume not.

45,378. (Mr. Clynes.) What is the amount of a full pension?—In the case of judges, two-thirds.

45,379. (Chairman.) Does the recent Superannuation Act of 1909—the Act which changed the basis from sixtieths to eightieths and gave a certain bonus on retirement—apply to masters?—No, I believe not. It might for future masters.

45,380. Were existing masters offered an option under that Act?—I am not sure.

45,381. Have you any observations to make as to the number of masters required? The question of devolution, with which we have already dealt, has some bearing on that?—I should like to make one observation, and that is, that there is a portion of our duties which seem to me to be important—the trial of certain actions and certain issues. One of our duties is to deal with executions which have been put in by sheriffs. Claimants come forward claiming the furniture or other effects which have been seized by the sheriff. An issue is then directed to determine in whom is the property in the particular goods or other effects. Certain courses may be taken; either the issue will have to be tried by a judge of the High Court, which is a costly proceeding, and the trial may not come on for some time, or the issue may be sent to the County Court, and, if it is a Metropolitan County Court, the issue will probably not be determined for a period ranging from a month to six weeks or two months. Either of those two courses which I have described may be exceedingly inconvenient; it is highly inconvenient that the bailiff should remain in possession; it is highly inconvenient that the goods should be sold if security is not found; and it is extremely advisable that there should be some expeditious mode of trying such issues.

45,382. I think that is rather a point of judicial procedure, which is outside our reference, except so far as it bears on the question of organisation?—I understood you asked me about the number of masters. The inference I was going to draw from this statement was that it was highly important that there should be an increase in the number of masters to deal with such cases. We have to refuse applications for the trial of such issues.

45,383. At present you refuse applications because the masters are not sufficient in number to deal with them?—We try a certain number of them. In certain cases it would be a positive denial of justice not to try them; but I am sorry to say that, especially of late, we have had to refuse frequent applications of that kind owing to the insufficient number of masters. For that reason alone it seems expedient that there should be some increase in the number of masters.

45,384. (Sir John Hewett.) What happens to those applications?—In those cases where we refuse they have to be tried by the County Court judge, which may be in a month or six weeks' time.

45,385. There is a delay in the trial?—A serious delay in the trial.

45,386. And they would prefer to go before another authority?—They would prefer to come before us, not merely because the trial is expeditious, but because it is cheaper, and—and this is an important point—if the case is tried before us we name not merely a day for the trial, but an hour, so that the witnesses and all the parties may know the precise time at which they are to attend. If a case goes to a County Court the parties will get a return day, but the state of the business in that Court may be such that the case may not come on on that day, or, if it does come on, it may come on at a very late and uncertain hour in the day, and solicitors, counsel, and witnesses are kept waiting.

45,387. Would it be actually a convenience to the public if the masters could try these issues?—A very great convenience; that I undoubtedly can say. In some instances, the inability of the masters to give appointments amounts to something like a denial of justice.

45,388. (Chairman.) You mentioned that there are two assistant masters. Can you tell us the nature of their work?—I can generally, but not very much in detail, because they are concerned mainly with the court work with which I have little to do. One of the masters—Master Coleridge—sits in the Court of Appeal; Master Lawford is occupied in making arrangements with the judges as to their sittings; he also assists us in taking examinations of judgment debtors; in fact, without his assistance, it would be perfectly impossible for us to do the work.

45,389. Does Master Coleridge's work entirely consist of sitting in court?—I would not like to say entirely, but very largely.

45,390. (Mr. Coward.) What does he do when he is there?—I am not in court, and I cannot speak with much precision about his work.

45,391. (Chairman.) Is it of the same kind as the work we have already mentioned, which used to be done by masters, and is now done by clerks in the Courts of King's Bench?—You are asking me a question about which I should not like to speak, and ought not to speak, because I have not much knowledge of it. With the Court of Appeal I have nothing to do, except that from time to time I am called upon, like other masters, to make reports to the Court of Appeal; otherwise, I have nothing to do with it.

45,392. Is Master Coleridge entirely attached to the Court of Appeal?—No, not entirely; but a large proportion of his work is there. I think also he sits in the Divisional Court.

45,393. In the Central Office a considerable amount of work arises out of the work done by the masters—dealing with documents, drawing up orders, and so forth?—Yes.

45,394. Is there any corresponding relation between any part of the Central Office and the work of the assistant masters?—There would be in regard to judgments of the Court of Appeal in the case of Master Coleridge, which would come within the work of the Writ and Judgment Department.

45,395. (Mr. Coward.) Those judgments are almost invariably "Appeal dismissed" or "Appeal allowed" in common law. In the case of Chancery appeals it is different, because they remodel the order. In the Common Law Division they may order a new trial, for instance?—Any remark I make about the Court of Appeal must be prefaced with this observation, that I have nothing to do with the Court of Appeal except that I know what every member of the profession knows about it, but I have no special duties with regard to it.

45,396. (Mr. Holt.) Am I right in understanding that the assistant masters are in no real sense of the word assistants to the masters?—That is perfectly true with this one qualification, that they, particularly Master Lawford, from time to time take examinations of judgment debtors which would otherwise come to us.

45,397. Would it be practicable to have an additional number of assistant masters, who would be assistants to the masters, and relieve you of less important work?—If the assistant masters were of the same standing, or, in other words, were paid at the same rate as the masters?

45,398. No, just like the present assistant masters?—That, in my view, is another way of asking whether or not the salaries of the masters should be lowered. In my view I think it would be preferable to appoint masters.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,399. (Chairman.) Is it not rather a question of whether the work of the masters could be divided into two sections—less important and more important—and the less important section performed by assistant masters, and the more important by masters?—Some duties such as I have been indicating now, the hearing of examinations of judgment debtors, might be devolved upon assistant masters. That is quite possible.

45,400. (Mr. Coward.) Master Lawford arranges the work that all the judges shall do?—Quite so.

45,401. Whether on circuit or in London?—Yes.

45,402. He prepares all the circuit papers; the judges having fixed upon what circuits they will go, Master Lawford has to fix the days on which they shall hold the assizes at the different places. Is that right?—Substantially so.

45,403. Similarly he would arrange what work should be done by the judges in court—whether one is going to the Central Criminal Court, or one sit in Bankruptcy, and so on?—Substantially that is so.

45,404. And he will go into a judge's room at 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon and say, "Judge, will you be kind enough to sit in the Court of Appeal next Monday?"—That is the kind of thing he does?—Substantially that is correct, but anyone who knows what Master Lawford does will know that he is a very hard-working official with a great many functions to perform. In plain terms he has too much to do.

45,405. I was not in the least disparaging his work, but I was only asking what it is he does?—Your account seems to me in the main to be correct.

45,406. (Chairman.) What are the ordinary hours of attendance of the masters?—Much the same hours as the judges. I come, perhaps, rather earlier. They come about 10.30 and they remain until their work is finished. The nominal hour is 4 o'clock, but if a master's work is not finished, if he is trying a reference, for example, he remains until it is finished.

45,407. Is his list often cleared before 4 o'clock?—His list is occasionally cleared before 4 o'clock, but when he remains he usually has some other things to do.

45,408. And if his list occupies him up to 4 o'clock, has he other work that he has to do after his list is cleared?—Probably, if he has taken evidence in some reference, he will go through his notes. He will probably have in his room long affidavits which in chambers he has not had time to read. By way of digression, may I state that the expedition in chambers is largely owing to the fact that when a master comes upon a summons in which the affidavits or documents are very long he does not deal with them then, but he takes them to his private room and on some other occasion reads them. It would be totally impossible to conduct the work in chambers if one were to read all the documents in each case there is every day. Speaking for myself, I hold over certain documents or certain affidavits which would take a long time to read.

45,409. (Mr. Coward.) But you would hardly ever adjourn a case in order that you might read the affidavits; they should be explained to you, should not they?—But in many cases you are not entirely warranted in accepting the explanation of parties. They are sometimes interested in the explanations they give, and one attaches much more importance to an actual perusal of documents than to a description of them.

45,410. (Chairman.) Does not the opposing solicitor exercise an efficient check on the statements of the other side as to the contents of documents?—He does, but sometimes the actual documents themselves are more trustworthy than any explanation.

45,411. You mentioned that, owing partly to the additional work imposed by the Courts Emergency Act, at the present moment there is a certain amount of arrear. What does that amount to in point of time?—Arrears in this sense: We endeavour, if possible, to give short returns for summonses. A great proportion of our summonses are what are called "four-day summonses," and in normal times one may fairly expect that they will be returnable in five or six or seven days. But there came some time ago a period in which the return day was something like three weeks.* By having supplemental lists we have brought down the return day considerably. I have brought to me every week a statement of the return days, and I notice by the last statement that was shown me that the return day had been brought down from an average of about three weeks to an average of about a fortnight. Still, that is not entirely satisfactory.

45,412. Are steps taken when the position is such as you have described to accelerate the rate at which work is disposed of, for instance, by increasing the length of the hours of sitting each day?—Yes, we have been sitting later, and we have been having extra lists.

45,413. What vacation do the masters have?—We have the same vacations as the judges, subject to this, that with the exception of certain days always throughout the vacations, at least one master, and sometimes two, have to be in attendance. To take, for example, the Long Vacation, one master is always in attendance, and occasionally, towards the end of the vacation, there may be two masters.

45,414. (Mr. Coward.) What hours do they attend?—Take my own case. I came at 10 o'clock, I sat till half-past 2 or 3 o'clock, and then I took what are called the ex parte applications, amounting to perhaps 20 or 30, home with me, and disposed of them in the evening.

45,415. Every day?—Every day.

45,416. Throughout the vacation?—Throughout the vacation, except Saturdays.

45,417. (Chairman.) Did the recent Commission on Delay in the King's Bench Division make a recommendation as regards the vacations of the masters?—I do not think there was any specific direction.

45,418. (Mr. Coward.) Not applying specifically to masters?—I think not.

45,419. (Chairman.) Was not the recommendation to the effect that the work of the masters should continue for 10 days or a fortnight after the beginning of the Long Vacation, and should begin again 10 days or a fortnight before the end of the Long Vacation?—I think that is right.

45,420. But that has not yet been carried out?—That has not yet been carried out. It would rest with the judges to give effect to that.

45,421. Would that be carried out by rules of court?—Probably, or by a direction of the Lord Chief Justice.

45,422. A direction would be sufficient without a rule of court?—We should act upon any direction.

45,423. Now will you turn to the Central Office. The Central Office discharges a considerable variety of functions?—A great variety.

45,424. Can you give a general description of them?—I have given a general description in the précis I have sent in. I have enumerated some of the chief heads—the issuing of writs and originating summonses in King's Bench, Chancery, and Probate Divisions; entering appearances; issuing summonses; drawing up various orders; and many other forms of business which are quite impossible for me to enumerate completely.

45,425. When was the Central Office formed?—In the year 1880 when the three distinct divisions—the King's Bench (or Queen's Bench, as it then was), and the Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions—were amalgamated.

45,426. And the office was formed by the amalgamation of a number of separate departments which had existed previously?—All the officers and clerks belonging to those three divisions were taken over, the consequence being that for a certain time, of course, the staff was considerably more than was probably necessary.

45,427. And the staff has been reduced since that amalgamation was effected?—The staff has been reduced.

45,428. Can you give a list of the various departments in which the Central Office is organised, indicating the staff attached to each department?—I have here a statement which, I think, gives the information you desire. It is a statement prepared in the form which the Committee of Control make use of, and which they find very advantageous. First, dealing with the Writ Department, there are 18 clerks; there are 12 in the Filing Department, 12 in the Associates Department,

* The extreme limit was 17 days.—J. M.

nine in the Summonses and Orders Department, seven in the Crown Office, six in the Bills of Sale Department, three in the King's Remembrancer's Office, and two in the Masters' Secretary's Department (handing in the list).

45,429. Is the Associates Department the department which provides the clerks to sit in court as you have described?—That is so.

45,430. I find in the Report of the Committee of 1887 the following description of the work of the departments of the Central Office:—"The nature of the work, which was explained in detail by numerous witnesses, appears to fall approximately into one or other of the following classes: (1) Work purely clerical, depending on care, industry, and intelligence, but not requiring special or professional qualifications. For this, the main portion of the office work, a clerk's service increases in value as experience gives him a more ready and complete knowledge of the various branches of the work in his department; (2) Work of a more important character, which includes responsibility, the superintendence of other clerks, and many duties requiring initiative, judgment, and professional knowledge. It is, in short, the work of a first class professional or managing clerk." Would that be an accurate analysis of the nature of the work at the present time?—Subject to this, that it seems to me to be a slightly depreciatory description of the work. Speaking of the work of a large number of the clerks I should be inclined to think that somewhat higher qualifications were required than are indicated here; but on the whole, subject to that qualification, I think it is accurate.

45,431. As regards the first category, "Work purely clerical, depending on care, industry, and intelligence, but not requiring special or professional qualifications," what do you say?—A portion of the work is no doubt accurately described in that way.

45,432. Is that a considerable portion of it?—No doubt a considerable proportion.

45,433. Such work as the receiving and filing of affidavits would be that kind of work?—That would be particularly true of the majority of the work in the Filing Department.

45,434. Would it also be true of a certain proportion of the work in the "Writ, Appearance, and Judgment Departments"?—To a much less extent. Their work is of an important character, mistakes in which may be very serious.

45,435. But some of the work would be of a simple character?—Some of it would be, no doubt.

45,436. In your opinion what are the qualifications required for clerks entering the office?—It seems to me that what the Central Office requires in the first place is a man to be well educated—that is the main essential—that he should have a good character, and that he should be tactful. He will have in the course of his duties from the very beginning to deal with the public in regard to important matters.

45,437. The public with whom he has to deal consists, I suppose, almost entirely of solicitors' clerks?—I would not say almost entirely. Of course there are a certain number of solicitors who have very few clerks, and who have to do their work in person, and there is a not unimportant number of parties who appear in person.

45,438. Are there any considerable number of applications by parties in person?—A considerable number, and the number gives no adequate idea of the trouble which these applications may cause.

45,439. Because they are unfamiliar with the practice and require more assistance?—They are not acquainted with the practice, and they will expect advice, and, no doubt, will get it.

45,440. Do you attach any importance to a candidate having had professional experience before he enters the office?—For myself, I think that is quite a secondary matter; it is desirable, but of far more importance is that he should be a man well educated and of general intelligence, and tactful.

45,441. You attach much more importance to that than to previous professional experience?—Far more.

45,442. What is the present limit of age for appointments?—20 to 30.

45,443. How is an appointment made?—The appointment is made in rotation by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls.

45,444. Are you consulted with regard to candidates?—In the case of the candidates who are to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor I am. For a considerable period there has been in existence a practice, according to which every applicant to the Lord Chancellor is referred to me, and I have to see the applicant and then make a confidential report to the Lord Chancellor with respect to him. That is only as regards the Lord Chancellor's list.

45,445. That system has not been adopted by the Lord Chief Justice or the Master of the Rolls?—Not, at all events, so far as I am concerned.

45,446. (Mr. Boutwood.) And it is a recent thing, so far as the Lord Chancellor is concerned?—I am not quite sure whether it has been in existence three or four years.

45,447. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Practically since Lord Haldane's appointment?—Yes.

45,448. (Mr. Holt.) Do you know what system the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls adopt?—I do not.

45,449. (Chairman.) They simply appoint a man?—Yes; and I have nothing to do with it.

45,450. As a matter of fact, in the case of recent appointments, have the candidates had previous professional experience?—In some cases they have been in solicitors' offices, or they have had other legal experience. What the percentage is I cannot say.

45,451. What is your view as to the present limits of age? Do you think that they should be maintained or modified?—I, personally, would prefer to see the age fixed between 20 and 25.

45,452. You would like to get them younger?—Yes.

45,453. After nomination candidates have, at present, to pass a very simple examination by the Civil Service Commissioners?—Yes; they have to pass an examination.

45,454. That examination merely tests a certain degree of elementary education?—Little more than that.

45,455. Do you think the present system entirely satisfactory?—I cannot say that I do think it entirely satisfactory.

45,456. You do not think you get the best men who could be commanded by the scale of salary offered?—I think by another system, and if the adoption of some form of competition were made use of, we should get a larger choice. I must not be understood to speak in depreciation of our present staff. In my view it is excellent, but I think that there would be an improvement if another system than the present were adopted.

45,457. Are you aware whether any steps are taken at present to publish the fact of vacancies or approaching vacancies?—So far as I know, no steps are taken, but approaching vacancies are probably known to a great many members of the legal profession, and that knowledge spreads freely and rapidly.

45,458. But if there was a competition announced by the Civil Service Commissioners that would make it known to a much wider field?—I myself should prefer to see some system of competition.

45,459. Would you suggest a system of open competition, or competition subject to some qualification?—Again, I do not feel very strongly as between those two. For my own part my preference would be for open competition.

45,460. In the case of open competition, would you suggest any further check upon the persons selected than the usual period of probation?—Two things occur to me. In the first place, I think the head of the particular department ought to have some say or voice in regard to the appointment. It might be that a certain person had passed an examination very satisfactorily, and yet it might appear to the head of the department that he would not be suitable for the particular duties which he would have to perform.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,461. Then you would suggest something in the nature of a veto by the head of the department as the result of personal inspection?—I do not say that it should rest with the head of a particular department to have a veto, but that there should be some quarter in which his opinion should be duly considered.

45,462. When you speak of the head of the department, you mean, in the present case, the senior master?—I am speaking of my own department, the senior master's. Furthermore, after a man has been appointed as third class clerk, I think there should be some examination in the subjects connected with his department before he becomes a second class clerk.

45,463. Is there at present any period of probation after appointment?—No.

45,464. However unsatisfactory a clerk was found to be on appointment, you have no means of cancelling his appointment when once made?—No, but I will not say that the occasion in my experience has ever arisen in which one would desire to exercise such a power if it existed.

45,465. But if such an occasion arose, the power does not exist?—So far as I know, it does not.

45,466. (Mr. Holt.) Do you mean to say that no clerks can be dismissed?—I do not mean to say that. There is power in the Lord Chancellor of removal, but I do not understand that to be the question put to me.

(Chairman.) No, the question I put referred not to a case where incompetence was so great as to justify the exercise of the power of removal, but where it was sufficient to secure his rejection at the end of a period of probation.

45,467. (Mr. Coward.) Such a clerk could go on continually receiving an increase of salary every year?—That is rather a theoretical impossibility. I think if it was a case such as I understood one of the commissioners put to me, namely, of actual gross incompetence or gross neglect of duty, he would be removed.

45,468. The Chairman was suggesting something a little short of that?—If it was a case in which the clerk, though not committing any grave failure of duty, was not very satisfactory, there is, so far as I know, no power of removal.

45,469. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Have you any power of stopping his increment?—Not so far as I know.

45,470. (Mr. Holt.) In fact nothing can be done to the man unless he does something which almost amounts to committing a crime?—No, I cannot assent to that at all.

45,471. (Chairman.) What are your disciplinary powers in the case, say, of irregular attendance?—I must preface my answer by saying that during the time I have been senior master I have had scarcely any occasion to complain. There was one case in which I was not satisfied with the attendances, and I saw this particular clerk more than once, and the result was that a little talking to him led to an amendment.

45,472. Supposing the talking to did not lead to amendment, have you any power of punishment?—You are putting cases which have not arisen. In the first place he would not be promoted, and in the second place I should probably make a report either to the Lord Chief Justice or the Lord Chancellor.

45,473. In fact, the only disciplinary power that you have is the possibility of ultimate removal by the Lord Chancellor?—That, probably, is the theory of the matter; but, practically, the question does not arise. It seems to me from my experience that these are rather theoretical considerations.

45,474. As regards promotion, you speak of the Committee of Control. Is it one of the functions of that Committee to advise the Lord Chancellor as regards promotions?—Yes. All cases of promotion come before the Committee of Control.

45,475. Is promotion by seniority or by merit?—Both are considered. Of course, if two men are about equal in ability the senior is promoted, but merit is most distinctly recognised. I think on the very last occasion on which the Committee of Control had to consider the question of promotion, we passed over the senior man and appointed one who was his junior.

45,476. In how many cases of recent promotions has the order of strict seniority been departed from?—

There have not certainly been many. Probably about two or three during my time as senior master.

45,477. So that the usual rule is promotion by seniority, but in a limited number of instances that has been departed from?—Yes, but I ought to state that on every occasion when the matter of promotion comes before the Committee of Control the merit of each person is discussed.

45,478. I see the Committee of 1887 recommended that the advancement of each clerk should depend solely on his own merit. Can your practice at present be said to follow that recommendation?—I think so, on the whole. We discuss the merits of each person there is no doubt. I know it says, "Seniority should only be regarded when the merits are otherwise equal." In many cases it is almost impossible to distinguish between men.

45,479. You would say that the merits are so even that in practice it comes to much the same thing as seniority?—In certain cases we have, in point of fact, selected juniors. It is almost impossible to distinguish between two men who are equally doing their duty.

45,480. Is it not the case that out of a large number of men only a certain number are specially fitted for the performance of distinctly higher duties?—We find that long experience, with certain rare exceptions, enables a man to fulfil these duties. I cannot put it higher than this, that at each meeting of the Committee of Control dealing with questions of promotion, the question of merit is distinctly considered and discussed by the three masters.

45,481. Do you think that under the present system you get really the best men for your first class?—Yes, I think we do.

45,482. Ability and capacity coincide to such an extent with seniority that you do, as a fact, get the best men?—When I say that, it is not perhaps perfectly true, but on the whole that is correct.

45,483. If you had a man of really exceptional merit in the second class, a man who in intellectual power and capacity distinctly stood out above the whole class, would you select him for promotion above the others?—Undoubtedly.

45,484. But there is no such man?—I cannot say that there is. We have first class clerks who are men undoubtedly of very exceptional ability, and we have certain men of ability also in the third class, and we have some men of distinct ability in the second. Some of the first class clerks are exceptionally able.

45,485. But, as a matter of fact, no such exceptional selection, owing to outstanding capacity, has been made hitherto?—Yes, there has been one case. In the very last appointment we made we came to the conclusion that one gentleman ought to be passed over, and that another gentleman who was his junior had greater knowledge and ability.

45,486. Was not that a case where one gentleman was not promoted because he was not of special merit, rather than the selection of somebody lower down in the class because he had exceptional and special merit?—It is difficult, when you have made a selection, after considering all the circumstances and discussing it with your colleagues, to answer a question as to what were the precise motives in your mind, and how much weight you gave to this and how much weight you gave to that. All I can say is that in every case in which promotion has to be considered, merit is taken into account.

45,487. You have already mentioned that you would be in favour of an examination to qualify for promotion from the third to the second class?—It seems to me to be a good course to take.

45,488. The examination you suggest would be an examination in the work of the office?—Yes, in the work of the office.

45,489. Do you move clerks from one section of the office to another?—We do. About what the practice was before I became senior master I can speak with very little knowledge; but since I have been senior master we have freely moved clerks from one department to another, and we are endeavouring to give effect so far as practicable to a scheme according to which they shall move in a certain manner, passing from one department to another.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,490. So in that way a clerk will get a general knowledge of the duties of the office, and not one particular section of it only?—Yes; it is difficult to give effect to it in a short time, but our notion was that each clerk should enter the Filing Department; that in that department he should get familiarity with the various kinds of documents; that from that department he should pass, say, into the Bills of Sale Department, and from that into the Writ Department, and so on throughout the various departments.

45,491. Is it the case that at present appointments are always made to the third class, and not direct to higher classes?—Always to the third class.

45,492. Is that, in your opinion, the right system?—Undoubtedly.

45,493. Would it be desirable to make appointments direct to the other classes?—I think the present system of appointment direct to the third class is preferable.

45,494. That supplies you with good enough material for promotion to the higher classes?—It does; and even better material would be forthcoming if there were a competitive examination.

45,495. As regards the division of work between the different classes, is there a clear and distinct division between the functions of each class?—I cannot say that there is anything like a hard and fast division; but taking the Writ Department, undoubtedly very difficult questions would be settled by some of the senior clerks in the second class.

45,496. Is the number of clerks suitably adapted to the work to be performed?—On the whole I think it is.

45,497. The total number is now 69 clerks?—Sixty-nine as against 73 recommended by, I think, Lord Coleridge's Committee in 1887.

45,498. That is to say, a reduction of about 5 per cent.?—Yes; but during that time undoubtedly the work of the clerks, owing to the complication of the rules, has increased.

45,499. On the other hand, certain work—the taxing work—has been removed?—No doubt there is that difference.

45,500. And also there has been a diminution of judicial work generally?—That I do not think much affects the matter, for this reason: These figures must be read with reference to particular units, and there is not the slightest doubt that litigation is much more complicated than it was. The documents in cases are far longer than they formerly were. I appeal with confidence to Mr. Coward, whether the affidavits are not longer than they used to be.

45,501. (Mr. Coward.) Certainly, very much longer; but, on the other hand, it does not affect your clerks, does it?—In a way it does. In the Filing Department there would probably be an increase of affidavits.

45,502. I do not follow how that should be. Supposing my clerk comes in with an affidavit to file; it does not matter what the length of it is; it may be on one sheet of foolscap or it may be a very bulky document?—In speaking of the length of the affidavits, I had reference more to the duties of masters; but as regards the number of affidavits, they increase. Take applications under Order XIV.: more and more is there a tendency to have not merely two affidavits—the affidavit of the plaintiff and the affidavit of the defendant—but to have affidavits in reply, and sometimes more than one affidavit by each of the parties.

45,503. (Chairman.) I should like to put certain figures to you from the statistics with which you are familiar. Turning to the summary of proceedings in the King's Bench Division and taking the figures for the Central Office (because the work in the district registries does not affect you), I see that from 1888 to 1892 the annual average number of writs of summons was 44,347, and in 1912 it was 37,000, a reduction of about 16 per cent. Taking the same period of comparison for the proceedings in chambers: summonses issued in the former period from 1888 to 1892 were 40,234 annually, and in 1912 29,270 or a reduction of about 27 per cent.?—One explanation of that is that the adoption of the summons for directions led at once to the reduction of the number of summonses.

45,504. But is it not the number of summonses which determines the work of the office, as distinguished from the work of the masters?—No, because, take first of all the proceedings before the adoption of the summons for directions, there would be perhaps in one action five or six applications, and five or six orders, and five or six summonses.

45,505. I am taking the number of summonses which would include those five or six summonses?—I am comparing the state of things before the use of the summons for directions with the state of things after the adoption of the summons for directions. Before the summons for directions was adopted there would be five or six individual summonses swelling the number of summonses; after the summons for directions was adopted there would appear in place of the five individual summonses only one summons, thus reducing the number of summonses.

45,506. So far as the officer who issues the summons is concerned, his work would be reduced from five or six to one?—It would be, but so far as the orders are concerned there would be the same orders.

45,507. I will come to a comparison of the orders. In the former period the number of orders was 43,237 annually; in the latter period it was 32,755—a still larger reduction of 32 per cent.?—I am not saying that there has not been a reduction, but on the other hand a large number of the actions in the former years were what I may call not living actions; they were really practically undefended actions, and the number of those is diminishing.

45,508. I was merely calling attention to the figures as showing that there has been a real reduction in the volume of office work?—There are the figures.

45,509. What are the arrangements as regards leave or vacation in the case of the clerks?—The annual leave is limited to 36 working days, the period which was recommended by Lord Coleridge's Committee.

45,510. What is the arrangement in vacations? Do the greater part of the officers attend in the vacations?—The leave is, as far as possible, taken during the vacations.

45,511. But the clerks only get 36 days; they do not get the vacations besides?—Only 36 days.

45,512. We had it in evidence that in the Chancery chambers the clerks enjoy the whole of the legal vacations?—That is not so with us.

45,513. Is there any reason for that difference?—I would rather speak only of my own department.

45,514. In your own department there is work for the clerks to do during the vacation?—There is.

45,515. The current work of the office goes on, even though the Courts are not sitting?—Yes; the current work goes on.

45,516. (Mr. Coward.) You can issue writs, but you cannot issue ordinary summonses for time and that kind of thing. All those things are adjourned until after the vacation?—No; that is not so. There was a statement made in the Report of the Commission, which has been referred to, to that effect, but that statement is not quite correct. During vacation the masters hear all summonses, for example, under Order XIV.; they hear any application requiring urgency; and, as regards time summonses, those are not heard because times for pleadings do not run in the vacation, except as regards actions which are to be brought on at certain assizes, such as Manchester and Liverpool.

45,517. (Mr. Holt.) Thirty-six working days, in round figures, is half the Long Vacation?—That is about it.

45,518. (Chairman.) Are the hours of attendance varied in the Long Vacation?—The hours are to some extent varied.

45,519. (Mr. Coward.) The offices close at 2 o'clock every day, do they not?—Yes.

45,520. You cannot issue a writ after 2 o'clock?—On page 11 of my précis I give the hours of attendance, both on ordinary days and in vacation.

45,521. (Chairman.) On ordinary days the hours are 10 to 4, and in vacations 10.30 to 2.30, or, in the case of certain departments, 10.30 to 1.30?—Yes.

45,522. So in vacation the clerks who are not on leave have a very easy time?—I would not say that, but those are the hours which are kept. 10.30 to 1.30 are easy hours for a day's work.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,523. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do they come on Saturdays in vacation?—Yes.

45,524. (Chairman.) Can you suggest any arrangements by which the work could be more evenly distributed, so as to employ the staff adequately in the vacation?—That is a very difficult question. The work of the offices depends largely upon the work of the judges; and, if the judges are not sitting, of course, to some extent the work in the offices diminishes during the vacation.

45,525. If the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Delay in the King's Bench, as regards the master's vacation, were carried out, that would diminish the period during which the office is working at reduced power?—No doubt it would to some extent. At the same time one finds that when cases are taken during the vacation there is extreme difficulty in getting the attendance of witnesses, and there is extreme difficulty in getting the attendance of counsel and even of solicitors.

45,526. (Mr. Holt.) What happens to those clerks at Christmas, Whitsuntide, and Easter, when the Courts are not sitting. Is that part of their vacation too?—I cannot give quite an off-hand answer whether there are special arrangements made with regard to that. I will ascertain that.*

45,527. (Mr. Coward.) At any rate, there are no judges there, and the number of masters is very limited in the short vacations; that is to say, there would be only one master?—No, for a certain period there would be two masters.

45,528. (Chairman.) You gave us your opinion as regards an age limit for retirement in the case of masters. Will you give us your opinion upon that subject in the case of clerks?—I should be sorry to see a hard and fast line drawn, having in view certain of the men who are among the first class clerks. I should be exceedingly sorry, speaking of one or two of them, if they were compulsorily retired at 70.

45,529. The recommendation of the Coleridge Committee as regards clerks was that every junior clerk should retire at 60 and every first class clerk at 65, with power to extend their service by five years in special cases. What would be your opinion of a system of that kind?—I should like to see even a longer period of extension. Some of the men who are amongst the older clerks in the first class are men of the highest efficiency at the present moment.

45,530. That would give power in special cases to extend their service to 70 years?—I should like to see that done.

45,531. Would you like the power of retaining them even beyond 70 years? At the present moment are there any clerks whose age is greater than 70?—There is only one such clerk, and he is in the Crown Office. He is a first class clerk.

45,532. You are of opinion that there are certain cases in which retention is indispensable in the public interest?—In the public interest. There are certain men among the first class clerks who are over 65 and are approaching 70, whose retention, it seems to me, in the public interest would be desirable.

45,533. At present clerks are not in any case eligible for appointment to masterships?—That is so.

45,534. In your opinion, is it desirable to keep up that absolute bar, or would you think it advisable to make clerks in exceptional cases eligible for appointment as masters?—I should be the last to speak lightly or disparagingly of the head clerks. Far from it; I have the highest opinion of their ability and their zeal, but the nature of their duties is not such as would prepare them for the duties of masters; they are important duties, but of a different character.

45,535. You think that experience at the Bar is more valuable for masters?—Far more valuable.

45,536. So in principle you would maintain that rigid barrier?—I would maintain that distinction.

45,537. (Mr. Holt.) You are senior master and King's Remembrancer by reason of an Act of Parliament that attaches that office to the person who has been master for the longest period of time?—That is so.

45,538. I understand from you that the duties of senior master are distinctly more responsible than those of the other masters?—I would not say more responsible, but they are larger.

45,539. They are larger and more important. If that be so, would it not be in the public interest that, when the office of senior master falls vacant, it should be given to the most competent?—I have no objection to such a plan.

45,540. Do you see any reason why, instead of it being the absolute right of the man with the longest service, it should not be given, say, by the Lord Chancellor, or some other person to the master who is thought to be most capable?—I see no objection to such a course.

45,541. Does the master of the Crown Office who makes, I think, a sixth master, do the same sort of work as the other masters?—No, the duties of the master of the Crown Office are of a different character. For instance, he acts as registrar for the Court of Criminal Appeal, an entirely distinct department.

45,542. Supposing he was unfortunately ill and unable to attend to his duties, would one of the other masters do his duties for him?—There is an assistant registrar connected purely with the Criminal Appeal Court. We have no duties in that court.

45,543. Are all his duties in the Criminal Appeal Court?—Master Kershaw has some other duties connected with the Crown Office.

45,544. But supposing he was unwell and unable to attend to his duties, so ill as to be laid up for six weeks during the sittings of the Court, would one of the other masters take those duties?—As regards the Court of Criminal Appeal we would have no jurisdiction.

45,545. Would the result of Master Kershaw being ill be that the Court of Criminal Appeal would have to stop its work?—You are asking me about a department I have absolutely no knowledge of.

45,546. Is this master to be treated as a person who is entirely separate from your duties?—So far as the Court of Criminal Appeal is concerned he has entirely different duties.

45,547. Supposing one of the other masters was unwell and unable to attend to his duties, would Master Kershaw assist in the extra work or not?—We have never called upon him to do so. If the Court of Criminal Appeal was sitting at the time, and it sits frequently, we could not call upon him.

45,548. In this return which has been given to us Master Kershaw is put down as being, so to speak, one of your department, but you apparently rather repudiate that?—I would not say that. The Crown Office, after all, belongs to the Central Office, but so far as he is a master of the Court of Criminal Appeal he is entirely distinct. He has criminal jurisdiction; we have absolutely none.

45,549. Apparently he was appointed to his present position in January 1912, but he had been in the public service since May 1908. What had been his previous position?—I could not answer that. Probably he will be able to tell you better than I can.

45,550. I notice that he is apparently the only master who was in the public service before obtaining his present appointment?—I have no personal knowledge about that, but I could obtain the information.

45,551. Can a master be removed by the Lord Chancellor?—Undoubtedly.

45,552. Are the decisions of a master invariably subject to appeal?—I would not say invariably. There are a few cases in which there would be no appeal, but as regards the great majority of his decisions they are subject to appeal.

45,553. You told us that the duties put upon you by the Emergency Powers Act were put upon you by some Rules of Court?—By statute and rules.

45,554. But I do not remember any words in the statute referring to masters?—No, but certain duties

* The offices of the Central Office are open every day of the year with the exception of the days specified in Order 63, rule 6, of the Rules of the Supreme Court.—J. M.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

were specified, and then rules were made under the Act, and these duties were put upon us.

45,555. Would it have been possible for the persons who drew up the rules to assign those duties to persons other than the masters. Could they have assigned them to the clerks if they had thought fit to do so?—No, I think not. There are certain words in the statute, if I remember rightly, which would have prevented that. Such rules would be ultra vires.

45,556. (Chairman.) You mean that the functions would have to be exercised by an officer who has the powers and authority of a judge?—Yes. I forget the words in the statute, but it is “by a court or judge,” or some such words.

45,557. (Mr. Holt.) With regard to your duties as King’s Remembrancer, what is “the receiving and acknowledgment of deeds by married women”?—There are very few certificates of those now filed. They have to be entered in the King’s Remembrancer’s Department.

45,558. Why do deeds by a married woman have to be treated differently from deeds by other people?—I cannot answer that question.

45,559. Is it some sort of old technicality?—Yes.

45,560. You told us that the senior master must be necessarily a barrister. The statute permits him to be a solicitor. Do you know of a case in which a solicitor has been appointed?—Among the six masters at the present time, including myself, there is no solicitor, formerly there was a case or cases of such appointment; for instance, Master Johnson was a solicitor.

45,561. (Mr. Coward.) A very able master?—A very able master.

45,562. (Mr. Holt.) Your own opinion is that there is no reason why solicitors should not at times be appointed to the position?—I think the training and experience at the Bar is the better training and experience, but I would not for one moment say that there might not be excellent appointments made from solicitors.

45,563. You are probably aware that a Chancery master must be a solicitor, and may not be a barrister? That is so.

45,564. Perhaps you will not be surprised to hear that the Chancery masters think that solicitors alone are competent for such positions, and barristers are not competent. Are you able to suggest that there is such a difference between the duties of a Chancery master and the duties of a master in the King’s Bench as to make a barrister the most suitable man in the one case and the less suitable man in the other case?—I do not want to put it too high, because I must not be understood as saying that there are not solicitors who would not perform the duty admirably, but I do think that on the whole the training at the Bar is preferable. The master has to deal with applications with regard to pleadings, for example—a large portion of his duties relates to pleadings, statements of claims and defences and replies, and so on. A practising junior barrister has spent a considerable portion of his life in dealing with such questions. A solicitor has probably been occupied otherwise, and possibly more profitably than in dealing with those matters. That is one difference.

45,565. Are you aware of any facts which would make the same train of reasoning inapplicable to the case of the Chancery Division?—Yes, I think so. In the first place, they have no original jurisdiction; they act only in the name of the judge, and if there is any difficulty which arises, there is not an appeal but the matter is referred to a judge; whereas the King’s Bench masters have original jurisdiction and determine the matter before them, and if the parties are dissatisfied there is an appeal to the judge, and that is not so in Chancery.

45,566. You do not think there are any classes of work which the master performs which might be devolved upon his clerks if there was a right of appeal to the master?—At the present time I cannot think of any that could be profitably devolved.

45,567. Would your clerks have the ability to perform the duties of the taxing masters?—I am no longer dealing with taxing, but drawing upon my experience as a taxing master, they might perform certain subsidary parts of the work, but I should think, in the main, the work ought to be done by taxing masters—solicitors of wide experience.

45,568. Taxing masters then are solicitors, and not barristers?—Yes, solicitors.

45,569. You said there was no promotion for masters. Have masters ever been made judges?—I believe there is an instance of a master in Chancery (who is an extinct functionary) being appointed a judge. I think Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was a master in Chancery; but there has been no instance of a King’s Bench master having been promoted.

45,570. Then, theoretically, a master might be appointed a judge of the High Court?—Theoretically.

45,571. You state that in the King’s Remembrancer’s Department you have to “attend to correspondence with under-sheriffs and Privy Council Office as to persons eligible for the office of high sheriff”?—Yes, but that is a very small matter.

45,572. That is, again, except with regard to Lancaster and Cornwall?—Yes. Then there are a great many ceremonial duties connected with the office which I have not mentioned at all.

45,573. I suppose you have a position at the Coronation?—For instance, one has to attend to the Trial of the Pyx, swearing the jury of Goldsmiths empanelled in order to determine whether the sovereign contains its due proportions, and then to receive the verdict. There are a number of ceremonial functions which I have not mentioned.

45,574. Are you at all conversant with the organisation of the other departments of the Government, such as the Local Government Board?—No, I cannot say I am.

45,575. You would not be able to say whether the class of clerk that is employed in those departments would be satisfactory to your department?—I have been brought into contact with clerks in the Home Office and in the Board of Trade. When I was at the Bar I was one of the counsel for the Board of Trade, and had some experience of Government departments.

45,576. Supposing you were supplied with clerks recruited by the same method and in the same circumstances as the clerks who go into other Government departments, would that be satisfactory to you, as far as you know?—I should not like to answer that question unless it was put in a more precise form, if I may venture to say so.

45,577. (Mr. Holt.) I think I am right in saying that the head of a Government department, such as the Local Government Board or the Post Office, does not have any opportunity of vetoing any particular clerk who is sent to him by the Civil Service Commissioners. (Chairman.) He has no opportunity of vetoing, but there is a period of probation. (Mr. Holt.) Supposing, as regards your clerks, you were put in the position that you had no veto, but there was a period of probation, during which you could reject a man if he appeared to be unsuitable, would that be satisfactory?—That would be satisfactory.

45,578. (Mr. Boutwood.) You speak of “associates.” What are they, and what do they do?—The associates were originally officers of the court connected with the three courts—King’s Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. After these courts were amalgamated the officers became masters, and then there came a change in which the associate, properly speaking, ceased to exist, and there only remained clerks whose work was formerly done by associates. That is to say, they attend in court, they chronicle the results of the trials, and they do certain work in the way of entering cases and so on connected with the actual trials.

45,579. So there is an Associates Department now, but no “associates”?—The “associate,” in the old sense, is a thing of the past.

45,580. How does promotion run in the Central Office? Is it fairly frequent, or is there anything approaching to stagnation?—It varies from time to time. I have here a statement which, if necessary, I could put in, which shows the length of service of each clerk in the various grades; showing, for instance, that one man had been 8½ years in the third class, another had been 12 years, and so on. All that information is to be found with reference to each clerk in this statement. If an average were arrived at, it would not be very useful, because the materials over which the average is formed are so varied.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,581. It was suggested to us yesterday that the initial scale of salary for the third class was not quite adequate, that 100*l.* to 200*l.* was not sufficient to attract the best men, and 150*l.* to 250*l.* was suggested. Is there anything in your experience which would lead you to speak for or against that?—I have heard many complaints from clerks that owing to the effect of the rise in prices the result was that, practically, their salaries had been reduced; and it seemed to me there was some force in that, and probably the result will be, in the long run, not to attract quite so good a class of men.

45,582. Upon your side have the masters any dealings with property? When the Chancery system was being explained to us yesterday, apparently it was thought that a solicitor was a more suitable man for a Chancery mastership, because he had considerable dealings with property?—There come before us actions of almost all kinds, and in the course of these actions questions arise with regard to property. If by “property” is meant that we have nothing to do or very little to do with conveyances or rectification of contracts, that is perfectly true.

45,583. Or administration?—That is so.

45,584. (Mr. Coward.) Dealings under the Settled Land Act and that kind of thing do not come your way?—We have nothing to do with that. There are specially assigned under rules to the Chancery Division large groups of questions which have direct reference to “property,” using that word in a general sense.

45,585. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) When it is the Lord Chancellor’s turn to appoint in the Central Office he refers the proposed appointment to you?—It is not quite that. When an applicant applies to be put on the list of candidates, he refers the applicant to me, and I see this applicant, have some talk with him, and make a confidential report; but it rests then with the Lord Chancellor whether he shall be put upon the waiting list of candidates.

45,586. A man is not put on the waiting list until after report by you, but after that you hear nothing more about him until you hear he has been appointed?—Precisely.

45,587. (Chairman.) Can you tell us whether candidates, as a rule, apply for a particular office—for the Central Office for instance—or whether they apply for a post in the offices of the court generally?—I have known cases in which the applicant has told me that he has applied not merely for a post in the Central Office, but for a post in other legal departments—whether that is general or not I cannot say.

45,588. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) All clerks are now appointed to the third class?—Yes.

45,589. And you think it is necessary that they should be well educated, if they are to do their future work?—Yes.

45,590. The examination for a third class clerk is in handwriting, spelling, arithmetic up to fractions, copying manuscript, English composition, indexing, digesting returns into summaries. As a test of good education that is something worse than ridiculous?—It is very inadequate.

45,591. The clerks in your office go from clerks at 100*l.* a year doing very subordinate work—the lowest work there is—up to clerks receiving normally 600*l.* a year, five of whom get more than 600*l.* a year. In other departments is it not the case that such a great range both of work and salary would be dealt with by having two grades of appointment, one to the lower work, and the other, presumably of better men, to the higher work?—I cannot say what is done in other departments of the Government service, but I think that this system, on the whole, works well. It is advantageous for a man to have passed through all the departments. The work is of an extremely technical character—perhaps it is unfortunate that it is so, but there it is.

45,592. But if you can appoint men originally—a certain few men—at 200*l.* a year, with the understanding that they shall learn their trade in the lower offices, but be trained for the higher work, and that they should go rather more rapidly up to the well-paid posts, would not you get better men in fact than those you get at 100*l.* a year, who will spend perhaps ten to fourteen years on very routine work?—I am not prepared to say that you would not, but I think a preferable system would be to insist upon a competitive examination before entrance into the third class.

45,593. But the competitive examination candidates would only represent those people who were content to spend about 14 years, as things are now, in the third class?—Then, as I put to the Chairman in answer to his question, I would suggest that there should be an examination of those in the third class, the effect of which would probably be to winnow out the best men.

45,594. But unless you have a good man originally you do not make anyone into a good man by submitting him to an examination?—No; but if you tell the men who enter the third class that there is the prospect of advancement to a higher grade with salaries such as you have mentioned, then I think you would get a very good class.

45,595. You said you did not approve the suggestion of an age limit for the clerks?—Not as regards retirement.

45,596. Are the grounds of your objection to an age limit generally applicable to the whole Civil Service, or are they confined to this particular office?—I have not the knowledge which would enable me to form an opinion as to the general Civil Service. I confine my observations solely to my department, founded upon individual cases present to my mind.

45,597. At present the senior master has by statute the right to be senior master with all the duties?—Quite so.

45,598. I think you told us that in your judgment there would be no objection to substituting for that an arrangement that it should be a definite appointment?—In answer to a question put by one of the Commissioners, I stated that I saw no objection to altering the terms of appointment, so that it should rest with the Lord Chancellor or some other authority, or authorities, to nominate any other master.

45,599. Would you agree that it is rather a peculiarity of the legal departments that matters of office arrangement and promotion are so often made statutory?—I cannot recall to my mind enough instances in order to feel that I am justified in saying “very often,” because I have not present to my mind other instances.

45,600. Take the fact that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls have by statute the right to nominate to your office in rotation; that is a matter of office arrangement which in no other department of the Government would be made statutory?—I take it from you that that is so.

45,601. You have told us that that arrangement of appointment by rotation in the case of the masters is, in your judgment, unobjectionable, because your words were: “Every opportunity existed for judging the fitness of the barristers concerned”?—Quite so.

45,602. I am going to put certain questions to you now arising out of that answer. Is it the case that Master — is the son of a judge?—He is the son of a judge, and let me add he is a most able and efficient master.

45,603. And Master — is the cousin of a judge?—I do not know the exact terms of relationship, but may I add also that among the whole legal profession there will be only one opinion about his remarkable efficiency.

45,604. Master — is the son of a judge?—He is the son of a judge and a very competent master.

45,605. Master — is the cousin of a Lord Chief Justice’s wife?—That I do not know.

45,606. Master — is the son of a judge?—Yes.

45,607. Master — is the son of a Lord Chief Justice?—That is so.

45,608. Master — is the brother-in-law of a Lord Chief Justice?—I believe that is so. May I add that I have not the honour to be related directly or indirectly to any judge.

19 February 1915.]

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,609. Does that suggest to you that some of those opportunities of judging the fitness of the persons concerned are gained in the intimacy of family life?—It is a question that I could scarcely answer. There are the facts.

45,610. Would you say that the whole conception of appointment by rotation must originally have been based upon the idea that patronage was a personal privilege and not a burdensome duty?—Are you asking me an historical question?

45,611. Yes.—It is a difficult question to answer. It is difficult to know what was in the minds of those who originated that system.

45,612. A good deal of the work in your department is done in the Scrivenery Department?—That is a separate department over which one master, Master Archibald, has control.

45,613. Are you familiar with the scrivenery arrangement?—Not minutely. In a general way I know, but I have no direct concern with that.

45,614. In your department do you yourself personally make any use of shorthand. Do you dictate anything to a shorthand writer?—Occasionally, yes.

45,615. How do you obtain the shorthand writer?—One of the clerks, Mr. Philip Clark, writes shorthand, and in dictating letters I give him the heads which he takes down in shorthand.

45,616. It happens to be the case that one of your third class clerks writes shorthand?—I believe there are more, but you asked the question as to myself, and my answer is solely with respect to myself. I dictate the heads of letters to him.

45,617. Is there any systematic arrangement made to secure that there shall be a sufficient knowledge of shorthand in the Central Office?—No, I do not think there is. I do not know that it is much required.

45,618. Is there a certain amount of typewriting done?—A certain amount.

45,619. Do you think sufficient use is made of the typewriter?—I think that use might be extended.

45,620. Is there any systematic arrangement, as in other offices, for providing for the typewriting work?—There is a certain amount, but I think that might be extended.

45,621. You know that the whole method of office routine and mechanical arrangement has been revolutionised by such arrangements as vertical filing, loose leaf ledgers, and so on, in business houses?—Yes.

45,622. Has there been any systematic attempt to inquire whether those inventions might be adopted in the Central Office?—There have been some inquiries, I cannot say systematic inquiries; but the work of the Filing Department has been from time to time examined.

45,623. Do you think that further improvements might result from further inquiry?—It is quite conceivable that that would be so.

45,624. But it is nobody's special business to make that inquiry?—You may take it generally that everything connected with details of improvements of that kind would in the long run have to come to me, and again I should like to add, though it is not quite an answer to your question, that there are far too many points of detail thrown upon the senior master.

45,625. If there was an appointment of the nature of chief clerk, as the Chairman indicated, that could be part of his duty?—That would not quite meet all that I want. I should suggest more than that. I should like to see, as I think I have stated already in answer to the Chairman, a special clerk attached to each master, and no doubt if that were the case many such details could be looked into.

45,626. But those details are general to the office, and it would be a great disadvantage to the office if each master adopted different methods?—Of course, one of the points which would be discussed by the Committee of Control would be concerted action with regard to those things.

45,627. (Mr. Coward.) First of all, about the qualification for mastership. You rather seemed to favour the elevation to mastership of members of the Bar. There may be a question about that, may there not. I speak quite independently, because I was at the Bar myself; but it seems to me that you may have a better man from the solicitors' branch than from the Bar. The qualification is five years' practice?—The nominal qualification.

45,628. So that you may get a man who has been at the Bar for five years, or ten years, if you like. If he has been at the Bar ten years and he has been at all successful, and his abilities prove him to be so, he would perhaps hesitate to take a mastership. If he were going to be very successful he would hesitate because the prizes are so great. Again, if he were not successful he might have really very little experience at all. Whereas a man from the solicitors' branch would be bound to have had a very considerable amount of experience, and far more practice as a rule, than a man who is doing nothing at the Bar, because he is sure to be a clerk or in practice in some way or other, so as to get more experience than the man who is not successful at the Bar would get. Is not that right?—You must clearly understand that I do not for a moment suggest that certain solicitors would not make excellent masters. I further would remark that, so far as I know, there have been no cases in which a master has been appointed, as you suggested, when he had been five or ten years at the Bar—at all events, within my knowledge. I put my opinion no higher than this, that I think, on the whole, the training of a barrister, who has had actual practice, would be a preferable training to the ordinary experience of a solicitor.

45,629. A man at the Bar, who is making 1,500*l.* a year, say, after six or seven years, would know very well that he had a chance of getting near the top of the tree?—Yes; but there are cases in which a man who is in very considerable practice, and earning far more than that, is offered a mastership; perhaps his health may be doubtful, and he looks forward to a pension, and that—I can speak from actual experience—has been the determining factor in certain cases.

45,630. I quite readily appreciate that, especially when you bear in mind that the man at the Bar who is in successful practice has a very, very onerous and laborious life, because he would be in court all day and have to read his briefs at night—that is his lot; whereas, if he becomes a master, he will go down to the office at 11 o'clock in the morning?—No, not at 11 o'clock, if you are taking an actual case.

45,631. What time do you say?—Take my own case. I come at various times, from 10 to half-past 10.

45,632. And then there is a luncheon interval. You would not find a master there after four as a rule, would you?—Probably the majority would have left.

45,633. Therefore, it is a very pleasant life in that sense. It is very different to the life a man would have at the Bar, and a very different life to the life a man would have in a solicitor's office doing any work?—That is not quite my description of it. I speak with some experience of work in other professions, and I take leave to say there is no work harder than that which a master has in disposing of a list of summonses, including many counsel summonses, ranging in number from 60 to 70. On certain days, at certain times, we try actions, and my experience is that, in disposing of a long list of summonses in which you have to master, so far as you can, one group of facts, pass rapidly from it and master another group of facts, one hour at chambers is equivalent to two hours trying actions in which you have the assistance of counsel.

45,634. That I can appreciate. Now, dealing with the masters, what I was upon was that solicitors, if good men and experienced, ought to be singularly capable of undertaking the duties of master?—Perhaps I am repeating myself, but again I would not desire in any way to convey the impression that certain solicitors would not be excellent masters. I put it no higher than that I think, on the whole, the experience at the Bar is preferable.

45,635. That is your view. We have heard a good deal about the changes that have occurred of recent years in the character of the work of the masters, but there is one thing that occurs to me in which the work of the Common Law masters differs from that of the Chancery masters. We heard from Master Romer yesterday his description of what the Chancery masters do. I gather, if my knowledge is anything, that the masters in the Common Law division hear and determine all their cases, and their clerks do not interfere at all, and have nothing to do with them. That is right, is it not?—Yes.

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,636. The master sits in his room by himself, hears these summonses and reads the affidavits, and comes to his conclusion upon the case, and he gives his decision, and there is an end of that. His clerks have nothing to do with it; they do not read his affidavits for him, and do not have anything to do with him. Is that right?—Yes.

45,637. Of course, the work has changed to a considerable extent. The taxing work you used to perform was substantial?—Yes, it was substantial.

45,638. That you have been relieved from. You no longer sit in court, but the masters used to sit in court?—Yes.

45,639. I do not think I ever remember to have seen you sit in court?—No; it was before my time.

45,640. But I remember Master Campbell and Master Earle used to sit in court?—Yes.

45,641. And never did anything else?—I will not say that.

45,642. It was found quite unnecessary that they should sit there?—So Lord Coleridge's Committee found.

45,643. And the courts have done without them, and nobody has ever suggested that anybody has suffered from it?—I have heard no complaint.

45,644. The registrars do sit in the Courts of Chancery, and are masters in that sense. It may be that they are necessary there; but certainly they are not necessary on the Common Law side?—That I cannot speak about.

45,645. On this question of the vacation, I myself am a great advocate for vacations, because I think the man who works ought to have a little rest; but, still, the court vacations are a very serious matter. I should think the vacations absorb over one-third of the year, and if you calculate you will find that there are very few over 200 days in the year, apart from vacations, which are the working days of the year for the masters?—The Calendar will show the exact number of days.

45,646. (Chairman.) 212 is, I think, the number?—Somewhere about that.

45,647. (Mr. Coward.) Excepting the judges and the masters and their clerks, there are altogether nearly 500 clerks in all the offices—the Central Office, Chancery Division, Taxing Office, Admiralty, and Bankruptcy—over 400—and if you are going to occupy the time of those people for only 212 days out of the total of the year, it shows that there must be, I should have thought, a very great lack of work for them at particular parts of the year, that is to say when they are not at work?—Of course, that all turns on the question of whether there should be a Long Vacation, and also whether there should be the other vacations. That is a question upon which each one of us may have our own opinion. The vacations may not be defensible, but assuming the vacations are to exist, it follows that a certain amount of the work at chambers must diminish.

45,648. I suggest to you that, practically speaking, there is no work during the vacations. There is only one judge in attendance once a week?—Yes, one judge.

45,649. And most of the things he deals with at his own house, in cases of emergency?—I am not acquainted with how he deals with them. It is a question to be put to him rather than to me.

45,650. There is one master in attendance?—Always one master in attendance.

45,651. And then there are this number of clerks, so what those do it is difficult to conceive?—Before the Commission, of which you were a member, I gave evidence as to the exact quantity of work which was done during the Long Vacation. I gave the exact figures as to the writs issued, as to the summonses issued, as to the judgments that were signed, and as to the executions that were issued. I cannot charge my memory with the exact figures now, but in my evidence will be found those figures, and if I remember rightly the purport of those figures, it was not as you stated. A very considerable amount of work is done.

45,652. You spoke just now of the issuing of writs. It is not even the kind of work that a clerk at a railway station does—that of issuing tickets?—I do not for a moment agree with you in regard to that issuing of writs.

45,653. My clerk will come up with a writ prepared; he hands it into the clerk at the office, who seals it. Is not that it?—Yes, but in a great many instances, as you doubtless know, the indorsement on the writ which is presented would be of a varied character. It might not comply with certain rules; for instance, if it is an indorsement in an action for libel it might have failed to specify the particular date of the publication of the libel. If it was a liquidated claim it might have failed to comply with the requirements under Order 3, Rule 6.

45,654. Would it be the clerk's duty to call my clerk's attention to that omission if he chose to go in and issue a wrong writ. It would not be his duty but my duty; and, as you pointed out, I should be liable for an action for negligence if I did it improperly?—I do not say your clerk, but many clerks are not experienced, and certainly in the case of litigants in person, the clerk in the office undoubtedly would call attention to irregularities.

45,655. But it is not part of his duty to do it in any other sense than this, that he would look to see that the thing was right?—In that sense, but I disclaim entirely the comparison which you were good enough to make between the issue of a railway ticket and the issue of a writ. It seems to me quite an inaccurate description, if I may say so.

45,656. With regard to the recruiting of the first class clerks; these gentlemen who are first class clerks get very substantial salaries. Their salaries are 500*l.* to 800*l.* a year?—One gets 800*l.* a year, but that is a personal arrangement.

45,657. There are two marked in my list at 800*l.*, one at 700*l.*, one at 640*l.*, and so they go down. Is not that a very high salary for what they have to do? Perhaps you would hardly consider that you are a judge of what salaries should be given?—I do not pretend to be.

45,658. But it is a substantial salary?—Obviously it is substantial.

45,659. Do you not consider that it would be very expedient to have competition for the position of first class clerk; that is to say, would not you think that some of the managing clerks in solicitors' offices would make most excellent first class clerks?—Some of them undoubtedly would.

45,660. Will you look at this list of names. I expect you know most of them [showing list to witness]?—Some of them I recognise at once.

45,661. Do you think that if you had an opportunity of recruiting from such people as those it might be very advantageous?—Some of them, no doubt, would make excellent clerks, and no one could be better than some of them; but, I think, if you were to introduce these gentlemen from the outside, it would have a discouraging effect upon the men in the third and second class, and an inferior class of men would probably come in.

45,662. I would point out that in recruiting for my own office for the posts that may be vacant, it would very often happen that I should have to get someone from the outside. I should not necessarily raise somebody because he had been in my office; it would be ridiculous, would it not? What I want is the best man that can be got; and certainly, if I have a wider area of selection, I should be likely to have the better man. Is not that right?—You might get a certain number of good men, but it might have a generally depressing effect upon the service. Further, some of these gentlemen, whose names you have put before me, are no doubt excellent men, but would they all submit to an examination?

45,663. Perhaps it would not be necessary. They have taken their examination in the career of life?—That allows me to make this further observation. They would either have to submit to an examination or not. If they did not submit to an examination there would be no security that the outsiders would always be the most competent persons. It is possible that others of a different character might be introduced.

Sir JOHN MACDONELL, LL.D., C.B.

45,664. It might be, but at present for the highest posts you select them from outside; for the next high posts they go up by gradation, and, as a matter of fact, it is by seniority?—Yes.

45,665. Each judge, upon his appointment, nominates his own clerk?—Yes.

45,666. That clerk has no public duties whatever to perform. All he does is, as I think we heard from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, that if a judge's decision on a trial is appealed against, the clerk makes a copy of his notes that he took upon the trial. That is about the extent of the clerk's duties?—I do not doubt the accuracy of your statement, but I have no means of knowledge in regard to that.

45,667. I was only going to suggest this to you. You have had experience of the practice in the courts: would there be in your view any objection to the appointment of a clerk who should have the ability to do the work that is required to be done in the court?—You are speaking of judges' clerks?

45,668. Yes?—I should be able to answer that question if I were a judge. I know so little about the exact personal duties of judges' clerks that I should not like to answer it.

45,669. It is somewhat important, for this reason, that the amount paid to the judges' clerks is 6,900*l.* a year, which is a good deal more than the cost of another judge?—I could not profess to answer that question; I know so little about his duties.

Master WILLIAM FREDERICK BAKER, called and examined.

45,675. (Chairman.) The office that you hold is that of senior master in the taxing office of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

45,676. How long have you held that office?—I have been 25 years a master, and, I think, I have been senior master about 10 years.

45,677. Before appointment, what was your position?—I was a solicitor in practice in the City of London for over 21 years.

45,678. The taxing office deals with taxation of costs?—Yes.

45,679. Will you tell us what that means?—It means adjudicating between litigants as to what the loser ought to pay, or between a solicitor and his late clients if they have quarrelled as to whether his costs against his clients are proper or not.

45,680. Does your department deal with taxing in all branches of the Supreme Court?—No, not Probate, Divorce, Admiralty, Lunacy, or Bankruptcy.

45,681. Those divisions are outside your department?—Yes.

45,682. When was the taxing office, as it exists now, instituted?—In January 1902.

45,683. Was that consequent upon an inquiry?—What was called "The Taxation of Costs Committee."

45,684. That Committee sat in 1901, and was presided over by Lord Alverstone?—Yes.

45,685. The result of the recommendations of that Committee was to unite in the Taxing Office various operations of taxation which before had been performed in separate departments?—Yes, which departments were a good deal scattered.

45,686. Has the result of that amalgamation been satisfactory?—I think so.

45,687. What is the present staff which deals with the matter?—11 masters, 23 clerks, and two messengers.

45,688. What is the nature of the questions dealt with on taxation?—Take the case of an action which has been tried in which perhaps the plaintiff has failed on some part of his case; it is very often left to the taxing master to say how much of his case as he put it forward has failed, and of which he ought to pay the costs. That is what we call an issue; that is very difficult.

45,689. That means separating the costs into the parts attributable to one issue and to the other issues?—Very often it means, practically, trying the case over again, and reading the evidence and seeing as to each

45,670. (Mr. Shipley.) I gather that you think it would be in the interest of the public if there were more masters appointed?—A few more, yes.

45,671. You have not formulated in your mind how many?—No, I have not. I should think it would be advisable, in the first instance, to appoint only one, or at most two—not more.

45,672. I am not quite clear as to who forms the Committee of Control?—That committee consists of three masters, and was originally formed in consequence of one of the recommendations of Lord Coleridge's Committee.

45,673. (Chairman.) The Commission have received two representations from members of the Central Office; one is a representation from the first, second, and third class clerks in the Central Office, and another from the writers in the Scrivenery Department. Have you seen those representations?—I saw one some time ago. I have not seen the text of the representation from the Scrivenery Department, though I have heard of the purport of it. If you have any questions to ask me upon that, I would rather like to answer them after I have studied it, because I have not it before me.

45,674. We shall, no doubt, have before us representatives of the bodies who presented those statements, but we should like also to have your opinion on the representations. Perhaps you will kindly let us have a statement in writing dealing with them?—I shall be pleased to do that.

(Chairman.) That is all we have to trouble you with. We are much obliged to you for your evidence.

witness what particular part of the case his evidence had related to.

45,690. Would the greater part of the cases be not cases of that nature, but where it is a matter of taxing the whole of the costs?—Yes.

45,691. In cases of that kind does the taxation follow well recognised and known rules?—In a sense it follows rules, but there is an infinite variety in the questions that arise. As many varieties of questions arise in taxation as arise in the trial of actions in court.

45,692. How far is the operation of taxing a matter of applying rules (complicated rules, no doubt), and how far is it a matter of individual discretion in each particular case?—Very largely discretion. The judgment of the individual master governs nearly all of it. The routine, or what I may call the 6*s.* 8*d.* part of it, is very largely done by the clerks.

45,693. (Mr. Coward.) The summonses and orders?—Yes. On the Chancery side you find an affidavit, and if it is relevant, all the details of swearing it and attending the deponent, and so on, are details for the clerks. But when you come to higher and more difficult questions those have to go to the masters.

45,694. (Chairman.) What sort of question would that be—the amount of a fee paid to counsel?—The amount of fees paid both to solicitors and counsel, and very often the necessity of three counsel and expert witnesses.

45,695. (Mr. Coward.) And the number of the expert witnesses?—Yes, the number of expert witnesses, the materiality of their evidence, as to the part on which the plaintiff has not succeeded wholly, or the part of the case on which he has succeeded. The scientific witness gives us a very great deal of trouble.

45,696. (Chairman.) On all those points has the result of experience been to arrive at well-established and recognised principles?—It is very difficult to say. We endeavour to get unanimity and uniformity—that is an essential; but where 11 men are exercising discretion on ever-varying cases, it is impossible to say that there is one standard to which you can bring it.

45,697. When a solicitor presents his bill, can he tell with fair accuracy what items will be reduced and what will not?—He can form very little judgment until you have heard the case, particularly in contested cases. A very considerable part of our responsible work, that is, in the way of individual responsibility, is in regard to what are called Chancery Fund cases, where costs are payable out of a fund—either a fund in court or a trust estate. There it is only the vigilance of the taxing master and his staff that stands between over-charge and a proper charge.

45,698. In those cases the estate is not represented?—There are generally a good many solicitors in any large fund case, but they are in the same interest; they are not fighting each other; each is going to get his costs out of the fund, and very seldom do they attack each other. In party and party-contested cases you have an opponent who is actually fighting, but in the Chancery Fund cases there is very little contest, and that is where the taxing master and his staff must be particularly on the alert.

45,699. It is your responsibility to protect the interest of the fund in such cases?—Yes. Out of the total Chancery costs in 1914, amounting to 696,000*l.*, about 407,000*l.* were funds costs, where, practically, the taxing master is the only man who stands between the fund, or the beneficiaries who take the fund, and the professional men who are each of them wanting to get as much as they can—I do not mean to say improperly, but their estimate as to their value is not always ours.

45,700. Can you tell us the total amount of costs taxed in a year?—Since 1902 to 1914 I think we have taxed nearly 18,680,068*l.* That is a yearly average of 1,436,928*l.*, and the total amount taxed off in that period has been 3,837,437*l.*

45,701. That would be something like 20 per cent. taxed off?—Approximately that is it. In the figures for last year, which are not yet published, there is a considerable fall. The total costs taxed were 1,139,983*l.*, and 204,835*l.* were taxed off. We used to reckon the average volume of taxation for the year as about 1,500,000*l.*

45,702. Is the volume diminishing at present?—It is diminishing a little. It has fallen off 188,000*l.* in the last year.

45,703. Do you consider that is due to the effect of the war?—I attribute it myself almost wholly to the war. On the King's Bench side the fall is 111,000*l.* and 77,000*l.* on the Chancery side in the year. The Courts Emergency Powers Act has practically made it very little use a plaintiff suing if the defendant is to set up that the war has crippled his resources and he wants time. I look upon it that the Emergency Powers Act has very largely stopped King's Bench litigation, and to a certain extent Chancery work—for instance, foreclosure proceedings and so on. It is quite a phenomenal fall, and I can only attribute it to the war, and I imagine when the war is over litigation will be making up for lost time, and there will be a rush of it.

45,704. Given that there is this large amount of taxing work from the various divisions of the Supreme Court, how is that divided among the taxing masters?—Equally by ballot—rota as we call it—except as to two particular branches. The Commercial Court work until the transfer took place was done by one master, Sir John Macdonell, by arrangement, because it was thought better, and we continued that. I started it when it came to the Taxing Office, and kept it up for a year or so and then it went to another master, and he had it for a year or so, and now the present master who has taken it has had it for some years; he likes it and suitors are satisfied with his work and there is no particular object in disturbing it. I discussed it with Lord Mersey (Mr. Justice Bigham as he then was), and he thought it was a very good arrangement and thought it should be continued.

45,705. Does that system of distribution work satisfactorily to secure equality of burden?—Quite. Then the election petition work I take. At first we used to sit with two masters, but it was found there was not much advantage in that after we got into it, and I have been taking it on when election petition work arises.

45,706. That is comparatively seldom?—It is not often, but when it does come there is a great deal of trouble. I can illustrate what a master has to do there. The judges who try the election petitions will leave it to the taxing master as a rule to find out what issues or what cases of corrupt or illegal practices have been established by the petitioners and give him the costs of these and sometimes make him pay the respondents' costs of those on which he has failed. That means going through the whole of the evidence, and there is any amount of controversy, and it takes days very often; the charges are heavy and come to very large figures.

45,707. Is there a statutory qualification for the appointment of the taxing masters?—It is five years' practice as a barrister, or solicitor, or special pleader, or special pleader and barrister—practically it means a barrister or solicitor of five years' practice.

45,708. Of the present masters what proportion have the barrister qualification, and what proportion have the solicitor qualification?—There are one barrister and 10 solicitor masters.

45,709. Is the barrister master a recent appointment?—No, he has been there since 1902.

45,710. So that all recent appointments have been solicitors?—All recent appointments have been solicitors.

45,711. In whom is the appointment vested?—In practice now it is with the Lord Chancellor, but I am not quite familiar with the arrangement. Under the statute, I think, it has to be alternately; the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Lord Chancellor. We know in practice the Lord Chancellor appoints wholly to the Taxing Office now, and I believe he does not appoint on the King's Bench side.

45,712. In your opinion is the solicitor's experience more valuable than the barrister's experience for a taxing master?—Naturally, a solicitor is more familiar with costs, which he has been making his living by in all its detail; but I think the addition of one or two members of the Bar is useful; we get then an independent mind. In the old days, before the transfer in 1902, all the King's Bench costs, or practically all, were taxed by barristers. At the last stage I think there was only one King's Bench master who had been a solicitor.

45,713. Did Lord Alverstone's Commission make any recommendation on that point?—No; I do not think anything was said definitely on that point.

45,714. Do you consider that the present system of appointment works satisfactorily?—I think so.

45,715. Do you think the right men are appointed?—I think so, absolutely. I am not referring to myself, but speaking of those who have come in later. It occasionally happens that a master is ill or breaks down, and has to go away for two or three months, and a deputy is required. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie has almost invariably asked the senior master if he could find a practising solicitor who would be competent to do the work as well as a permanently appointed master; and it is not easy to find a man who will give up practice for a temporary appointment. But I think I may say that the recommendations I have made have always been adopted by Sir Kenneth; and the deputies, although they have no legal or moral claim to appointment, have almost invariably been appointed either Taxing Master or Chancery Master when a vacancy has occurred, and they have proved good men.

45,716. That gives an opportunity for a trial trip, so to speak, in judging whether a man is suitable for the work?—I do not mean that all good appointments are limited in that way. I think all the appointments have been good. I can say of my colleagues that they know their business, and are doing their work well.

45,717. The suggestion was made in evidence before us that it might be advantageous if a standing committee existed on which the department should be represented, and, possibly, the Civil Service Commissioners, to advise the Lord Chancellor as to the qualifications of candidates. The Lord Chancellor would make the appointments after considering the recommendations of that committee. Do you think that that would be an advantage?—I can hardly think it would. Unless the committee are brought closely in touch with these gentlemen in the solicitors' branch of the profession, their recommendations would be rather in the air. Practising solicitors know pretty well, and I take it the permanent secretary of the Lord Chancellor knows, who are the men who are doing good work and have got practices, and so on. Those are the men who come on as taxing masters.

Master WILLIAM FREDERICK BAKER.

45,718. You would say, generally, that you regard the present system as satisfactory, and do not think it necessary to modify it?—Certainly I do not think you can improve on it. It is practically analogous to the system on which judges are appointed; that is, the selection is made not by competition or examination, but from men who are known by their practice.

45,719. (Mr. Coward.) Not for political reasons?—No, I do not think any taxing master is appointed for political reasons.

45,720. (Chairman.) As regards the clerical staff of your office, of how many clerks does it at present consist?—23 clerks all told. One of those is the sitting master's clerk—the rota clerk he is called; he must be an entirely independent and trustworthy man. The first process in taxation is to take the order for taxation to the sitting master's clerk, and he then ballots it to a particular master. It is perfectly open to him, if he is open to influence, to select the name that the practitioner wants.

45,721. Have practitioners decided preferences?—Undoubtedly. I am afraid it is not limited to taxing masters; they used to have preference for judges, but that has been stopped.

45,722. (Mr. Boutwood.) Is it an actual ballot?—Yes, an actual ballot. There is a box; three ivories for each master with a master's name on each are put in on the right-hand side of the box (which is venerable by age), and the rota clerk, when an order is put before him, and it is stamped that it has not been previously referred—the solicitor has to certify that—to any particular master, opens the box on the right-hand side, takes out an ivory, and puts it in a slot on the left. In that process he can see perfectly well what name he is taking out, and if he wants to favour a practitioner, or is open to corrupt influences, he can do it.

45,723. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Could not that be got over by a slight mechanical ingenuity, and making a new box?—I think so, but when we got to that I think we should be hardly trusting any of our clerks.

45,724. (Mr. Holt.) Do you suggest that there is such a difference between the conduct of different taxing masters as to make it a matter of serious moment to the solicitor which taxing master he goes before?—I do not think so, but I am sure the profession think there are differences, and they would rather get before one master than another—I think it is without justification.

45,725. (Chairman.) Are the clerks also appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—By Sir Kenneth, yes, but always after consultation and communication. At present every clerk who comes in has to go to the senior master.

45,726. Are the candidates sent to you when they first ask to be admitted to the candidate's list?—That is so.

45,727. Is that a candidate who applies specially for admission to the Taxing Office?—Before they get on to the list of candidates I have to ascertain all the qualifications, and form my own judgment from the examination of a man whether he is really likely to be a capable man.

45,728. You, after seeing the man, express your opinion to the Lord Chancellor's secretary?—I take a note practically as if he were a witness being examined. I make my own notes, so that Sir Kenneth can see the details—who he is, where educated, what experience he has had, and what office he has been in. It is a thorough examination.

45,729. Are they candidates who are asking to be put on the special list for the Taxing Office?—That I am not quite sure about. I think so. That has not come before me. They are sent to me to be seen. I have to say whether the man is a fit man for the Taxing Office or not. Whether he ultimately comes to the Taxing Office because of that, I cannot say. Not infrequently, when a vacancy has occurred in a particular master's chambers and he knows of a good man, he will suggest his name to Sir Kenneth, and, if he appears to be up to our requirements, the master will practically have his choice in that way.

45,730. After nomination the candidate has to pass a qualifying examination?—I believe now he has.

45,731. Which is not of much value?—No.

45,732. Do you get the right kind of man by this system?—They are excellent. I can speak emphatically on that subject.

45,733. At what age are they generally appointed?—I think 26 is about the limit, but it can be exceeded—under 26 I should say.

45,734. The limits are 20 to 30, I think?—I believe so. Again, I am not the authority for that. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie regulates that. But, as a matter of fact, on my own knowledge of their ages they seem to average coming in at 26—some of them younger.

45,735. Are they generally gentlemen who have had experience in a solicitor's office?—Yes, that is essential—absolutely essential in my opinion.

45,736. In the case of recent appointments, have they invariably had that experience?—I do not remember one who has not. I am sure there is not one. My own junior clerk, who succeeded my second clerk, who was promoted to a principal clerk quite recently, is a public school boy, and he was admitted as a solicitor and practised as a solicitor, and then applied for appointment, and I wrote to Sir Kenneth. The man I had parted with very reluctantly, and who was promoted, was one of the best clerks I could possibly have, and I told Sir Kenneth that I wanted a good man, as a good deal of extra details and correspondence and statistics fall on the senior master, and Sir Kenneth said, "I think I have a man for you," and he sent me this man to consider, and I found his credentials were quite good. We have just been finishing the judicial statistics for 1914. That means that the returns of 11 masters have to be split up, analysed, and grouped for the judicial statistics, and an inaccuracy there would be very awkward. I notice he has done his work very well.

45,737. Among the appointments of the last 10 years have there been any men who have not had experience in a solicitor's office?—I cannot recall one. The clerk I spoke of just now, who has recently been promoted, gave up 180*l.* a year in a solicitor's office to come into the Taxing Office at 100*l.* on the chance of promotion.

45,738. And the certainty of a pension?—He was a most excellent man—one of the ablest clerks I ever had in practice. I should say that our staff is exceedingly good. Speaking now as a man who has been in practice as a solicitor, I should think there are very few solicitor's offices with as many clerks of as high a standard of ability and capacity.

45,739. Could an able man who came into the office without experience in a solicitor's office learn the work rapidly?—Not rapidly. It would take a long time, and I do not think he would ever really get the touch of it in the sense of a man who has actually practised and has had the daily work of a solicitor's office: going to chambers and all the routine work. It would be very difficult for a man to imagine all that because he sees the charges for it in a bill of costs.

45,740. As regards the promotion of clerks, the Lord Chancellor makes the promotions?—Yes.

45,741. Is there a committee of masters to recommend clerks for promotion?—No, not at all.

45,742. Is your opinion asked on questions of promotion?—Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie has been good enough to ask me, but there is a sort of rigid limit apparently at present. There are 11 principal clerks all doing the same work, and only four of them are first class clerks.

45,743. That is to say there is one principal clerk attached to each master?—Yes.

45,744. So that your nomenclature in the office does not correspond exactly to the classification in the establishment list?—No.

45,745. There are four first class clerks and nine second class clerks?—Eight second class clerks.

45,746. That makes 12 clerks, and there are 11 masters. Of those 12 clerks in the first and second classes, 11, I understand, are attached one to each master as principal clerk?—Yes.

19 February 1915.]

Master WILLIAM FREDERICK BAKER.

45,747. In the office you know them as "principal clerks"?—Yes.

45,748. What does the twelfth clerk do?—The twelfth is still a junior clerk. One of the masters now has two second class clerks. The reason, as I understand it, is that the standard number of second class clerks for the Taxing Office has been regarded as eight.

45,749. Then, in fact, your distribution, according to the work done, does not really correspond with the distribution in classes for the purposes of pay?—No, certainly not.

45,750. Your distribution divides them into principal clerks and assistant clerks?—Junior clerks, we call them.

45,751. Is there a clear and definite distinction between the work of a principal clerk and the work of a junior clerk?—The principal clerk takes the more important part of the clerks' work. The junior clerk, when the case is brought to him from the rota, sees first of all that the order does direct a taxation, and so on, and then he immediately sends notice to the parties concerned to lodge their bills. Then there are constantly notices reminding people that they have not lodged their bills, or that papers are wanted. There is a great deal of routine work of that kind which the junior clerk does. He keeps the taxing master's register, which records every case which comes to the individual master, so that subsequently, if another taxation arises in the case, it can be known at once what master it ought to go to. He also keeps the fee-book, which is split up for the judicial statistics into a number of separate heads, and requires care. Then he does the casting up of all the bills; that is three columns on each page—that is to say, the profit charges in one column, the disbursements in another, and the master's taxings-off on the left hand. That is carried to a summary, and in his work in that respect he is practically without control; it depends upon his accuracy. The solicitor's clerks have first of all cast it, but I am afraid arithmetic is not their strong point, and there are frequent mistakes; but the junior clerks are really most accurate. I constantly see corrections.

45,752. The junior clerk's work does not include any actual scrutiny of the items in the accounts?—At times he will do "vouching," as we call it; that is not merely seeing a receipt for money, but seeing that the papers are there of the proper length, and that they are not mere copying or padding. He has a great deal to do with that. When the principal clerk is very fully occupied, the junior clerk will take some of that work which is more particularly the principal clerk's work. Inquiries are going on all day long, and the junior clerks have a very disturbed life, and it is a wonder to me that they are so extremely accurate in their castings, with all the hubbub there is. The mistake of a single unit in the pounds column may easily lead to a difference of 100l.

45,753. The case then passes on to the principal clerk?—Yes. Taking my own chambers, my principal clerk (who is an old Cambridge man, and an admitted solicitor) has been there about 25 years, and for 15 years has been doing my principal clerk's work on second class pay, and he knows his work extremely well. I look at the orders when the bills are brought in, or very often before, and see the class of case. I see the bill, and I say that may go to my clerk. He will then give an appointment and see the parties, and have it fought out before him, if it is a small case. If they want to see me they come into my room. If they are satisfied with his taxation, he sends it to me and I look through it, and if I am also satisfied, it goes forward. Therefore he is taking a good deal of the taxing work. In addition to that he is going through long bills, some of which run into thousands of folios, and he checks all the papers—mountains of papers very often—to see that they are the proper length, and that there is no redundancy, and generally prunes them down. That is all subject to coming before the master afterwards, but he is very steadily employed all day long on that work. The overflow of it goes to the junior clerk. In that sense they both do the same work, and it is good preparation for the second class. I found my late junior clerk, who is now promoted, was so good that, to encourage him, I used to let him take some of the smaller taxations, subject to their coming to me, and he always did them very well. He is a man who is making notes of cases bearing on taxation of costs. Proper note-books most of the clerks have, I think. The oldest clerk in the office is the author of the standard book on taxation of costs.

45,754. When a case goes to the master, are the parties always summoned to appear?—Always. Nothing is done behind their backs.

45,755. No taxation is completed without the appearance of the parties?—I should add that if it is a fund where there is no controversy, very often one solicitor appears for all parties; his bill will first of all come before the master to see what it is about, and then the master will refer it to the principal clerk to vouch, that is, to go through the papers, see that they are required, and that they are not padded with unnecessary copying charges, drawing, and so on. These are apparently insignificant details, but they mount up in the course of a year and make a good deal of difference. The principal clerk will go all through that and bring it to the master, and if the master is satisfied it is all fair, it is very often sent back to the solicitor, and he is told to lodge it unless he wants to see the master, which he very often does not require. A great deal of that class of work—the non-contested work—where, as I said, the master is the only protection to the public, they do not come back to the master upon, they accept what you have done. If they want to appear you give an appointment and they come and discuss it.

45,756. But in contested work there is always a fight over items?—Always. Not only do we hear them but hear them a great deal too much, so many of them are very persistent.

45,757. (Mr. Coward.) May I suggest that the master might explain, if it is desirable, exactly what the point is about this. In a bill of costs in contentious work there are always a vast number of items which are scale charges, as we call them; but then you get to the items that are matters of discretion, more especially "Instructions for Brief"?—Quite so. I would not say "more especially 'Instructions for Brief,'" but I would say specially counsels' fees.

45,758. So far as counsels' fees are concerned, those are fees that the solicitor has paid, but which, as against the other side, he wants to get the taxing master to allow in order that he may recover them. But the one item in a solicitor's bill which is open to real criticism more than any other is the "Instructions for Brief," and in that item the solicitor gets a substantial sum for all his labour really throughout the case?—That is where the master's experience comes in.

45,759. (Chairman.) That is the principal point on which a master has to exercise his discretion?—No, I will not say that. It is the principal point as affecting the solicitor's own pocket. That item represents practically his fee for the work. I cannot define how you arrive at a conclusion; it is experience and touch when you have seen all the papers and heard endless discussions.

45,760. (Mr. Coward.) You certainly must have great experience to arrive at a conclusion?—You cannot do it without. I have allowed as much as 5,000 guineas in a case and the charge may only amount to 5l. in others, and very often the 5l. may be reduced.

45,761. Did you tax the costs in the Water Board case?—I did. They were very heavy costs, altogether about a quarter of a million, I think. The number of counsel and the amount of their fees is very often a very troublesome thing. The third counsel question, as we call it, very often goes to the judge on appeal.

45,762. (Chairman.) Going back to the question of promotion, promotion is made by the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Chancellor's secretary consults you as to the merits of the men?—Yes.

45,763. Is promotion by merit or by seniority?—Both. If the men's merits are equal, or fairly equal, the senior will get it, but we have passed over men.

45,764. Looking at the list of dates, it would appear that there has been one case in which a promotion was made out of the order of seniority?—Yes.

19 February 1915.]

Master WILLIAM FREDERICK BAKER.

45,765. There are possibly two, but, generally speaking, the order of seniority is followed?—Yes, if they are good enough to be promoted they get the promotion; but by no means do we take a man who is not qualified—partly in self-defence. We have the most limited number of clerks for the work we have to do, and to get an inefficient clerk is a very great tax on a master's time and powers.

45,766. Have you any suggestion to make on the subject of promotion or classification?—Not as regards classification. I do make the suggestion that I have made in the précis of my evidence, that any principal clerk who has served his 11 years as a second class clerk should be entitled to promotion to the first class.

45,767. That would mean a variable number of clerks in the first class?—Yes, I think most of these have served their time and would be entitled to promotion. I am quite unable to explain to myself why some of our principal clerks are in the first class and seven of them remain second class clerks, where they are doing precisely the work that the others do; and also analogous work to what is done by first class clerks, say, in Chancery chambers.

45,768. (Mr. Boutwood.) Are the seven quite contented with their position?—No, anything but contented. Take my own senior man as an illustration: He has been doing excellent work for 15 years as principal clerk, and he is still a second class clerk.

45,769. (Mr. Holt.) What you are really suggesting is that the three classes should be reduced to two?—There are not three classes as regards work; two classes only. You are speaking of those not yet promoted to the first class.

45,770. You have first, second, and third class clerks?—What I mean is, that a principal clerk who is in the second class, and has served his 11 years, should then be entitled to be made a first class clerk; and, similarly, the third class clerk, when he has served his 11 years, should be promoted to the second class. They are doing highly responsible work, all of them.

45,771. (Chairman.) That incompatibility, as I may call it, between the organisation of your office and the classification in three classes arises from the system of attaching a clerk to each master?—Yes.

45,772. Is that a necessary system?—We cannot do without it. You cannot possibly have a combination of second class clerks doing masters' work indiscriminately; there would be such inevitable confusion.

45,773. Would it be impracticable to have the first class clerks dealing with the more important cases—the larger cases—irrespective of what master was going to complete the taxation, and the second class clerks dealing with the less important cases?—I think so. It must be left with the master to deal with the cases on their individual importance and merits as they come in. We are constantly having to communicate with our clerks, not merely about routine work, but about papers. "What is this witness? What about those 'fees'? What about this, that, and the other?" To have to go to some general office to find out those details would be perfectly impracticable.

45,774. You think the only practicable system is to have a clerk attached to each master?—Undoubtedly; and two clerks is the minimum, in my opinion. I took a little trouble to ascertain from the outside what the opinion of one very well-known member of the profession was. I am not at liberty to mention his name, but he writes contrasting the present system on the King's Bench side: "Now the system of vouching is extraordinarily complete." That is an outside testimony to what our clerks are doing.

45,775. I gather from what you have said that there is some complaint about the slowness of promotion?—There is a very considerable feeling about it.

45,776. There is no possible promotion for a first class clerk beyond the first class?—No; I do not think so.

45,777. Do you think it would be advisable to make a first class clerk eligible for appointment to a mastership, assuming him to be fit?—I do not think so. They have had experience in a solicitor's office, but not a position of responsibility in the conduct of litigation. They know the routine and the details, and, if they have brains, they have picked up a good deal, but that is a very different matter from conducting litigation.

45,778. Do they not learn very well in their work in the office the principles and practice of taxation?—They learn the work, of course, but I do not think they get that touch which you require as to how cases are actually carried on in the face of the enemy, so to speak—the other side—or the bearing of evidence. None of them take evidence. There is another class of case, namely, taxation under the Solicitors Acts, which very often involves questions of conduct; and, except in two district registries—Liverpool and Manchester—I think no district registries take taxation under the Solicitors Acts. To tell the profession that their taxations, which are very bitter and very hostile between their late clients and themselves, are to be conducted by an ex-clerk in the Taxing Office, I think, would lead to very strong opposition. Good men as they are in their particular departments, I do not think they have the experience which active practice has given to masters who have been solicitors or barristers.

45,779. (Mr. Coward.) It is not their rôle?—No.

45,780. (Chairman.) At present there is no age limit for retirement?—No.

45,781. What is your opinion as regards fixing an age limit? Dealing first with the case of the masters themselves, do you think any age limit would be desirable?—I do not think so. I am 71 to-morrow, and I do not intend to stay on much longer, but I do not think I am incompetent for my work, and if I became incompetent a hint from headquarters would end it. The Lord Chancellor has practically the power of removal.

45,782. But that power, I suppose, would only be exercised in an extreme case?—Yes; but I do not recall any case of a master who has really stayed on when he ought to have gone.

45,783. You do not recall any such case in the past?—No I do not. Some of the older men are some of the best men we have. I remember a man, whom we all hold in great reverence, Mr. Ryland, who died in 1901, one of the ablest men we ever had. When he was appointed some sort of limit was suggested, and that at 70 he should retire if called upon. When he became 70 he wrote to remind Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie that he was under that condition, and Sir Kenneth wrote back to say that the suggestion that Mr. Ryland should retire horrified him, and so it did all of us. He was of the greatest assistance. The judges had spoken of him in the same terms. I remember the Court of Appeal saying: "Mr. Ryland knows more about costs than any of us," and to have compelled him to retire when he got to 70 would have been a great misfortune to the Taxing Office.

45,784. Recommendations have been made by some of the numerous commissions and committees that have sat on different legal offices that officers of the class of master should retire at 70, with power to the authority—the Lord Chancellor in this case—to prolong the service for five years if thought desirable. Do you think that would be a desirable system to apply?—I do not think it is any improvement on the present system. The same difficulty the Lord Chancellor might feel would arise whether he should say to a man who has become inefficient: "I think you ought to retire," or say to him: "I think you are competent enough to go on,"—it is very much the same.

45,785. Still in that case the burden of proof is put in the other direction?—That may be so, I do not think myself there is any particular object in an age limit.

45,786. What would you say as regards the clerks? In their case do you consider an age limit desirable?—No, I do not. The oldest clerk on the list is probably the best in the office at this moment.

45,787. Would not an age limit do something to remedy the dissatisfaction as regards the rate of promotion?—No. The remedy wanted is that the hard and fast rule of only eight second class clerks should be done away with.

45,788. But assuming the present scales of salary and the number of each class were not modified, retirement at a fixed age would do something to accelerate promotion?—No doubt, if left as it is. I am bound to say that it is quite an illogical arrangement at present, and it rests on no principle that I can discover, except economy.

45,789. As regards leave and vacations, is the office open during vacations?—Upon every day of the year except when the offices are closed by order, and all through the vacations. Under the rules one master and of course his two clerks remain on duty every day throughout the vacation.

45,790. Then, except for that one master and his two clerks, do the rest of the masters and the office get the full benefit of the Long Vacation?—We all get the vacation. In the shorter vacations—Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas—the clerks do not get quite the same number of days as the masters do, under the rules.

45,791. There is work to be done by the clerks apart from the presence of the masters?—The masters take the same vacations as the courts take. We have nothing to do when the courts are not sitting or practically nothing. Our work comes from the judges; if there are no cases tried we have nothing to do.

45,792. Is the work entirely up to date?—Absolutely.

45,793. No bills waiting?—There may be bills that have come in in the last few days. The difficulty is to get the bills in. Every morning I have letters put before me asking for time. I do not think any London solicitor will say that there is delay at all now in the Taxing Office, and if he did I am quite sure he would be mistaken.

45,794. (Mr. Coward.) He would not know his business?—No.

45,795. (Chairman.) What are the hours of attendance when the office is open?—10 to 4. The solicitors do not care to come much before 11, but there is always routine work to be done before. Personally, I give appointments on from 11 o'clock.

45,796. I gather from what you have told us that for the clerks there is a good deal of work to be done, irrespective of the attendance of solicitors?—A good deal. It is only fair to them to say that our clerks take work home constantly.

45,797. Are they ever required to attend more than the six hours?—They very often do; I should not like to say that we require them to attend, because it is not necessary. They are always at our disposal, and a master very often sits beyond 4 to finish a case. I repeatedly do so, partly to meet the convenience of suitors, and also for my own convenience, because if you adjourn a case which is intricate, and have to pick it up again a week or so later, you have to go over a good deal of the same ground in your own mind.

45,798. Have you an attendance book for the clerks?—Yes; they all sign it.

45,799. Is that reviewed by the senior master?—It is brought to the sitting master every morning.

45,800. You told us that certain of the divisions of the Supreme Court are outside the work of the Taxing Office?—Yes.

45,801. Would you be in favour of further consolidating the work by bringing any of those departments into the Taxing Office as respects taxing their costs?—I state my personal opinion here. There is a difference of opinion. We are all of opinion, and always have been of opinion, that lunacy taxation should be transferred; but we are in the proportion of eight to three as to whether the transfer of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty and Bankruptcy, is desirable.

45,802. That is to say, in the case of those divisions, eight are against it and three are in favour of it?—Yes. I was on the Taxation of Costs Committee in 1901, and I suppose I have to a certain extent recanted. Then the experiment had not been tried. I thought then it was policy. The Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, for reasons which I suppose I have nothing to do with, was not even proposed to be transferred then. It was thought by those familiar with that division that the taxation had better remain where it was. Bankruptcy has also remained suspended. I have had 13 years' experience of the work, and there is such an infinite variety in what we already have that I do not think there would be any improvement in introducing such very varying procedure as Bankruptcy and Admiralty particularly, and splitting it up amongst 14 different masters and their staff. I mentioned Admiralty particularly, because very few of us, of course, have had experience of Admiralty work, and there is one branch of it—I inquired into it pretty closely at the time when the Taxation of Costs Committee was sitting in 1901—the detention of witnesses in Admiralty cases, that is standardised there. They are, most of them, nautical witnesses, masters, officers and crew, very often detained for months; and to have 14 different minds adjudicating upon what the master was to have in this case and the master in that case I do not think would be any advantage. It is now dealt with by one mind which has had a large experience in it. True, if it is transferred, an individual taxing master might take it and become as efficient, but I say with diffidence, and I ought not to say otherwise, I have no doubt it is done efficiently now, and I very much doubt whether it would be equally efficiently done; in fact, it is almost difficult to believe that it could be as efficiently done if 14 men were doing it.

45,803. (Mr. Coward.) You would not have uniformity?—Nothing like uniformity.

45,804. (Chairman.) Is there also a difficulty in making a transfer of those two branches of work, arising out of the fact that the work is conducted in different buildings?—I think so. We often have to see a Chancery master to get his opinion. Less frequently we see a King's Bench master in a case with which he has had to do, and it is very convenient. The registrars at Somerset House would be rather more inaccessible. It is true one of them attends at the Royal Courts of Justice every day, but he may not be the man you want to see; it may not be his case.

45,805. And also there would be a question of transporting papers backwards and forwards?—I express the opinion with very much hesitation, as two or three of my colleagues differ, and think it is quite practicable.

45,806. In the case of bankruptcy work the question of a separate building applies also?—I think there is a still stronger objection there. It has become more and more minute; every little detail has to be sanctioned in due course by a committee of inspection, and it is requisite for the taxing master to keep one eye on the file of proceedings and the other on the bill of costs; he is also dealing with auctioneers' and brokers' charges and a variety of small things which one man gets experience in and does very well; but again, if you divide it up amongst 14 men I do not think you will get the same efficiency. I believe the bankruptcy taxing work is done excellently, and I cannot imagine why you should change a system, which is working undoubtedly well, to make an experiment. I acknowledge I have altered my opinion, but speaking with my experience of 13 years I think we have quite enough to do.

45,807. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Have any of the taxing masters been solicitors in any other part of the United Kingdom except London?—No, none. They have all been London men.

45,808. And I suppose all the clerks are London men?—Yes, all London men. Practically all the litigation takes place in London.

45,809. But there are solicitors practising in the provinces?—Yes. Of course, there is a good deal of work done at assizes, but almost all our work comes from cases tried in London.

45,810. And where the solicitors are London solicitors?—Yes, not necessarily, but sometimes London agents for country solicitors.

45,811. In other Government offices there is a great deal of mere mechanical routine work done by typists, assistant clerks, and people of that kind who are not going to work their way up into the higher branches of the work. Is there anything of that kind with you?—Nothing.

45,812. Your work, however routine or mechanical, is done by men who are on the rota to go up to the very top?—Very little of it is mechanical. We have very little of that except correspondence and formal notices.

45,813. I mean the work of registering and filing?—We have not any filing.

19 February 1915.]

Master WILLIAM FREDERICK BAKER.

45,814. I am using the word filing in the business sense of keeping documents?—They are kept in the Taxing Office, but there is very little routine work. Almost all the work requires a man to have some brains.

45,815. From the moment a third class clerk comes in, is he exercising an important discretion?—The junior clerk is to a considerable extent. I am somewhat oppressed with the feeling that a junior clerk, if he goes wrong, or if he is careless, may make mistakes which may undo all that the taxing master has done. I do not speak without reason for that, but from actual practical experience in my own chambers long ago. I used to see the bills, and I found that the clerk never corrected a figure; the solicitor's figures were always assumed to be correct. I knew that was practically impossible. I then had a selection of the bills cast by another clerk carefully, and found hardly one was correctly cast, in some cases against the solicitor, in others in his favour. When you are dealing with large figures—and they may run into thousands of pounds—a mistake in the thousands column, in a Paymaster-General's matter, would be rather serious. That all depends on the accuracy and good faith of the clerk. I should add that in that particular case the clerk had to go. May I add that it was not through dishonesty or anything of that sort, but he did not do his work properly.

45,816. Do you think you would get a better man if you took him in at 200*l.* to work up to 500*l.*, than if you took him in at 100*l.* and let him work up to 600*l.*?—No, I do not think so. The certainty of it, and the pension, is certainly attractive. My late junior clerk, as I mentioned, gave up 180*l.* a year in a solicitor's office to come in at 100*l.*, because there was the certainty, and, as he thought at the time, a pretty standard rate of promotion.

45,817. You think the initial salary, even when there is such a difference as between 100*l.* and 200*l.*, makes little difference to them?—I do not think there is much object in changing it. The 100*l.* a year attracts good men. I do not know why you should do more.

45,818. (Mr. Holt.) Do I understand you to say that provincial solicitors are not fit to become taxing masters?—I should not like to say that at all, but none have ever been appointed. I believe we had one for a very short time, but he found the work, I will not say beyond him, but too burdensome for him, and he resigned. That was before my time, but I know it to be the fact. I do not want it to go forth that I think no provincial solicitor is fit to tax costs, but except in Liverpool and Manchester practically none of them do. In Liverpool and Manchester they tax about 55,000*l.* a year between the two registries. The whole of the district registrars throughout England only tax about 86,000*l.* as against each individual master in London taxing about 130,000*l.*

45,819. But these costs taxed in London are very often costs incurred by provincial solicitors. The litigation which takes place in London is frequently entirely conducted by provincial solicitors; the London agent is a mere manager who arranges it?—A great deal of the litigation is done in London, fighting things out in Chancery and King's Bench Chambers, and so on. The country solicitor has nothing to do with it; the London agent does it.

45,820. But in a great deal of the litigation he has just as much to do?—I do not say at all that a country solicitor cannot become an efficient taxing master; he may for all I know, but he has not the experience in the London law offices which a London solicitor alone gets.

45,821. You were telling us about your very excellent principal clerk and the work he did for you. Do you say that that principal clerk or a principal clerk of equal ability would not be capable of becoming a taxing master?—I must say so. He came in as a young man when he had not had any experience of active practice or the responsibility of practice.

45,822. But would not 20 years' experience of taxing, which I suppose he probably has had now, be a sufficient education in the art of taxing?—In those 20 years he has not been dealing with the questions the master is dealing with—testing the questions of issues which I referred to, or holding the scales between the solicitor and his late client; they are very responsible cases.

45,823. I thought I understood you to say earlier that this clerk, in fact in some cases, did actually do the taxing?—Under me. I select the small case which goes to him. Nothing goes to him which has not been first to me, but I should never think of handing over to him a large and heavy party and party case, still less any taxation under the Solicitors Acts.

45,824. You look at the case, it seems simple and small, and you say to the clerk "Will you please do that for me"?—Yes.

45,825. And that is very often quite satisfactorily done?—Yes.

45,826. Are costs taxed in every case?—In every party and party case, or almost all contested cases. Sometimes, but very rarely, the parties are able to agree, but that is hardly worth mentioning.

45,827. But if the parties were reasonably sensible might not they agree about the whole lot?—They might no doubt, but they do not; they fight about the smallest things.

45,828. But is it more temper than actual difficulties?—No, there are very large questions which arise.

45,829. (Chairman.) What exactly is the taxation under the Solicitors Acts?—If a client wishes to have his solicitor's bill taxed he presents a petition, and upon that an order is made that it is to be referred to the taxing master to tax, and take the cash account between the solicitor and his client to see what money he has received. That is where a solicitor and his client have quarrelled and a new man has been brought on the scene. They are always most controversial, with bitter opposition, and I must say that very often there are charges almost amounting to unprofessional conduct and that sort of thing, saying "he ought not to have done this, but he did it to make costs" and so on—a very disagreeable class of case, and often involving evidence. I can recall one case now where I think the bill of costs came to about 18,000*l.*, and somewhere about 8,000*l.* of that was taxed off—I take that at random. Then there are very troublesome questions on cash accounts.

45,830. Have you any system or method for securing uniformity in the work between the different masters?—Yes. There is a very great deal of personal intercommunication. We have also an advisory committee which any master can summon at any time when he wants us to consider something. Four or five of us constitute the committee.

45,831. Four or five selected amongst yourselves?—Yes, a sort of monthly rota. Then we have a meeting of all the masters at least once in every sittings, and everything is there debated. Any master may bring up any question he likes at that meeting, and it is an unwritten regulation amongst us that he will and must report any cases of appeal from his decision which have gone before the judges, so that we may know what the judge has said, and so on. It is a very excellent method of keeping men up to the mark, as of course they do not like to be criticised by their colleagues.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 24th February 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK.
 Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
 Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
 Mr. CECIL COWARD.
 Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
 Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.
 Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS, Writers, Scrivenery Department, Royal Courts of Justice, called and examined.

45,832. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Stewart.) You two gentlemen appear on behalf of the writers in the Scrivenery Department of the Royal Courts of Justice?—Yes.

45,833. How many writers are there in the department?—(Mr. Apps.) About 50, I think.

45,834. And the main point of your representation is that the writers desire to be made pensionable?—Yes.

45,835. (To Mr. Stewart.) Do you wish to say anything in the first place about the history of the question? I understand that from the year 1871, after the passing of the Courts of Justice Salaries and Funds Act, 1869, the officers of the Courts of Justice generally were paid out of the Estimates instead of out of the Fee Fund of the Courts?—That is quite correct.

45,836. Do you claim that anything should have been done then to establish your claim to pension?—We consider ourselves a permanent body.

45,837. But do you base your claim in any way on anything that was done or not done at that time?—In 1871 the whole of the officials of the department and ourselves were all served with notices from the Civil Service Commissioners to go up for examination. The time, the subjects, and everything else were on the form; but on the representation of the senior master we were declared to be exempt from examination, and a letter came from either the Civil Service Commissioners or the Treasury saying that our certificates could be got if the head of the department would get them for us; but the head of the department declined to get them for us, so that we never got them. I have asked successive masters, but they would never get them for us.

45,838. Did the other officers of the department get certificates at that time?—They were appointed by the Lord Chancellor by order of the Court, and they declined to go up for examination.

45,839. They did not get certificates?—I suppose they got them; but they declined to go in for examination because they had been appointed by the Lord Chancellor by order of the Court, and considered themselves that they were not bound to go in for examination.

45,840. I think the fact is that they did not receive certificates?—Anyhow, they went under the old rules, and their pension was assured.

45,841. So that their pension did not depend upon their obtaining certificates?—I think not.

45,842. Similarly, the question of your pensionability is not dependent upon whether you obtained a certificate or not?—They were assured their pension. If we got our certificates that would have assured ours. I do not know whether they received certificates, or would accept certificates, because they were all provided for under the old rules by the Lord Chancellor and Orders of Court.

45,843. You are not aware whether, as a matter of fact, they did receive certificates or not?—I could not say that. I am not certain. Mr. Stringer will be before you, and he will tell you that.

45,844. In any case, you did not receive certificates?—Because the letter from the Treasury or the Civil Service Commissioners specially said that the heads of the departments must get those certificates for us. I personally went to the head of my department and asked for my certificate, and he refused. I was ordered out of the room, you might say.

45,845. So that it was not a case of the matter not having been brought before the heads of the department?—No, it was not.

45,846. But the heads of the department did not think it desirable to apply?—Well, they would not do so; they were rather antagonistic in those days.

45,847. May it not be presumed that the reason why they did not apply was because they thought or knew that certificates would not be given?—No; I saw the letter myself in which it was stated that the certificates would be given, if the heads of the department applied for them.

45,848. As regards the question of pensionability, that is regulated by the Superannuation Act of 1859?—I should certainly think so.

45,849. Under that Act, would writers in your position be admissible for a pension, apart from the question of the Civil Service certificate?—I do not think so. I think not. (Mr. Apps.) No; the Treasury say that they have no power to grant pension rights to writers under the Superannuation Act of 1859.

45,850. So that quite apart from the question of a Civil Service certificate, as the law stands at present, and as it is interpreted by the Treasury, your claim to pension would not have been admissible?—At present.

45,851. So that the question of Civil Service certificates was not really the determining factor in the case?—No.

45,852. The determining factor is the terms of the Act of 1859?—Exactly.

45,853. When was the Scrivenery Department constituted as it at present exists?—(Mr. Stewart.) In 1884.

45,854. A committee sat upon the Scrivenery Department, I think, in 1891?—(Mr. Apps.) That was about the time. (Mr. Stewart.) It was 1891 when the Scrivenery Board was formed, and they brought in all the work from outside stationers into our department.

45,855. What was the nature of the Scrivenery Department before the changes that were made by the committee in 1891?—We did all the work in the building, but the other work, such as registrars' work and lunacy work, and all those different things, was sent out to stationers. We were a Chancery Department doing affidavits and all that kind of thing. I have served 49 years myself, and when I first commenced there was an old gentleman who had served 50 years, so it was a very old-established department. But these others were brought into our original department.

45,856. Then the changes made in 1891 resulted in an enlargement of the Scrivenery Department?—Yes.

45,857. And the performance there of work which had before been done by law stationers?—Yes. (Mr. Apps.) The idea of the Scrivenery Department was to do away with the middle men, the law stationers. (Mr. Stewart.) To do away with sweating. The stationer received so much, and he gave his men so much less, and the idea was to form the Scrivenery Board, so that the middle man should not be able to make a large profit out of the men who did the work.

45,858. So that the object was to improve the position of the men doing the actual work?—Yes.

45,859. And the result has been to improve their position?—Yes, it has most decidedly improved the position of those that came in afterwards.

45,860. What does your work consist of?—(Mr. Apps.) The work is very varied. It consists of copying, abstracting, examining, making office copies for the general public, copying judges' notes, making cases for the Court of Criminal Appeal, etc.

45,861. That is all copying work of different kinds?—No; it is very difficult to explain. In the case of drafting Chancery Orders that is anything but copying. A man who has to do that will have perhaps half a dozen documents, and of course the length of time it would take him would depend entirely on the length of the documents, and to say that it is plain copying is not right; it is anything but plain copying. I personally have never done that work, but no man, unless he had had some experience in a law stationer's office, could do it; it would take him some considerable time to learn it; from the roughness of some drafts which I have seen myself, he would certainly require some legal knowledge.

45,862. (Mr. Coward.) Do you mind explaining what that means. I personally do not understand it at all?—(Mr. Stewart.) It means that the man must be either brought into our office very young—

45,863. No, would you mind telling me what the work is?—(Mr. Apps.) There are the Orders of the Chancery Division that are drafted by the registrar of the Court, and of course that is a very rough draft; in fact, drafts have to be made of drafts before any engrossment takes place.

45,864. But do you mean to say that the registrar would say, for instance, "Copy such and such a thing," and he would put it quite shortly in draft, "Copy so and so;" he refers you to a document and asks you to make a copy of such and such paragraphs?—Yes, and in cases where the phraseology is common they do not even do that, they say, "Usual order," and a man first coming in to copy a thing like that, where they put "Usual order," would have no idea at all what it meant. A man must have some legal knowledge, some training before he can do it; it would be utterly impossible for him otherwise to do it; that is in the first draft.

45,865. It is a thousand pities that you do not show us an example; I am sure my brother Commissioners cannot understand any more than I can why there should be a difficulty about it?—(Mr. Stewart.) There is great difficulty; it means that a man should either have served seven years in a law stationer's office, or should be brought up almost from youth in the office for years before he can properly do some of the work in our department. (Mr. Apps.) You may not be aware that there are legal abbreviations which no one could possibly know but those who have had some experience.

45,866. Do you mind telling us what? I personally am asking you what, so that I may appreciate what you mean?—I have here a draft of one case before me now; may I show this to you?

(The Witness explained the same to the Commissioner.)

45,867. It is as I expected; a draft would come down with notes upon it—"Copy so and so," or "Rider A," "Rider B," "Rider C," whatever it is, with a reference to the document from which the rider is to be taken; then you copy it in?—Exactly; but what I want to say is that the difficulty is that there are so many documents and they are so abbreviated and mostly written in pencil, that if I myself were to go and do the thing now (which I do not do) it would be like Greek to me. I am not saying that it requires any great intelligence, because, when once the first copy is made, they make the other copies from their own; but to do it for the first time is certainly not plain copying.

45,868. Nobody suggests that; but is it not work that anybody can learn to do in half an hour?—I do not think so. (Mr. Stewart.) You want years to learn to do it properly.

45,869. (Chairman.) Does it come to this, that the documents from which you have to copy drafts are in some cases made up of different portions of extracts from common forms and from documents?—And from books.

45,870. And that they are written often with the usual legal abbreviation of words?—Yes.

45,871. Does it come to more than that?—It certainly does. (Mr. Apps.) For instance, I forget the exact form, but there is a certain form which the registrar in making out a draft order would never think of inserting, because he thinks the writer would know it as a matter of course; that frequently happens. He would never think of saying "Complete draft" of the particular clause he wished inserted; he would simply say "Usual," and a new man taking it up would have no more idea than the man in the moon what "usual" meant; but a man who has had experience knows perfectly well exactly what the order is he has to insert. It is quite a skeleton.

45,872. In other words common forms are used in draft without necessarily writing them out in full?—In the first place, yes.

45,873. What is the rate of pay?— $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ a folio less $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; it works out at $11s. 7d.$ per 100 folios.

45,874. $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ per folio of 90 words? (Mr. Stewart.)—No, 72 words, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is deducted from that to pay for our superintendence.

45,875. That is to say, you get $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ per folio of 72 words less $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.?—Yes.

45,876. How does that compare with the payment in the outside trade?—They receive the same, but not less $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; they receive the $1\frac{1}{2}d.$

45,877. Who receives the $1\frac{1}{2}d.$?—The law stationer.

45,878. What did he pay the writer?—I think he paid him $1\frac{1}{2}d.$

45,879. Did he pay as much as $1\frac{1}{2}d.$?—Yes, I think so, when he engrossed.

45,880. Was not $1d.$ the usual payment?—(Mr. Apps.) It is rather before my time, but I think you are right; I think $1d.$ was the general rate.

45,881. (Sir John Kempe.) Is the rough draft that you are describing included in the one payment? Have you to make the rough draft and then make a copy after that, and are you paid only upon the copying?—(Mr. Stewart.) No, we are paid for each copy.

45,882. (Chairman.) What is the result on the average earnings of writers?—(Mr. Apps.) My friend says $160l. 10s.$ at present, but the average in 1910, when we petitioned the Lord Chancellor, was $171l.$; so, apparently, my friend is right; it is less now than it was then.

45,883. I see that the figure of $161l. 10s.$ was given in an answer in the House of Commons in 1912 as the average earnings of writers in the last 10 years?—(Mr. Stewart.) That is what it is at the present time.

45,884. Have you any later figure than that?—(Mr. Apps.) No, I have not.

45,885. That is the average. Is there much variation between individuals? Do some earn much more and some much less?—(Mr. Stewart.) Yes, according to capacity.

45,886. What is about the greatest amount earned?—About 200l.

45,887. Is that the maximum?—That is near there-to. (Mr. Apps.) I do not know the exact amount, but it would not be very much over that, 210l. perhaps. (Mr. Stewart.) That is only in the case of two or three.

45,888. What length of hours does that represent?—Sometimes as much as 16 hours a day.

45,889. Is there any limit to the amount of time you may work?—No.

45,890. Is there any limit to the amount of money you may earn in the year?—No, it is according to capacity and according as the work comes in; sometimes, of course, it is slack and sometimes busy. In a busy time, such as the month of July, when we have to work at hard pressure, we do 14 and 16 hours a day; I do myself.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS.

45,891. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Do you take work home?—I am working at home every night until 10 or 11 in the busy time; from 8 o'clock in the morning. I have special work wanted in the morning at 11, and I get there as soon as I can after 8; then I have my lunch time, then I go home and have my tea and work sometimes until 11 at night, night after night, to earn that money.

45,892. (Chairman.) That is in your own option?—Well, if I did not do it I should earn next to nothing. (Mr. Apps.) That is the point I want to make quite clear before the Commission. If you were under the impression that in 1910 the average rate of 170*l.* or even 160*l.* was earned between 10 and 4 o'clock, perhaps there would not be any complaint, but when you are taking it that on an average a writer has to work 12 hours a day frequently, including Sunday, you will see that they are working outside the hours between 10 and 4, and you can judge somewhere about what a writer would earn.

45,893. Have you any figures as to the actual hours worked?—(Mr. Stewart.) No, we could only tell by the quantity we do. That is not every night, of course, all the year round; I am only talking of the ordinary busy time.

(Mr. Apps.) But I may say that within my own knowledge, taking my own case, I personally work frequently up to 10 and 11 o'clock at night; I am obliged to do it, and frequently on Sundays, because it is simply unavoidable.

45,894. What we should like to get would be the actual average of hours worked during the year. Is there any record of the actual hours you work?—You see, in the vacation, the average would be brought down greatly, because during the vacation, of course, the work is considerably less and the hours very much shorter.

45,895. (Bishop of Southwark.) What would you earn supposing you only worked from 10 till 4?—It would be very difficult to say. I do not suppose it would be more than 100*l.* I do not know it would be that even.

45,896. (Chairman.) How many folios do you reckon you can do in an hour?—(Mr. Stewart.) It is all according to the work. As Mr. Apps says, the work is very different, and you can do half as much again of some work as of other. I myself do the notes for the judge from the master—all cut to pieces; but we are so used to them by years of service that we can make them into proper copies.

45,897. (Mr. Coward.) Could you do 15 folios an hour?—No, it must be a very fast writer to do that. You might do it for one hour, but to keep it on hour after hour you must be a very fast writer, and you would have considerable work to do it. (Mr. Apps.) As a writer becomes older the less able he is to do it, of course; that is quite clear.

45,898. (Chairman.) What do you reckon would be a fair average rate of work?—(Mr. Stewart.) I should say eight hours a day.

45,899. I do not mean the number of hours, but the number of folios in an hour?—That is almost impossible to tell.

45,900. (Mr. Coward.) No, it is not, really?—Yes, it is. If you had plain copying you could tell.

45,901. How much do you say of plain copying?—Very little of our work is plain copying.

45,902. You will not answer the question?—I should say that an ordinary man could do 12 folios an hour to keep it up. (Mr. Apps.) That would be a fair average. (Mr. Stewart.) Some could do more and some less; some of our writers earn more, and others earn less.

45,903. It is not engrossing that you do?—We can do engrossing.

45,904. I do not say that you cannot, but the kind of writing that you are speaking of is not engrossing?—But some of our writers have to engross on parchment and do all manner of work, plans, and everything that comes into our department. We have several of our writers who do the plans, and, of course, they earn a little more than others, and then they have the writing to fill up their time. (Mr. Apps.) But you must understand that it is not the hard work that we complain of; we never have complained of that, although it is hard work; but our position is that so long as we remain on this piecework system—payment by results is what the Treasury like to call it—we have no rights at all. Inasmuch as we are on piecework the Treasury say we are temporary men, in spite of the fact that we have men with over 40 years' service in the department.

45,905. (Chairman.) We will come to that point presently. I think you will see the bearing presently of what we are asking. The Commission are anxious to arrive, in the first place, at the conditions under which you earn the amount that you do earn, and what the amount that you earn is; you say that you are unable to tell us the average number of hours that you work a day?—I do not suppose I should be far wrong if I said 12 hours a day.

45,906. (Miss Haldane.) Does that mean inclusive of vacations?—(Mr. Stewart.) No, exclusive; in vacation we do not do three or four hours' work a day, we cannot do it; the work goes off. We have to work very hard indeed in the busy time to provide for the vacations.

45,907. (Chairman.) So that the vacations would considerably reduce the average?—Yes. (Mr. Apps.) That would, of course, be so.

45,908. So that the position as you represent it is that in term-time you work hard and long hours, and in vacation you work shorter hours because there is not work to do?—Exactly, but having no work in the vacation, of course, affects our income. We get the rest, but it is rest we do not desire under those circumstances at all.

45,909. What is your position at present under the Superannuation Act? You get a gratuity, I think, on retirement?—From the Compassionate Fund.

45,910. That is under the Superannuation Act, 1887?—That is the only thing we have in the world. (Mr. Apps.) And that even is not right. That is only, I believe, as an act of grace. I have not any right to claim a penny after 40 years' service, as a matter of fact.

45,911. But as a matter of fact you do get one week's pay for every year of service?—(Mr. Stewart.) If you make application yourself for it, but if you are stricken down and cannot write or make application you get nothing.

45,912. Are you sure that that is the case?—I am positive.

45,913. Have you ever known a case of that?—Yes, I have. One of our writers came up to business one morning—he was a very old man—and was knocked down by a hansom cab and seriously injured; he was so bad that he could not write to claim, and he got nothing whatever.

45,914. In that case did the man die immediately?—He died afterwards—he did not survive very long; but he was not capable of making an application personally, and there was nothing got.

45,915. The point in that case was that no grant was made to his dependents?—No, it is not supposed to be for dependents; it must be for the man himself.

45,916. Are you aware that an Act was recently passed in 1914 modifying that?—No, I did not know that.

45,917. And allowing a grant of a week's pay for every year of service to be made to his dependents in case of the death of an employee?—No, I was not aware of that. And another thing is, that the allowance from the Compassionate Fund is based on the last three years of a man's earnings, and in the last three years he might not earn half as much as he did before, yet he only gets allowed one week's pay on the average of the last three years. There was one officer, a little while ago who, in the last three years of his life, earned 60*l.* less than before, but still the compassionate allowance was only based on that.

45,918. He gets one week's pay for each year of service, that being based on an average of the last three years?—Yes.

45,919. And you represent that the average of the last three years' earnings is probably less than the average of the earnings of the earlier part of his service?—Much less. (Mr. Apps.) It must of course be.

45,920. Is there any provident fund or pension fund existing of a voluntary nature?—We have a little fund

24 February 1915.]

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS.

of our own for sickness only, and each man contributes towards that; but that is merely a voluntary affair of our own. (Mr. Apps.) It is a purely private affair.

45,921. Has it ever been suggested that a pension fund should be created on a voluntary basis?—When we petitioned the Lord Chancellor four years ago a great deal of correspondence took place between the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, and I have a letter here dated the 27th of August, 1910, from the then Secretary to the Treasury, Sir George Murray, I think, which I wish to read to show that they suggested a scheme which of course was simply an impossibility, so it never went any further. This is the point I wish to read. After apologising for delay in answering the Lord Chancellor's letter, the secretary says: "I am now directed to inform your lordship that there is no power under the Superannuation Acts to grant pension rights to the writers in question, either under a contributory scheme or otherwise. My lords are, therefore, unable to entertain any scheme of this character. They agree, however, with your lordship that it is very desirable that some provision should be made for the writers when, owing to age or ill health, they are no longer capable of performing their duties." Then after saying that they have no power to provide this they submit a scheme, which would of course be impossible, for the consideration of the Scrivenery Board. I do not think I will trouble you with what that is.

45,922. Perhaps you would hand in that letter?—By all means (handing in the same).

45,923. You say that the scheme suggested there was not practicable?—Not at all.

45,924. Was any alternative suggested by the writers?—I do not think anything at that time was suggested. We drew up a scheme amongst ourselves, but it seemed so impossible to do anything in the face of that letter, that the only alternative was to ask to be put on an established basis.

45,925. The scheme suggested there was that a fund should be formed by an annual deduction from the writers' earnings?—Yes, one of the first suggestions you find in that letter was that one pound monthly should be deducted from the earnings of a writer. That, of course, was utterly impossible. Whatever the man's earnings are, there is no guarantee that he would earn a pound a week under this present system at all in vacation.

45,926. As a matter of fact he does, on an average, earn 160*l.* a year?—Yes.

45,927. Why is it impossible that a pension fund should be formed by deductions? Those earnings are, I understand, higher than the earnings of writers in the outside profession—writers who work for outside stationers?—Yes, but we are hardly in the position of law stationers now; our work is so varied that you could scarcely say that we come under the heading of a law stationery department.

45,928. Before the Scrivenery Department was formed the work was performed by law stationers?—Some of it, but not all of it that we do.

45,929. Does the work done now differ materially from the work done at that time?—(Mr. Stewart.) Yes, certainly. At the present time all copies that we issue are certified by us as true copies, and they go to the court and to the judges straight from us. Before that time the law stationer made the copy, but that copy was examined before it went to the judge, or anyone else, by the officials or clerks in that department.

45,930. In other words, you have examination work as well as copying?—The law stationers merely copied, but we copy, examine, and certify as correct, and our copies are issued to the court and certified as correct copies. (Mr. Apps.) Those copies are certified by us and accepted in court as evidence. (Mr. Stewart.) The same as originals.

45,931. You claim that the work puts you on a different level from a writer working for a law stationer?—Certainly. (Mr. Apps.) Of course a lot of work has come into the department since the work was done by law stationers.

45,932. Are you paid separately for examining work?—Yes.

45,933. So that it is not additional to the work you are doing as copyists; it is separate work paid for separately?—Yes.

45,934. At reasonable rates?—Yes.

45,935. So that that does not make your position any worse?—No. (Mr. Stewart.) There are only a certain number who have that examination work; it is only a little staff of examiners who get it, it does not go over the whole body; it would be next to nothing if it did.

45,936. But what examining work there is you are separately paid for?—Certainly, but not on our own copying. (Mr. Apps.) It must be quite clear that the 1½*d.* per folio includes copying that document and examining that particular document; but there is a special staff of examiners for office copies, as we call them, that is copies made and brought in by a solicitor or by litigants to be examined with the original affidavit which is on the file. Those office copies are used in court as evidence and not the originals, and any inaccuracy (which sometimes, of course, does happen) on the part of the writer of the document he has examined, as you may know, causes a great deal of inconvenience; so that it is very necessary that those copies should be carefully examined.

45,937. Those documents have a separate examination?—Quite so.

45,938. Which is paid for separately?—Yes.

45,939. (Bishop of Southwark.) How is the examination work allotted; to whom is the examination given?—To the writers appointed in the Scrivenery Department; it is given to the senior—he would have to wait his turn.

45,940. It is given by seniority?—Yes.

45,941. (Mr. Matheson.) Is the payment for examining included in that average of 160*l.* a year?—Yes. (Mr. Stewart.) That is the total.

45,942. That is what brings up the average?—Yes. (Mr. Apps.) There is no complaint as to the payment of that work in any way. Years ago, of course, the examiners used to be far better off, because there was a great deal more examining, in fact almost double; there is not nearly so much now since the Judicature Act came into force. (Mr. Stewart.) In the last two or three years that has gone down tremendously.

45,943. (Chairman.) Is the main point on which you base your request to be pensionable, the permanence of the employment?—(Mr. Apps.) Yes.

45,944. We should like some information on that point. You say that at present there are about 50 writers?—I think so; I am not quite sure. (Mr. Stewart.) I think not now; we have two or three out at the front. (Mr. Apps.) But that would be just the same.

45,945. Have you any figures before you as to the period during which those writers have been employed continuously?—(Mr. Stewart.) We had one with 65 years of service, he is dead now; six with over 40 years, four over 30 years, and 14 over 20 years.

45,946. When a writer enters the department does he as a rule remain there permanently?—For his lifetime.

45,947. Cases are very rare in which men leave the department after they have once entered it?—(Mr. Apps.) Very rare, unless he leaves it for something better, but in the ordinary way of course he does not—he remains. That is our point.

45,948. How is a writer admitted to the department?—(Mr. Stewart.) At the present time he is appointed by the Scrivenery Board but in olden times he was appointed by the senior master.

45,949. In what manner do they make their selection?—At the present time they must be men who have served seven years in a law stationer's office, because they must be experienced men to do the work.

45,950. Are there many men anxious to enter the department?—I dare say there are.

45,951. A good many?—I expect so.

45,952. It is regarded as better employment than a law stationer's copying?—Well, I suppose it is.

45,953. And when they have once entered they very seldom leave?—They never leave unless, as Mr. Apps says, they get something better. We have had some leave for something better and some have been promoted into other departments from our body. We have had four or five at different times who have gone into other departments to assist, and they find them very useful so they have got them appointed as clerks. (Mr. Apps.) No one who had any influence at all would remain in the Scrivenery Department any longer than he could help, especially after a little experience of it; that is the point. There is no opening; there is no incentive to work for anything at all, and the first opportunity they have of getting a nomination for appointment they get out of it.

24. February 1915.]

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS.

45,954. But as a matter of fact very few do leave?—That is so. We have had a good many accept appointments, but unless they have influence or it is some exceptional case, where a man has been asked to go into some other department as a writer, and in his new department he is found a capable man and is offered an appointment on certain terms, they do not leave. It is like this: If a writer has been in the department for a number of years and is earning, say, up to 150*l.* or 180*l.*, and then he is offered an appointment on the staff (there have been exceptions when they have been offered 150*l.*), if he accepts the appointment he would have to go as third class clerk who would start at 100*l.* a year, so that of course if a man is married and has got any responsibilities that is quite impossible for him to do. Some appointments have been made of men in the Scrivenery Department in which they have allowed them owing to their term of service in the department and on account, I presume, of the length of time they have been in the Service, to take it up at 150*l.* a year or 160*l.* to start with, to reach a maximum of 200*l.* by 10*l.* a year: but those I might say, if you like to use the term, are the lucky ones.

45,955. But apart from appointments to clerkships you do not find writers leave the Scrivenery Department for other work?—(Mr. Stewart.) Very seldom.

45,956. In the case of what I may call the outside profession, law stationer's writers, have they any pension fund or provident fund of any kind?—(Mr. Apps.) I do not know, personally I have no knowledge of any of the outside stationers at all. I should think probably they have.

45,957. Do you know of any such fund?—I believe there is a society called the Law Writers' Provident Society, but beyond that name I have no knowledge of it.

45,958. You have no knowledge of the working of it?—None whatever.

45,959. You have not inquired into it with a view to seeing whether any similar fund could be set up for the writers in the Scrivenery Department?—No, not recently. I believe, so far as I know, that for the last 30 years the writers in the Scrivenery Department have been trying to improve themselves; but no one seemed to take any interest in it, and they seemed to have gone on hoping and hoping that something would be done for them, and they are in the same position now as they were in then.

45,960. In fact, they hoped that the Government would provide pensions, and so no steps have been taken for setting up any voluntary scheme?—No; only just in a trivial private way amongst themselves. (Mr. Stewart.) It would be very awkward to start a provident fund for some of us. I myself am 65; how could I start? The young ones might start, but they are very few; we are mostly old servants. You cannot start a thing like that in middle life or old age; you have to start a thing like that when you are young.

45,961. (Bishop of Southwark.) Do you consider that the present arrangement impairs the efficiency of the work done?—(Mr. Apps.) No, I do not think that.

45,962. Perhaps I may put it the other way. Supposing you were regarded as permanent officials; would the work be better done?—No, I do not think that. There would, of course, be considerably less labour, because, owing to the peculiar nature of the Scrivenery Department, it would be impossible to carry it on as a salaried system with its present staff.

45,963. It would be very much more expensive, you mean?—It would be very much more expensive, of course. According to our figures, we say that in 1910 the Treasury made, roughly speaking, 2,500*l.* profit, less such charges for rent, etc.

45,964. (Chairman.) You state that as the net profit?—(Mr. Stewart.) After allowing for all the work we do. (Mr. Apps.) That was our figure that we made out in our department two years ago.

45,965. That is without allowing for what you may call standing charges, such as rent, lighting, and all charges of that kind?—Yes. (Mr. Stewart.) But we do all the official work—that is, work for all the departments besides.

45,966. Does the question of whether there is a profit or not really affect the matter? Would you go so far as to allege that the terms of payment or pension of public servants should be determined by the question whether the department in which they are employed makes a profit or not?—(Mr. Stewart.) No; it is only showing that we might have a case.

45,967. That principle would carry you a long way, in the Post Office, for instance, and would work somewhat unsatisfactorily for the employees in the case of departments that do not make a profit; so that it is perhaps unnecessary to go more deeply into that point of profit. Are there any other points that you wish to put forward as bearing on your request to be made pensionable, or have the answers you have given covered the ground?—(Mr. Apps.) We say, of course, not only that the cost of production realises a substantial profit to the Treasury, but that in justice that should be considered as a claim to bring us within the Pensions Act, 1859.

45,968. But you have admitted, in reply to the question I put to you, that the question of profit or loss in a public department has not any direct bearing on the terms of employment of the servants in that department?—I may be right or wrong, but I understand that no public department is supposed to make a profit. What I want to say in reply to his Lordship's question is, that so far as regards the profit which is made, we who produce the work that makes that profit receive no benefit at all from it.

45,969. Supposing the charges to the public were lowered, so that the Scrivenery Department did not work at a profit but at a loss, would you consider that a reason for reducing your pay?—I have not considered that point at all.

45,970. (Mr. Boutwood.) You said just now that if your department were put on an established basis it would be very much more expensive, and would want a larger staff. I do not quite follow what you had in your mind?—Well, you can understand in the ordinary way that if we were put on to salary we should only work the official hours, which are at present six; as it is we are working twelve; so that it would be very unreasonable to ask us to work for 12 hours and only be paid for six. I mean that unless a system of overtime were granted it would mean an increased staff, which of course would diminish the profit.

45,971. Let me put another alternative. Do you happen to know anything about the Money Order Office at the Post Office?—No, I do not.

45,972. I think I am right in saying that there they have an immense number of small documents to fill up; it is under an established staff, and there is some sort of an average system of daily or hourly average—a man has to do a certain number, and if it keeps him beyond the hour, well and good, he has to do it. Supposing something of that sort were done in the Scrivenery Department, leaving out of consideration the vacations which would make a complication in the details, would there be any difficulty in putting you on a permanent salary, and saying that a certain average amount of copying per week would have to be done?—I presume that that would have to be done in any case. I take it that the amount that would have to be done would be decided afterwards. But you see there would be great difficulty in that, because the nature of the copying varies to such an extent that one man, we will suppose, will have, perhaps, 60 or 70 folios all very hard work, and another man might have 60 or 70 folios which would be comparatively easy work, and he might be able to get through it between 10 and 4 without trouble.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS.

45,973. Would not that correct itself on a week's or fortnight's average?—It might. (Mr. Stewart.) I do not think so. Our work is a lot one day and less the next, it fluctuates very much. There is a lot of it all wanted at one time. (Mr. Apps.) In fact it has always been taken that our department is an exceptional department, and no doubt it is an exceptional department. Take the case of working on Sunday. It may be said that there is no necessity to work on Sunday. It is only those who have been in the department who know. It means this: In the ordinary way when any official or anyone leaves business on a Saturday he is clear until Monday morning. The work that is given to me or anyone else, unless it is marked urgent, you may say again is my Monday's work, and that is the work I will be engaged on on Monday, so that there is no necessity for me to work on Sunday, and in theory that is all very well, but in actual practice it does not work out like that. When I come on Monday morning if I had my work to do in the ordinary way it would be all right, but I find perhaps some very urgent case from the Court of Criminal Appeal or perhaps from the Official Solicitor's Office, dealing with some case of the release of a prisoner or something that is really urgent. I have either got to say "I am too busy, I cannot do it," or I have to take it. If I take it, and I have enough work to last me on Monday, it simply means that I am going to work up till 12 at night. If I were certain that I should have the exact amount of work the next day I should refuse it; but supposing I did do that I lose on the next day, because one cannot keep up that average rate of work every day; and then if I refuse it because I cannot do it, perhaps on the Tuesday I regret that I did not make the effort to do it, because perhaps there is very little or perhaps nothing to do—it may happen so. That is a case which really those in the department can understand—it happens again and again.

45,974. Then there is another point. You spoke of the nature of the work as being in many cases something quite different from plain copying. I do not know the details of it, but something occurred to me and perhaps you will tell me whether it is at all analogous to your case. I myself have a great deal to do with abstracting deeds, and I find that when I have a man working with me who has been at it for some years I can give him a curt and incomprehensible direction which I should be almost ashamed for anybody else to see, and he knows what I mean, and does the thing satisfactorily; but when, by some dispensation of Providence, he goes and I have a new man, I have to spend much more time on instructions. Is that something of the sort of thing you mean?—Yes.

45,975. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) I take it that you are wanting something more than a mere pension; you are not satisfied with your condition of employment as regards sick pay, and holidays, and the like?—That is so. This is our position now, and this is what we are being told time after time until we have got really sick of it: "So long as you are on this system of piecework we cannot help you; we admit that you have grievances to a great extent, but these grievances must go on for ever so long as you are on this system of piecework." Then our answer is: "Then put us on a salaried basis; make it a salary of 5s. a week, or 10s. a week, and let us earn it." "No," they say, "we cannot do that—we cannot help you." That is our position to-day and has been all along.

45,976. In short, I take it that what you want is that you should become an established class, with all the rights and privileges of permanent Civil servants?—Yes. If it be contended (although I do not admit it) by the authorities that this department cannot be carried on on any other system than the present one, owing to the peculiarity of the work and the formation of the department, then I say that we should have certain rights and privileges which we should get if we were on salary; and it cannot make any difference, if our grievances are admitted, whether we are paid piecework or whether we are paid a salary.

45,977. Is there any class analogous to yours in any other department of the courts?—No.

45,978. Are you the only people who are on piecework?—I do not know about the Law Courts, it is such a large institution, and I do not know whether the Courts employ bookbinders and that sort of people, whether they are in Government service or not; but, so far as regards the clerical departments, we are the only one.

45,979. (Chairman.) You are not aware that there are writers in the Probate Registry who are paid by piecework?—Yes, but not in the Courts, I think.

45,980. In the Principal Probate Registry?—That would be at Somerset House.

45,981. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Have you ever formulated a scheme for carrying your ideas into operation? For instance, if you were put upon a salaried basis, has it occurred to you that it would necessitate some change in the system of appointment?—Yes, we have considered so many schemes and submitted so many schemes that I could not at the present moment distinguish one from the other. I have got here a scheme that is quite among ourselves, showing what really could be done to meet our difficulty if the Treasury declined to put us on a salaried basis. We even suggested that to the Lord Chancellor at the time. I am not aware whether that actually did reach the Treasury. After our interview with the Lord Chancellor he promised to put these views before the Treasury, but whether he actually did so or not I am not in a position to say; but we said at that time that as nothing else could be done we were willing to provide 2½ per cent. towards a pension off our earnings if the Treasury would allow us 5 per cent., and so work it on a pension basis of that kind. With regard to holidays we suggested that we should be paid 9s. a day for a fortnight or three weeks, whichever was most agreeable, but nothing came of it, and nothing has come of anything we have ever proposed or ever done. I do not know whether this has any bearing, but I have here the question that was put in the House by Mr. Watt, "To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the clerks of the Scrivenery Department of the Royal Courts of Justice are all called by the Treasury temporary clerks, and are therefore given no pension rights; whether one of the clerks there employed has been for 65 years a temporary clerk; whether six clerks there employed have been temporary clerks for 40 years, and other 14 for over 20 years, while only 11 have been under 10 years in that department; and whether in these circumstances any legislation will be introduced to give permanent clerkships to that department." And I have the answer given by Mr. Masterman on the 17th July 1912, in which he said: "I am not aware that the Treasury has described the writers in the Scrivenery Department as temporary in the sense that their employment is necessarily or usually for short periods only. As the honourable member states, many of the writers have been employed for many years. This fact, however, does not constitute sufficient reason for changing the status of the writers to that of Civil servants with pension rights, and I can hold out no hope of legislation with that object." There was another crusher.

45,982. Are persons introduced into your department as writers sometimes for purely temporary service, supposing you have an exceptional pressure of work?—There have been cases, but in nine cases out of ten they all become permanent.

45,983. The staff of 50 of which you spoke is considered to be sufficient to deal with the average amount of work in the office?—Yes.

45,984. I find, taking the average salary of 160l., and taking the average earnings at 1s. 6d. an hour, that would average 41 hours a week all the year round for the 52 weeks of the year; that is something like the average number of hours worked by the permanent clerks of the Civil Service so that we may assume from that that there would be sufficient work in your department to keep a staff of 50 going for 41 hours a week?—Yes. My friend disagrees with me, I believe, about the number of writers being 50; but that was the number I thought. I could easily ascertain the number; I thought we were 50.

45,985. Now, supposing the Treasury should soften their hearts towards you and be prepared to consider some scheme of superannuation, do you claim that the whole of your past service should be taken into consideration?—(Mr. Stewart.) It would not be much good without. (Mr. Apps.) To the young ones it would not matter, but it would be rather hard on the old ones who have served a good many years in the department. It would hit me; I have served in the department 23 or 24 years. I take it that the Treasury would take that into consideration, inasmuch as when they give an appointment on the permanent staff they allow a man to start at 50% or 60% above the ordinary salary that he would enter the service at as a third class clerk.

45,986. Do you think that your rate of pay now is higher on account of the fact that you are not entitled to any of the privileges of permanent Civil servants?—(Mr. Stewart.) My rate of pay has been reduced 20 per cent. in the last 30 years.

45,987. That is not quite an answer to my question?—(Mr. Apps.) That question has arisen before. I believe the Treasury have an idea that we are well paid; but it has always been said that we could never be well paid at all while we are under this present system, and it would be very likely that they would suggest that if we were put on to a salary basis the salary would be smaller than what we are earning now. That would be manifestly unfair. Say, in my own case, unless I were offered a salary equivalent to what I am earning now, with the responsibilities that I have, it would be out of the question altogether; I should have to continue on my present lines.

45,988. But that difficulty could be obviated, could it not, by a smaller initial salary and a progressive scale?—Yes.

45,989. I understood you to say that a candidate must have had seven years' experience in a law stationer's office?—(Mr. Stewart.) They will not take him without that now; they want experienced men.

45,990. Then what is the age at which fresh writers come to your office?—(Mr. Apps.) Latterly the appointments have been to quite young men. I do not think there is really any age limit.

45,991. 22 or 23?—Yes, just about that.

45,992. Now a smart young fellow who had had a few years' experience in a law stationer's office will earn as much in the first year, say, as you are doing with your 26 years' service?—I have no knowledge. Personally I have never had any experience myself in a law stationer's office.

45,993. I think you do not understand my point. A writer coming into your department who had had experience of this kind of work would be able in the first year in your office to earn as much as you would 10 years later?—Yes.

45,994. Have you ever considered that if you are going to be put upon the establishment a salary of 160% a year at the beginning is a pretty big salary?—If that principle of salary were admitted that would not be asked for; there must be grades of salary. I take it that the question of starting at 160% for any man coming in would be quite out of the question altogether.

45,995. Would you therefore consider it to be a sufficient compensation for the advantages that you would gain by establishment if in, say, the first 10 years of your service you were earning a fairly considerable sum less than you are at the present time?—Yes.

45,996. I am not speaking of you personally; I mean the class?—Two appointments have recently been made from our department, and they could not possibly accept the ordinary third class clerk's salary of 100% a year; they accepted 160%. Of course, for the time being, those two men have lost by it, but they are quite willing to lose it because they have got something certain gained by it; in a few years they will get as much as they are earning now.

45,997. It might be very difficult for you to give an answer to this question straight off, therefore do not consider that you are absolutely committed by any answer that you might give; but supposing some such scale as this were proposed, say beginning at a salary of 100% a year and going by increments to a maximum of 160% with the ordinary Civil Service hours and conditions, would you consider that to be an improvement upon the condition of things which exists at the present time?—So far as the young ones are concerned I dare say it would be. I take it you mean a maximum of 160%.

45,998. Yes?—I take it that the young men would consider it so because they would always be looking to the future, and the possibility of improving their position inasmuch as they were established.

45,999. Take your friend here; he says he is 65 years of age. If he had been in the established Civil Service he would now be at the age of retirement?—(Mr. Stewart.) Certainly.

46,000. Taking his average earnings at 150% a year he would have been entitled to superannuation of 100% a year. Would not that have been a very great improvement upon the precarious salary of 160%?—If we had had the opportunity it would; but of course I could not enter into anything like that; in the course of nature I cannot be many years at it.

46,001. You earn more than 160% now?—Yes.

46,002. Working about 12 hours a day you say?—Not every day; it is only in the busy time. As Mr. Apps has said, in the vacation we have very little to do, and we cannot average our work—there is a slack time and a busy time, and in the busy time we have to work very hard. We have plenty of slack time to recoup ourselves so to speak, but it is so many hours while it lasts.

46,003. Did you keep any record of your actual earnings last year?—I have to send in a return to the Revenue Department; my actual earnings, I think, were just over 200% for the three years' average, but of course I am thoroughly experienced. As I say, you must be experienced to do our work.

46,004. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Have you ever attempted to get a position as scrivener for any relation or friend of your own?—Yes, for my son. At one time I have had two sons there.

46,005. What actual steps did you take to get it?—I have gone to my superintendent and through him to the Scrivenery Board since it has been established. Before that the master used to do it; the master attached to our department used to appoint the writers the same as I was appointed by the senior master.

46,006. Then you now go to the senior master or to whom?—Now it is the Scrivenery Board.

46,007. You do not appear before the Board; there must be some official that you go to?—You apply through the superintendent.

46,008. You go to the superintendent and ask him to put your son's name down on the list?—In my case I introduced my son to the superintendent, and showed his capabilities, and when my son was appointed he was appointed by the master.

46,009. What is the superintendent's name?—Mr. Stringer.

46,010. You have a good deal of leisure time in the Long Vacation, have you not?—Yes.

46,011. Do you do any work, during that leisure time, for law stationers?—No, there is nothing done in the law stationers; they are all slack the same as we are.

46,012. Do you yourself get any other work in the Long Vacation?—No, we do not attempt it, not to my knowledge.

46,013. Is there any work done in the office by a scrivener which is neither copying nor checking copy. I ask you in particular, does the work sometimes consist in counting folios?—There is a little of that, from the Court of Criminal Appeal, a small quantity; but the men who are almost incapacitated get it.

46,014. How much per 100 folios is paid for that?—I think it is 1s. 11d.

46,015. That is reserved, as you say, for men who are almost incapacitated?—Yes. We have one now, he has writer's cramp, and he cannot write. There are two or three who are almost incapacitated, and they get that work.

46,016. So that when the time comes that they are incapacitated from other work they are given this business of counting words?—Yes, when there is any, but there is not very much of it.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS.

46,017. (Mr. Coward.) You said that the qualification is service in a law stationer's business?—They consider that as a necessary qualification.

46,018. Do you never get recruits from solicitors' offices?—Yes; they must have a legal knowledge—that is the idea.

46,019. Probably they would have more legal knowledge than if they came from a law stationer's office?—They might do so if they had served long enough. I think we have one or two.

46,020. Where was your son, for instance?—He was with a barrister; he was junior clerk to Mr. Justice Kekewich.

46,021. Then he had no qualification of being either in a law stationer's or in a solicitor's office?—But he was very young; if they are brought in young that is as good a qualification as being in a law stationer's office, because the elder ones teach them their business.

46,022. The work that you do is the same as would be done by a solicitor's writing clerk—copying clerk?—(Mr. Apps.) Yes, but there is a lot of work that is done by the Scrivenery Department that comes under the head of the copying, and it is not copying—it is abstracting, that is to say, abstracting certain information from affidavits attached to deeds of assignment for publication, for Stubbs, Limited, I think it is called, but it is an official copy, and on this official copy they publish whatever extract is obtained from this affidavit, and if there happens to be, as sometimes has happened, but not very often, a little error, it falls entirely upon the man who does it.

46,023. I beg your pardon, but I asked you before, very distinctly, to be kind enough to tell me what it was that you claimed to be of such exceptional difficulty. When you talk about Stubbs, you mean, I suppose, the people who keep the list of people who have become bankrupt, insolvent, and so on?—Yes.

46,024. Their registry?—Yes.

46,025. What have you to do with that?—I am telling you. They require certain information from the documents which are filed in the Deeds of Arrangement Office.

46,026. That is to say, I suppose the amount of the man's debts and his assets and that kind of thing?—Exactly.

46,027. So that they may give some explanation of any information that they give?—Yes.

46,028. They give information to merchants, solicitors, or anybody who wants it.—Yes.

46,029. As to whether or not a certain person has been a bankrupt and what the result of his bankruptcy has been; that is the kind of thing?—That is the kind of thing that Stubbs do.

46,030. I dare say there is not much trouble in looking into the file of documents and seeing what that man has done, but all that kind of thing is work surely that one would expect any clerk in a solicitor's office to be able to do?—Yes, certainly.

46,031. Are you not better off in your Government office than you would be in either a law stationer's or a solicitor's office?—I do not think so.

46,032. Would you like to go down to a solicitor's office or to Waterlow's?—What, now?

46,033. Yes?—Not now.

46,034. I should have thought myself that you were very well off, subject always to your question of your pension?—But under our present system we only have what we earn; we have no rights, we have no sick pay, and no pension.

46,035. But I think I am right in saying, so far as I know, that in all solicitors' offices the writing clerks are paid not by piecework as you are, and you are paid for everything that you do?—That is so.

46,036. And a solicitor's clerk is not; he gets a salary, and he has to do what work he can or he should, during the time he is there?—Yes.

46,037. With regular hours, and some would allow overtime and some would not?—Yes, but it would be a very poor solicitor's office or insurance office that would practically turn a man away after 50 years' service with perhaps, say, 100%.

46,038. I was not talking about a pension. I especially excluded that. As far as work is concerned the work you have to do is analogous to that done in a solicitor's office, and you get very well paid for it?—But we have never complained of our long hours, or of any work we have done; we are quite prepared to take what we may call the bad with the good.

46,039. Yours is about the only Government department that does piecework?—Yes, in the Royal Courts of Justice.

46,040. And, therefore, the Government perhaps rightly remunerate you upon a piece wage?—Yes.

46,041. Do you want to have something other than that? You are better off, I suggest, as you are, on a piece wage, even than you would be if you were paid a salary?—No, I should be worse off; the older I get the worse off I shall be; it is obvious that I cannot earn as much as I did even 10 years ago; and 10 years hence, let alone the question of ill health or sickness overtaking me, it is quite reasonable to suppose that I cannot earn as much as I do now. What we have asked for is that we should get some of the advantages and privileges, and we get nothing.

46,042. But you cannot have it both ways. If you are paid a piece wage, then, perhaps, you ought not to be given pensions?—Why?

46,043. Because your earnings are so much more than they would be?—I do not think it. If I were offered an appointment to-morrow I do not think they could offer me less than I am earning, could they?

46,044. I will tell you why—because, probably, you would succeed in taking the position of managing an office, something of that kind. I should be doing you no particular kindness if I were to say that I should think you were very competent to take control of an office, and then, of course, you would be remunerated at a higher rate than if you were doing copying; that is the point of it?—But supposing the Treasury hold that view now of the nature of our work, that it is well paid for, always assuming, of course, that the work is permanent, how is it possible for a man to make any provision, say, out of an income of 160*l.*, when perhaps he is a married man with several children?

46,045. You have made me think since you have been giving evidence to-day that I shall inquire from one of the insurance offices whether this is not practicable, because this scheme of giving pensions has been introduced, I do not know whether it is known, by all sorts of people at the universities and elsewhere?—We have had schemes submitted by different people, but that would not affect me at my age.

46,046. I suggest to you that you are better paid than you would be, doing the work that you do, in a solicitor's office or in a law stationer's office, because you are not in a position that you might be in if you were in a solicitor's office in command of the office, to see that the boys do their duty, and everybody else; you are merely a copying clerk?—And so, being that, as you put it, after serving, say, 41 years, I shall be turned away without anything at all, and the workhouse to face?

Yes, it is hard for you, but that is your position.

46,047. (Sir John Kempe.) As I understand it your position is practically a permanent position?—Yes.

46,048. Not secured, but a permanent position?—Yes.

46,049. You have got that advantage over the outside stationers' clerks; that is to say, a stationer's clerk has not any sort of permanency, he is merely employed for the job?—That is so.

46,050. What you want, in addition to that, is a pension; it is not the permanency so much as the right to pension?—(Mr. Stewart.) That is the principle.

46,051. And for that you are willing to sacrifice some of your earnings?—My earnings, impossible; because I am 65 already, and what pension could I get if I sacrificed some part of my earnings?

46,052. I mean your class?—There are three of us there with between 40 and 50 years' service.

46,053. But still you are willing to sacrifice for your class a considerable amount of your earnings in order to get a pension secured?—For other people?

46,054. Yes, for your class?—Personally I would not sacrifice some of my money to pay for the young ones.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. W. STEWART and Mr. WESTON APPS.

46,055. No, but you would be willing to reduce the emoluments of the class if you were paid a salary in order to secure a pension?—I should not like it myself.

46,056. How would you base your salary?—I should like to base my salary upon what I am earning now.

46,057. Upon your 12 hours' work a day or eight hours' work a day?—After serving all your life you do not want to have half your money taken away. In fact, in every other position in life throughout our building as they go on they get promotion and increased earnings, but we should be coming down. Why should we?

46,058. Have you calculated at all what a pension is worth? I heard Sir Francis Mowatt once say that the scale of the Civil Service pension is worth from 16 to 20 per cent. of your salary. Would you be prepared to accept that?—But that would not apply.

46,059. Not to you, but to your class?—I can hardly say. I should hardly think they would like to have that deduction from their money.

46,060. But you are asking for a pay practically equivalent to what you are earning now, plus a pension?—(Mr. Apps.) No; at the present moment we are simply putting our grievances before you and asking you to consider them. So far as regards any scheme, we did not come with that idea; that would be an afterthought. We are asking you to hear our grievances and to report upon them.

46,061. Is there not this further difficulty about putting scribes upon salary? I think you said that the work of a scrivener does not improve as he gets older; that a man necessarily gets less efficient; and you are asking to be put upon an increasing scale for work that is becoming less and less valuable, because it is mechanical work, and your powers must lessen as you get on in life?—Under the present system, as you can quite understand, as a man gets older he cannot earn as much; if he is paid by results he cannot do it, whether the work is mechanical or otherwise. A man might be a genius; he might be a most intelligent man; but, if his earnings depended upon his ability to do his work, it must follow, as a matter of fact, that his earnings will be less. Our point is this: our grievances have been admitted again and again; but, as I say, as long as we are on this system nothing ever is done for us, so that our case is hopeless in any case, and we have nothing but a blank wall facing us each way. They say: "We admit your grievance to a certain extent, but we cannot help it; it must go on." It is to remedy that that we have asked you to hear us.

46,062. There is one question I put to you earlier on which I think I may have misunderstood you. I understood you to say with regard to your payment per folio that the folio does not represent mere copying; it represents, first of all, making a draft from rough notes, so to speak, and then copying that draft. What I asked you was, "Then are there two payments made, payment per folio, and also payment for the rough draft"?—Yes, there is a separate payment for that.

46,063. How is that paid, at the same rate per folio?—No, that is less in this way, because there is an element of luck in it. Supposing, in one particular case, there was only one copy to be done of that particular thing, drafting from this, that, and half a dozen documents, that would not really, strictly speaking, pay a man, he would waste so much time over it that if he had only one draft to do it would be heart-breaking work; but, inasmuch as in eight cases out of ten there is more than one copy of it, that makes up for the labour he has to expend on the first document. That is why it is lower. That is a matter of luck, if he is lucky enough to have three or four drafts. That is the system we complain of, a kind of haphazard business; you never know what you will earn.

46,064. (Mr. Shipley.) The only question I want to ask you is whether you have any complaints about the conditions under which you have to work, whether the rooms are well-lighted and well-ventilated, and so forth?—We have no complaint to make about that.

46,065. (Mr. Matheson.) Do you take any definite holiday?—That is another grievance; we take a holiday but we pay for it out of our own pocket. If I am away it is arranged with the management that I shall take three weeks and others shall take three weeks, but we get nothing for it.

46,066. It is done by arrangement?—Yes, and it is compulsory, that is the objectionable part of it. Supposing I do not want to take three weeks—in fact I cannot afford it—I am compelled to take three weeks and they claim that, owing to the vacation, I do not lose any more by taking my three weeks than if I stayed here. That is another case of theory and practice.

46,067. I do not want to dwell on that. Supposing you were put on a salaried system it is clear from what you have said that a larger staff would be required?—Yes.

46,068. Would not that create very considerable difficulty; you would have a larger staff hanging about during the vacation with very little to do for certain times in the year?—When I say that a larger staff would be required, I know the Treasury dislike overtime and I am only assuming that they would not allow overtime. If a certain amount of overtime was allowed that difficulty would be got over. You see, we have never been asked to consider any question at all such as you were speaking of, how can the department be worked on a salaried basis. If they would say they would give us a retaining fee and allow us 1*l.* a week, and anything over that we shall earn in the same way, we could consider it.

46,069. You have no scheme in fact?—No, not actually before us.

46,070. (Bishop of Southwark.) There is only one further question I want to ask you. Is the impression I have received correct that as a man gets older he is able to do either less good work or less work than when he was young?—You cannot work so hard at sixty as you could at thirty.

46,071. But then that is simply a question of the amount that is done?—Yes.

46,072. Not of the quality of the work?—No; sometimes, of course, it happens that some consideration is shown in the case of mere counting to a man who is incapacitated or suffering from paralysis; but that is all haphazard; there is no arrangement; he cannot count upon it.

46,073. Would there not be a difficulty about constructing a scheme of increments for lengthened service, on a salaried system, for people whose work deteriorated or was less in quantity as time went on?—I do not see any particular difficulty in working the department, even now, on a salaried system.

46,074. Would you suggest that supposing they had fixed hours, from 10 to 4, the work would be just as good at the end of 20 years or even better than it was when they first entered the establishment?—It is quite clear of course that they would not work so hard on a system of salary from 10 to 4 as they do now. They would be better in every way; they would have more time for recreation and that kind of thing. As it is now there is no time for anything but work.

46,075. That is to say, you only judge of the efficiency of the work that a man does now by the amount that he can get through?—Exactly. He might be a brilliant man but it does not count at all.

46,076. (Chairman.) You mentioned that a scheme had been suggested, at one time, of a contributory pension arrangement under which 2½ per cent. of the earnings would be contributed as against 5 per cent. contributed by the Treasury. Was that scheme actually put forward by the writers?—It was put forward as I said at the time, but I am not sure whether that suggestion was put before the Treasury. A deputation waited upon Lord Loreburn when he was Lord Chancellor, and he promised that he would submit our scheme, but whether he did or not I have no knowledge.

46,077. At what date was that?—That was in 1911.

46,078. That was after the Treasury letter that you have handed in of the 27th August 1910?—Yes.

46,079. In fact it was in response to the suggestion of that letter that a contributory scheme should be devised?—Yes, of course we have been working on all kinds of schemes, off and on, to get some idea of a suggestion.

46,080. That scheme was put forward in response to the suggestion in the Treasury letter of the 27th of August 1910?—Yes.

46,081. That is the only contributory scheme which has so far been put forward by the writers?—Yes.

Mr. L. McMULLEN and Mr. H. E. BOURDELLOT, Writers, Scrivenery Department, Principal Probate Registry, called and examined.

46,082. (Chairman.) (To Mr. McMullen.) You two gentlemen appear on behalf of the scrivenery staff of the principal Probate Registry?—That is so.

46,083. How many members does that staff comprise?—25 in all, including the superintendent and an assistant. 20 of those are temporary men; it is the temporary men whom we represent.

46,084. The work may be divided into the two main classes of examining and copying?—That is correct.

46,085. Before 1894 the work both of examining and copying was done by an established staff?—That is so.

46,086. And they were paid, some of them, by salary and some by piecework rates?—Yes.

46,087. The examining staff by salary and the copying staff by piecework rates?—That is correct.

46,088. But both staffs were pensionable?—Yes.

46,089. In the case of those who were paid by piecework, that is to say, the copyists, was the basis for pension the average earnings of the last three years' service?—(Mr. Bourdelot.) That is so.

46,090. And in 1894 the office was reorganised and a change made?—Yes, when typewriting was introduced.

46,091. When typewriting was introduced, what was done with the existing pensionable staff?—(Mr. McMullen.) The examiners and readers were then distributed in different departments in the office, and the pensionable copyists were employed, some on the examining work, and others learned typewriting and took up the typewriting work and continued as pensionable; all were compensated officers.

46,092. And all further appointments both for examining and copying work were unestablished?—Yes.

46,093. A piecework rate was at that time introduced for examining?—Yes.

46,094. What was the piecework rate?—4s. 10d. per 100 folios of 90 words.

46,095. That is the pay of both readers and examiners?—Yes, 4s. 10d. between them.

46,096. Was there any stipulation as to the amount of work to be done?—A stipulated amount was required of 2,000 folios a week.

46,097. Was that the maximum or the minimum?—It fluctuates owing to the nature of the work which is current, and consequently we were allowed occasionally to do an extra 100 or possibly an extra 200 folios a week.

46,098. Was that to make up for other weeks in which there were not 2,000 folios available?—There are always 2,000 folios available, but occasionally, owing to current work, there would be a little more; 2,000 was therefore the minimum.

46,099. It was the minimum and the standard, but a standard that might be exceeded when there was pressure of work; was that the position?—Yes.

46,100. At that rate of 2,000 folios per week, what earnings does that represent?—2l. 8s. 4d. per man per week.

46,101. Then what was the piecework rate that was introduced for typewriting?—A penny a folio of 90 words.

46,102. In some cases of difficulty, where the records are difficult to follow, is that rate increased?—Yes, in the case of records which are over 200 years old, the rate of pay then being 2d. per folio.

46,103. (Mr. Coward.) That was for engrossing it?—Typewriting.

46,104. But from the engrossing?—In some cases.

46,105. (Chairman.) Old wills in difficult handwritings?—And in some cases from the Latin.

46,106. Is there any standard of the amount of work in the case of the copying work?—That comes under the same regulation as the examining, inasmuch as a large amount of it is of a current nature. That also fluctuates.

46,107. Is there any maximum or any minimum?—Not fixed.

46,108. Is there not a maximum of the amount that may be earned in a year?—No.

46,109. Can you give the Commission any information as to the actual earnings or average earnings?—The average earnings of examiners are, as I mentioned before, 2l. 8s. 4d., and for copyists say 3l. 12s. per week per man.

46,110. So that the copying work is more remunerative than the examining?—Distinctly.

46,111. But it is harder work, I suppose?—Certainly.

46,112. Do the individual earnings vary much above or below that average?—Very little indeed.

46,113. That is a fairly steady average?—Yes.

46,114. The greater part of the work is done in typewriting?—The greater part.

46,115. But part is still done in handwriting?—Yes, exemplification work.

46,116. Will you explain what exemplification work is?—An exemplification consists of the probate which is granted to persons who have estates situated abroad. The exemplification is sent abroad and takes in that country the same position as the probate would take in this country.

46,117. It is in fact an official copy of the will?—Yes, including details of the granting of probate in this country.

46,118. That is done in handwriting?—That is what we refer to as exemplification or the exemplifying of probate in this country.

46,119. Is the engrossment of wills in the Personal Application Department done in handwriting?—Yes.

46,120. So that there is a substantial amount of work done in handwriting still?—Sufficient to keep my colleague and myself employed; there are just two of us who can cope with the work.

46,121. What is the rate of payment for that work?—2d. per folio all round.

46,122. How do the earnings for that work compare with the earnings for typewriting?—Practically the same.

46,123. One may infer from that that typewriting is twice as quick as handwriting?—Yes.

46,124. Can you give us any information as regards the hours that you work to earn the sums you have mentioned?—The regulation hours are from 9 until 6, but the majority of our men work from about 9.30 to 5.30 every day, with the exception of Saturday, when some go at 2, some at 3, and possibly some stay until 4.

46,125. That is to say, eight hours on an ordinary day and six or seven hours on Saturday?—Yes.

46,126. With an interval for luncheon, I suppose?—With a discretionary interval; we may take it or not, as we please.

46,127. But in fact is it taken?—In fact it is taken generally.

46,128. In the vacation are the hours shorter?—As regards our staff there is no difference.

46,129. The work goes on fairly regularly?—Fairly regularly.

46,130. Is there any arrangement for taking holiday?—There is no definite arrangement; that also is left to our discretion.

46,131. Each individual can take holiday as he wishes?—Yes.

46,132. As a matter of fact, do most writers take holiday?—The majority do.

46,133. What you wish to represent to the Commission is that you desire to be made pensionable; is that the main point of your representation?—That is the main point.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. L. McMULLEN and Mr. H. E. BOURDELLOT.

46,134. Has the question of pension been raised before?—We have never got any satisfactory reply to our numerous interviews and petitions to the Treasury and also to our President; in fact, there has been no definite reason given as to why we should not be granted a pension.

46,135. You have applied?—We have applied on many occasions.

46,136. On what do you base your request to be made pensionable?—Principally on the permanency of the work upon which we are employed.

46,137. As a matter of fact, are the writers all employed continuously for long periods?—Yes.

46,138. You have no cases of men entering for a short time and then leaving again?—No.

46,139. All the writers who are there at present have been there continuously for some time?—Yes.

46,140. If fresh writers are required how are they appointed?—I believe that the superintendent of our department has a list of likely men probably suggested by other men in the department, but as I have no distinct evidence as to that point I can merely say I believe that is the case.

46,141. The department is superintended by a second class clerk assisted by a third class clerk?—Yes.

46,142. They arrange the distribution of the work?—Yes.

46,143. And they keep the accounts for payment?—Yes.

46,144. Have they any other duties?—They have duties connected with the public; the room is open to the public, and they deal with the public.

46,145. Members of the public or of the legal profession who come to get copies of documents?—Yes. They deal with the Probate engrossments, but not the ordinary copies. This is done through the Copying Department.

46,146. Have you any opportunity of being appointed to clerkships?—Yes; there is an opportunity, but the particulars as to that opportunity we are not in possession of. When the opportunity was given us, it arose out of either our interviews with the President of the Division or the result of representations on our behalf by our Senior Registrar; as to that we do not know. We were told, however, in 1910, that "Vacancies in the third class caused by retirement of the old copying clerks, 10 in number, may be filled by selection from the clerks in the Scrivenery Department on the understanding that service as copyists previous to the appointment of third class clerk will not count for pension."

46,147. That is to say, 10 of the old class of established copying clerks were appointed to third class clerkships, and you were told that vacancies among those 10 may be filled by appointment from the present copyists?—Yes.

46,148. That is, I suppose, if there are qualified men among them?—I do not know that the question of qualification has arisen.

46,149. What is the date of that statement that you have read?—The 8th of January 1910.

46,150. Has any appointment been made since that date?—Two appointments have been made subsequently.

46,151. At what initial salary were they appointed to third class clerkships?—They drop an eighth of their existing salary as pieceworkers, and then rise by annual increments of 10% to 200%, when they stop, further promotion to the second class being barred.

46,152. They begin at a point arrived at by taking their average earnings for the last three years and deducting one-eighth?—Yes.

46,153. And then they rise by the ordinary increments of the class, but are not eligible for promotion beyond the third class?—That is so.

46,154. Has any suggestion ever been made for a voluntary and contributory pension system?—No.

46,155. That point has not been considered?—No.

46,156. Are you prepared to express an opinion as to whether such a system would be practicable?—We have drawn up a scheme which we suggest, but certainly not on a contributory basis. If you care to hear it I will read it to you.

46,157. Will you be good enough to read it?—The suggested scheme is this: The whole of the scrivenery staff to be placed upon a permanent pensionable basis. Past service to count towards the pension—that is a strong point. The examiners should be put on at 150% and rise by annual increments of 5% to 180%. They would be required to cope with the current work and to keep the registering (that is, copying into books) as much up-to-date as the superintendent considered necessary. As to the copyists, they would be on a piecework basis as at present, with an allowance for 21 days of the year, with pay at the individual average, for holidays or sickness. That is our suggested scheme.

46,158. In fact you propose to retain your present piecework rates, to be given fixed holidays, and to be made pensionable?—Yes.

46,159. Would you be prepared to consider a pension system on a contributory basis?—I think we would be prepared to consider anything that would tend to benefit our position.

46,160. Do you consider that your rate of remuneration is higher than the rate of remuneration for similar work in the general market?—No, we think it is not.

46,161. Do you think that a typewriter doing copying work in the general market would earn an average of 181% a year?—We think a man employed on a piecework basis outside could easily do it.

46,162. Have you any facts in support of that opinion?—I am afraid we have not.

46,163. At present the staff is not an old staff, because the present system was only instituted in 1894?—That is so.

46,164. What is the age of the oldest member of the present staff?—Fifty-eight.

46,165. Is he an examiner?—Yes.

46,166. What is his length of service?—About 10 years.

46,167. So that he came in at the age of 48?—Yes.

46,168. What had been his employment before?—A barrister's clerk.

46,169. And among the copyist staff what is the greatest age?—Forty-nine.

46,170. And length of service?—Just over 20 years.

46,171. So he was appointed at the age of 29?—Yes.

46,172. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) What steps are in fact taken by candidates to enter into your work; whom do they apply to?—The superintendent of the department would be the man to apply to.

46,173. He is a second class clerk?—He is.

46,174. Does he keep a list of persons applying for appointment?—We believe that is so, but I cannot say.

46,175. Do you understand that the appointments are in his absolute discretion?—Practically we believe that is so.

46,176. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) What is the difference between your work and the work of third class clerks; what kind of work are they engaged upon?—The third class clerks in the Probate Registry are engaged on various kinds of work; it is rather difficult to enumerate them all.

46,177. Apart from those who have been promoted would they mainly be men who entered by some open competitive examination?—No, by nomination and a qualifying examination.

46,178. The average earnings of your class you say are about 3% 12s. a week?—That is so.

46,179. What is the average number of hours a day that a copyist works?—About eight hours.

46,180. How many folios an hour can you do?—(Mr. Bourdelot.) It varies with the class of work. If I am copying old records necessarily the pace is very slow.

46,181. (Chairman.) That is paid at special rates?—Yes, but with ordinary straightforward copying I should say 30 folios an hour.

46,182. (Mr. Coward.) That is typing?—Yes.

46,183. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Is all the copying done by typewriting?—With the exception of the Personal Application Department work and exemplifications; that is hand-written.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. L. McMULLEN and Mr. H. E. BOURDELLOT.

46,184. Do you know whether the department has ever considered the question of employing women to do this work?—There are two women in our department already; they have been there some 35 years, I believe.

46,185. Are they typists?—Yes.

46,186. Are they doing the same kind of work that you do?—The same kind of work on the machine; that is the registration of wills only. They do not touch divorce matter or other work outside registering.

46,187. (Chairman.) Are they paid by piecework or a salary?—They are paid salaries and they are pensionable.

46,188. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) I take it from what you said about the conditions under which your class may be promoted to the rank of third class clerk there is no very great monetary gain in the promotion?—There is no financial gain whatever.

46,189. Then what induced them to accept the promotion?—The prospects of a pension, the release from typing, and, of course, holiday leave, which, if we take now, when we return it means probably only a fortnight's money to take, which is rather a big drag on a married man.

46,190. Have you ever got to the office when you were told there was no work for you to do that day?—No.

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE, recalled and further examined.

46,198. (Chairman.) I think there is a point in the evidence you gave us the other day on which you wish to make a further explanation, and that is with regard to the number of taxations?—Yes. On looking at the the statistics again, I find that the number of bills taxed, set out as a little over 100, is simply the Probate bills. About three pages farther on you will find the return of the Divorce bills, which are rather over 500, making altogether an average of over 600 bills.

46,199. About 600 bills in the course of the year?—Yes.

46,200. Then you were going to consider further a point which arose in the course of your evidence, namely, whether there was any objection to employing typewriting for the engrossment of wills presented in the Personal Application Department?—I think both the engrossments in the Personal Application Department and the Exemplifications, which are now both done in manuscript, might be typed. I think the reason why manuscript was continued when the typing was first started was because we had a number of old registering clerks employed (who have now been got rid of), and it was thought reasonable to keep that work to employ those old clerks.

46,201. The cost of typing is half the cost of manuscript?—No; I think it is 1½d. instead of 2d. per folio, if it is treated as the higher class of copying.

46,202. But the ordinary typed copying costs 1d. per folio?—Yes.

46,203. Is not this ordinary copying? It is not a higher class of copying; it is like the registered copies of wills?—Exemplifications are different; they have a sort of heading set out in a special form.

46,204. But the engrossments of wills in the Personal Application Department would be precisely the same type of copying as the registered wills?—They would be very much the same. There, again, there is the question of folding and arranging; there will be a little extra work attaching to it, and as to the exact rates at which it should be paid, it should be considered whether there should be a slight addition to the 1d.

46,205. At the end of your evidence the other day we were dealing with the question of the district registries, and you mentioned that all the salaries in the district registries are fixed salaries?—Yes; fixed salaries.

46,206. How are they fixed?—They were fixed, I think, in 1866 originally by the judge for the time being and the Treasury.

46,207. Are they revised from time to time?—Not the salaries of the district registrars. They have been slightly varied; for instance, in Manchester where they 46,191. There is always sufficient work for you to do?—Yes.

46,192. (Mr. Boutwood.) I think in that scheme that you propounded just now the examiners were to be put on a salary but the copyists were to remain on piecework; did I gather that correctly?—That is right.

46,193. Do I also rightly understand that your average does not vary very much; it is fairly steady throughout?—It is fairly steady throughout.

46,194. Then why cannot you also come on to a salary; why have you still written yourselves down at piecework rates?—The nature of the work prevents our suggesting a scheme.

46,195. Will you explain that?—The department of copyists downstairs have current work; we have upstairs all the registering work that has to be recorded for the use of the public.

46,196. I do not quite see the bearing of that on the question of salary or piecework?—(Mr. McMullen.) I should explain that the inability to put the copyist on a salaried basis is mainly due to the fact that the department are afraid that if they did so they would lose the entire control over what the copyists turn out.

46,197. Could they not have some system of average as a sort of check upon them?—We think they could, but they think not.

are joint High Court and Probate registrars a special arrangement was made, but the separate salaries of the district registrars have not been altered at all.

46,208. They appear to vary from a maximum of 1,200l. to a minimum of 200l. Is that correct?—I think that is quite correct. I think Chichester is the smallest, and that is 200l.

46,209. You said you were of opinion that some of the smaller registries could with advantage be merged in the larger registries?—I said I thought it might be possible. I have not worked out any scheme.

46,210. At present the position of the registries does not in any way correspond to the importance of the places where they are situated?—No, not always.

46,211. Taking the case of Staffordshire, for instance, the registry is situated at Lichfield with a population of 8,000; whereas Stoke-on-Trent has a population approaching a quarter of a million?—They have remained in the ecclesiastical towns.

46,212. Which in many cases are quite different now from the principal centres of population?—Yes.

46,213. Taking the case of Wales again, in Wales are there four registries—Bangor, Carnarvon, St. Asaph, and Llandaff?—Yes.

46,214. And those are small places with a population in no case exceeding 11,000?—That may be so. I do not know exactly.

46,215. Whereas Cardiff has a population of over 180,000, and Swansea over 110,000?—Yes.

46,216. So that the situation of the registries does not at all correspond with the principal centres of population?—Certainly not.

46,217. They would not be the centres that would be chosen if registries had to be set up for the first time to-day?—No, I think not.

46,218. From that point of view some re-adjustment would have advantages?—I think if it was proposed to have a smaller number of registries, you might rearrange them in more important towns.

46,219. You mentioned that in some cases the clerks from the principal registry are appointed to district registrarships?—Yes.

46,220. Do you consider that that is the most desirable source from which to appoint district registrars?—I think it is. It has worked very well in all cases where they have been appointed.

46,221. Have recent appointments been made from the principal registry?—Some.

46,222. But not all?—Not all.

46,223. In other cases who were appointed?—Solicitors and, I think, one or two barristers, but mostly solicitors.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,224. Would they be local solicitors?—Sometimes, not always.

46,225. Do you consider it desirable that the appointment should be held by a local solicitor?—I think the appointment of a clerk from the principal registry is more desirable.

46,226. The experience in the principal registry would enable him to perform the work satisfactorily?—It keeps the work more uniform, and also in the case of local solicitors, I do not say necessarily, but sometimes they do not get on so well with all the profession in the same locality.

46,227. In the case of many of these registries the work cannot occupy anything like the whole time of the registrars?—In the smaller ones, certainly not.

46,228. In the smaller ones the number of grants is very limited. Is it the case that at Chichester, for instance, the number of grants is only 226 a year?—It would be under 300. I do not know the exact number.

46,229. That is to say, less than one a day?—It is about one a day.

46,230. Obviously that cannot anything like occupy a man's whole time?—No, I should say not.

46,231. So that if it is a local solicitor who holds the appointment it would be a subsidiary part of his work, his main work being his ordinary practice as a solicitor?—That would be so.

46,232. Do you consider that that might be undesirable in any respect?—In recent cases where the President has appointed a solicitor, he has always made the appointment on the understanding that he did not practice as a solicitor.

46,233. Are solicitors found to accept the smaller registrarships on those terms?—They have not been appointed to the smaller ones. There has not been a vacancy in a smaller one lately.

46,234. That would apply to the larger ones where the salary is more substantial?—Larger than Chichester.

46,235. On the whole you think the best system is to appoint clerks from the principal registry?—I think so.

46,236. That would no doubt be preferred by the clerks in the principal registry?—It relieves the grievance on the question of slow promotion, and it has the great advantage of uniformity of practice—keeping it the same as it is in London.

46,237. A suggestion has been made that if the smaller registries were abolished or merged in the larger registries, the convenience of the public might be served by having probate agents at the smaller places, that is to say, agents who would not make the grants or have the custody of wills or anything of that sort, but who would assist in the preparation of the necessary documents and would pass them on to one of the other registries or to the principal registry. Have you considered the possibility of a system of that kind?—I have just seen the statement which has been forwarded, but it does not seem to me to be feasible. I do not see how it could be carried out very well.

46,238. At present the Inland Revenue officers perform functions of that kind?—They receive papers from applicants and forward them to the registry.

46,239. Do they give any assistance in the preparation of the papers?—In simple cases, I think; they get all the details and forward them either to the district registry or to the Personal Application Department in London, for the papers to be filled up, and, of course, they give assistance with regard to the Inland Revenue affidavit because with that they are well acquainted.

46,240. I see that some 5,000 cases a year are forwarded to the district registries by the Inland Revenue officers, so that a substantial number of applications are presented in that way?—Yes.

46,241. Do a substantial number come in the same way to the principal registry?—I have not got the figures. I do not think they are quite so many.

46,242. The figure for the principal registry would appear also to be somewhat over 5,000?—I thought it would have been rather less.

46,243. Do you consider that the Inland Revenue officers do all that is required in that respect, or would there be any advantage in having agents appointed other than the Inland Revenue officers to do it?—I do not quite see how the plan proposed would work, because apparently there has to be no office, and it contemplates everything being done by correspondence. To make it useful you would have to appoint a very large number of agents.

46,244. The Inland Revenue officer who at present forwards applications has no office for the purpose?—He has the Inland Revenue office.

46,245. All that he does is to forward the applications. I suppose he has no correspondence about it?—He only has correspondence with the registry.

46,246. If the registry requires further papers, or some correction of the papers, does it then communicate with the applicants through the Inland Revenue officer, or direct?—They communicate, first of all, through the Inland Revenue officer; but if it is a case about which there is a great deal of difficulty, it is taken out of the hands of the Inland Revenue officer and referred to the registry.

46,247. Is the case then dealt with by correspondence or personal interview?—Then the applicant would either have to go to the registry, or instruct some solicitor.

46,248. Then, are you of opinion that all that is required for the receipt of applications from the public at places where there is not a registry, can be satisfactorily done by the Inland Revenue officer?—I think so, because that only applies in rather poor cases. If they are cases of large estates they would employ a solicitor or agent, and would not want the Inland Revenue officer. It is only to meet the difficulty of cases where they are poor persons.

46,249. If the smaller registries were abolished, do you consider the inland revenue officers at those places could do all that is required in the way of receiving personal applications without the appointment of an agent?—As it is now there are several places in the district where they are some way from the registry, and they have to go to the nearest Inland Revenue officer. It would be only a change of locality for the registry. The people in the new town would gain, and the others would lose a little bit.

46,250. You do not see any necessity for the appointment of agents other than the Inland Revenue officers?—I do not see the necessity, and I do not think it would work as has been suggested.

46,251. Are the ancient records of each registry kept at the district registry?—Yes.

46,252. In your opinion, is that a satisfactory system?—I think so. There are several county record societies, and they like to have the original documents in their own county.

46,253. On the question of safety, are you satisfied that the local registries are sufficiently secure against fire and other accidents?—Some have very good strong-rooms, and there are some cases where they are not very good. I think on that point you ought to hear the district registrars, because I do not know every registry and the exact particulars of the strong-room.

46,254. Does the principal registry take any responsibility for that, and inspect the custody of documents at the local registries?—The safety of the strong-room is a matter between the district registry and the Office of Works. The Office of Works report, and we see the Office of Works with regard to any question of the safety of documents.

46,255. In the case of the ancient records which are kept at the local registries, are duplicates kept at Somerset House?—We have not got duplicates of wills before the Court was established. We have copies of every will proved since the Court was established in 1857, but we have not got copies of the older documents.

46,256. When we visited the Probate Registry yesterday, we saw a number of ancient records from district registries. Were those the records of probate?—You saw copies of wills.

46,257. We saw bound volumes containing, I think, in some cases copies of wills and in some cases records of probate having been granted?—We have copies of the records of every grant that is made in the district registries.

46,258. Including the more ancient grants?—No, not before 1857.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,259. Then what were those ancient documents we saw at the registry?—Those were old documents from the Prerogative Court. When the Probate Court was established the old records were forwarded from the Ecclesiastical Registries in pursuance of requisitions issued under the Court of Probate Act, and a great many were sent to the principal registry—all those from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury and the Commissary's Court of London. But the requisitions required the local courts to send them to the district registries except in certain cases. We have a number of wills sent from the manorial courts up to London.

46,260. Were all the documents of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury sent to Somerset House?—Yes.

46,261. Then probably most of these documents of which I speak were the documents that came from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury?—Yes.

46,262. Are you satisfied that your supervision of the custody of records in local registries is sufficient and effectual?—I think they are very well kept. There are no doubt some cases of masses of papers—not wills so much—that have not been properly arranged even now. In a great many cases they were transferred from the old registries without being sent in any order at all—simply cases of papers without any arrangement.

46,263. In any case where the arrangements are not satisfactory, whose business would it be to require steps to be taken?—Special arrangements were made to see that all the original wills were arranged in order and indices made, and they are being made now in some of the older cases. The clerks have worked back from 1857.

46,264. Whose is the ultimate responsibility? Is it the President of the division?—Any question of the arrangement of documents would be sent from the district registrar first of all to the senior registrar, and then it would be reported to the President, and any arrangement with regard to their classification, so far as the work of the registry permits, would be under his direction.

46,265. The senior registrar can give directions to the district probate registrars?—In some of those cases it would be a question of extra work. They have not time to undertake a very large work of that kind without some extra remuneration, and then an application has to be made to the Treasury upon the recommendation of the President, which has been done in many cases formerly, not recently so much, because most of the wills and original documents of that kind have been arranged now.

46,266. But are they under the orders of the principal registry?—The documents are in the custody of the district registrars, but it is subject to the directions given from the principal registry.

46,267. The principal registry can and does give directions to the district registrar?—Yes.

46,268. Is there any power of removal of a district registrar?—No, I think not. I think they hold office during good behaviour.

46,269. But if there was a question of removal, a case where the good behaviour requirement was not fulfilled, would it in that case be the President who would act?—In that case I do not know what procedure would have to be taken.

46,270. Are the district registrars pensionable?—A few of them now have been recognised as being entitled to pension, but as a class they are not.

46,271. Because they are not whole-time officers?—Yes, for that reason; and there are some who have been appointed to special places at special salaries, and they have been held to be pensionable on the ground of giving their whole time. The clerks from the principal registry who have been appointed district registrars are entitled under the Superannuation Act, 1859, to claim a pension on their old salary.

46,272. As regards the clerks to district registrars, are they also paid by fixed salaries?—They are paid by salaries which are fixed, but not absolutely fixed, because the arrangement with regard to the salaries of clerks depends upon the number of grants that issue in the registry.

46,273. Were those scales fixed by what is known as Lord Penzance's Scheme?—That has been used as a guide in arranging the salaries.

46,274. Under that scheme the number of clerks and their salaries depend on the number of grants passing the registry?—That is so. It is intended to be a guide in fixing the salaries. It never was actually assented to by the Treasury, but it has been used as a guide.

46,275. In registries passing under 300 grants a year two clerks are employed?—Two clerks.

46,276. Is there work for two clerks?—I should think so, because although there are not a very large number of grants, it includes doing everything with regard to the matter; they have to do all the copying work, they have no copying clerk, and they have to register the documents. They have to do a number of different things.

46,277. Is it possible that where there is one grant a day there is enough work to employ part of the time of a registrar and the whole time of two clerks?—Whether the whole time of two clerks would be engaged, I could not say; but there are a number of little odds and ends of work which have to be done in passing the grant, which, of course, in the principal registry are done by different people in different departments. They have to do the searching and send notices up to the principal registry before the grant issues, and have to deal with the certificate when it comes back, and they have to write the records and keep the lists ready to be sent up, and the copying of the wills for the principal registry in each case as well as the registering. They have a double set of copies to make.

46,278. In registries where there are 600 to 900 grants in a year, the allowance is for four clerks and copying in addition. That would be a case of something under three grants a day. Surely that cannot occupy anything like the whole time of the clerks?—Whether it would occupy quite their whole time I could not say; but there was an inquiry into the question of the clerks in district registries by the Treasury, and, as far as I am aware, they came to the conclusion that they could not propose another scheme which would do it on cheaper lines.

46,279. Are these clerks pensionable?—No.

46,280. Is the decision that they are not pensionable on the ground that they are not whole-time officers?—Partly on that ground, and because they never have passed an examination. Originally, it was not the intention that they should be considered as permanent Civil servants.

46,281. By whom are they appointed?—They are appointed by the district registrar with the approval of the President; they have both signatures under the Court of Probate Act of 1857.

46,282. The district registrar submits a name and the President approves it?—The actual form of the appointment is by the district registrar, and the President signs "approved" in accordance with what is required by the Court of Probate Act of 1857.

46,283. As a matter of fact, are the qualifications of the persons appointed examined in detail by the President or by anybody on behalf of the President?—The district registrar makes a statement in his letter as to the qualifications, and the President deals with it.

46,284. He decides on the statement made by the district registrar?—Yes, unless any further question is raised upon that statement, as to which he would want further information.

46,285. In practice, does the President as a rule accept the nomination of the district registrar?—Yes, as a rule.

46,286. Does that work satisfactorily?—It raises the whole question of what class of individual is required for the clerkships at district registries. As far as my own opinion goes, I think if you had permanent Civil servants after an examination and a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners, you would not be able to get clerks to apply for posts of that kind unless they had a very much larger salary. They come in there very often quite young, and are able to do the junior work of clerks, and are not necessarily required to give their whole time.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,287. Where the district registrar is a solicitor, does he employ the same clerks in his own business?—He could, but I do not know whether he does now in the larger registries.

46,288. There is nothing to prevent him doing that?—There is nothing to prevent him doing that.

46,289. We had before us this morning witnesses representing the Scrivenery Department of the Principal Probate Registry. They asked to be made pensionable on the ground that their employment is for all practical purposes permanent employment. Have you seen the statement which they presented to the Commission?—I have seen the statement, but it is not quite clear from their statement what they suggest.

46,290. In their evidence this morning they suggested that they should be made pensionable and be given a fixed holiday; in fact, that they should be put on an established footing without any reduction of their existing rates of pay?—But that does not exactly say whether they propose to continue to be paid by piecework or to be paid by salary or time.

46,291. As regards that, I think their position was that they had no objection to continuing to be paid by piecework at the existing rates, though they would prefer to be put upon salary. They did not present any definite or complete scheme, but generally what they wanted was to retain all the advantage of their position as it is at present, and to have the advantages of a fixed holiday and a pension in addition. Have you any observations to make to the Commission on that question?—I am strongly of opinion that it is better to keep the whole of the Scrivenery Department, as far as possible, paid by piecework.

46,292. You are decidedly in favour of piecework?—Because it is the only way that I can see of absolutely preventing certain work falling into arrear. The examination of the registered copies always used to be in arrear until the system of paying for it by piecework was started.

46,293. Would it be possible to have a system of payment by salary with a fixed standard or minimum of work to be done by each employee?—I think there would be an objection to that, because then the staff in the Scrivenery Department would also be fixed, if the whole of them were to be treated as permanent Civil servants. The advantage of having a staff paid by the piece, and not limited in number, is that you can never fall into arrear.

46,294. You can always take on extra hands?—You can always take on extra hands, and always ensure the current work going on. If I were to suggest any sort of plan by which they might become pensionable, I should prefer their still being paid by piecework, and that those first employed should not be pensionable until they had procured some certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners under the special clause for dispensing with an examination after a number of years' service and a recommendation from the President. Then all the people who come in would not be made permanent Civil servants until they had given complete satisfaction and had served a certain number of years. That would enable us to have the lower part of the Scrivenery Department simply temporary.

46,295. That would enable you to bring in additional men without interfering with the permanent staff?—Yes; temporarily without interfering with the permanent portion of the staff.

46,296. As regards the present rates of pay, have you compared those with the rates in the general market outside the Government service?—No; I have not.

46,297. Do you know whether there are always a number of candidates for admission to the Scrivenery Department?—There are generally a large number; just at present, in war time, there are not so many about.

46,298. But it is regarded as more favourable employment than outside employment?—I think so, as regards that kind of employment.

46,299. Have you compared the rates paid in the Probate Registry with those paid in the Central Office Scrivenery Department?—The work is so different. I have not compared it because we have so many different classes of work in our Scrivenery Department, and theirs is merely the ordinary copying of the documents filed as a rule.

46,300. I may say that the representatives of the Central Office Scrivenery Department put rather the other side of the case; they tried to impress us with the variety and importance of their work?—No doubt.

46,301. Are you aware that the rate for manuscript copying in the Probate Registry is 2*d.* a folio of 90 words, whereas at the Central Office it is 1½*d.* a folio of 72 words less 7½ per cent.?—There is hardly any manuscript copying now in the Principal Registry, or very little.

46,302. You have already mentioned the classes of copying that are done in that way—the registered copies of wills in cases of personal application and the exemptions?—Those two, and the copying of the daily entries in the calendar for the public calendar.

46,303. Those are paid for at 2*d.* a folio of 90 words?—I think so.

46,304. Are you aware that the payment for corresponding work in the Central Office is 1½*d.* a folio of 72 words, less 7½ per cent., which is equivalent to 1¼*d.* per folio of 90 words?—No, I was not aware of that.

46,305. Going back to the clerks to the district probate registrars, have they in the past ever been regarded as pensionable?—Yes. There were two opinions from the Law Officers; the first one decided that they were pensionable, and it was afterwards decided that they were not.

46,306. Were any clerks given pensions under the first opinion?—Some were pensioned.

46,307. Then the Government took advice at a later period and went back to the former view, that these clerks were not pensionable?—Yes.

46,308. Has that created dissatisfaction amongst these clerks?—I should think it is very likely to do so. I said I should like to hand in a statement about the registrars' clerks. There is a copy of the application in 1907 which I referred to (handing in the same). You also asked for a return of the average earnings of the piecework staff (handing in the return).

46,309. From the paper you have handed in it appears that the average earnings of examiners and readers is 125*l.* 8*s.* a year?—Yes.

46,310. And the average earnings of the typists is 179*l.* a year?—With regard to the 125*l.*, the sanction of the Treasury to the payment of examiners and readers was at the rate of 4*s.* 10*d.* per 100 folios of 90 words each—that is, for the examiners and readers. When the system was started the clerks employed upon this work were about equal in class and seniority, and they were given half the amount, so that the amounts for the examiners and readers were about equal; but it is proposed that that should not continue, and that the examiner, the one who is more responsible, ought to get more than the reader, and now the examiner will get a little larger proportion of the 250*l.*

46,311. Ought not they to take it in turn to read and examine?—They used to, but now one is more responsible, and I think ought to have a larger share of the money allowed.

46,312. Then the average earnings of the typists at 1*d.* a folio are 179*l.*?—Yes, I should say the average is between 170*l.* and 180*l.*

46,313. On what period are these averages calculated?—I should think that is the average of the various clerks for the last year's accounts that have been made up.

46,314. Then there are certain clerks who earn more than others?—Yes.

46,315. Is that because they are doing special work?—They are doing special work.

46,316. (Sir John Kempe.) A question or two about the clerks. We had it in evidence, I think, from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie that the common scale was given to all the clerks of the Supreme Court and was accepted very reluctantly. I presume the common scale was intended to make the clerks interchangeable between the different branches?—I have never heard that.

46,317. But it is a common scale. You have clerks on the same scale in the Chancery branch, for instance?

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

—The salaries of the first, second, and third class are the same in our registry as in the Central Office.

46,318. You do not know whether it was intended, when that scale was fixed, to make the clerks interchangeable between the different departments?—No, I never heard that.

46,319. But, as a matter of fact, the work done by clerks in the different branches is very different. The Probate Court work is quite different from the Chancery Court work?—Quite different.

46,320. Yet they have the same rates, that is to say, you give them the same scale?—They are paid the same. The salaries of the classes are the same because at the time of the reorganisation we were made to adopt that scale. I do not know whether we should have proposed it.

46,321. You consider your Probate work can be learnt in the office to a certain extent?—Yes.

46,322. But in the Chancery chambers it cannot be, and it is necessary to have the qualifications of a solicitor or a barrister. You find you do not require that, you said?—I find we do not require that, although some of our clerks are barristers. We have about seven of our clerks now who are barristers, but they were not brought in as barristers; they happen to be barristers as well.

46,323. Do you find that those clerks brought in as barristers have a better chance of being promoted to registrars afterwards?—The fact that they are barristers is something in their favour if they are recommended for other reasons.

46,324. As a matter of fact, have those clerks brought in as barristers become registrars more than those not brought in as barristers or solicitors?—I do not think so.

46,325. In fact the work of the office is enough to train a man up to the work?—Certainly.

46,326. I suppose the work of the principal registry is the same as the work of the district registries practically?—The work with regard to the passing of grants would be very much the same, and it is confined to the passing of grants in the district registries. They have nothing to do with divorce matters or probate contentious matters, or applications to the Court.

46,327. You have a higher class of work at the principal registry than at the district registries?—Yes, very much higher.

46,328. For that reason you think you need not have the same class of clerks at the district registries as at the principal registry?—No, I do not think so.

46,329. Therefore, you would not require a judge's or registrar's nomination for the district registries, but you are satisfied with the district registrar's nomination?—I think he is in a better position to find local persons who are ready to do the clerical work of district registries.

46,330. As a matter of fact, you get better men at the principal registry than at the district registries?—They are a better class of clerk altogether.

46,331. You sometimes transfer them?—Never.

46,332. You never transfer from district registries to the principal registry?—No, they are not competent to be transferred.

46,333. Can you tell me at all how the work of your office compares with the work of the Inland Revenue Estate Duty Office clerks. Is not the knowledge required for your office and for the Inland Revenue Office very much the same?—No, I do not think so. There they require a knowledge with regard to the duties, which are the Inland Revenue part of our work, but they are not required to have any knowledge of titles to grants and questions of wills and validity. All those questions of law they are not required to know anything about.

46,334. Do you happen to know what class of clerks in the Inland Revenue deal with the work which you deal with. Have not the Inland Revenue what is called an intermediate class of clerks to deal with estate duties, and so on?—They have an Estate Duty Department.

46,335. Do you consider that a higher class of work than yours?—I do not consider it so, but it is not for me to express any opinion about their work.

46,336. To a certain extent they cover the same ground, but you cannot tell how far?—No.

46,337. (Miss Haldane.) With regard to this statistical statement, I find there are two female typists, three copying clerks, and 23 male typists and examiners. Are those independent of the Scrivenery Department?—No, the Scrivenery Department includes all the male typists and the two female typists, only the two female typists are paid by salary, and are permanently on the staff.

46,338. Then there are 15 women, including the charwoman, in the lump-summers. Do you know who they are?—We have a resident housekeeper, Mrs. Mosely, who receives a fixed salary of 70*l.* a year. Then we have an allowance, which comes up to 303*l.* a year, for a number of charwomen employed by her. They do not live in the building; they come in simply as charwomen.

46,339. And those are the 15 mentioned?—Yes.

46,340. Why is it that more female typists are not employed. There are only two female typists?—The reason, I think, against that is that the solicitors and solicitors' clerks are entitled to read over their copies of the wills with the original documents, and they go into the copying clerk's room. It was not thought desirable that all the solicitors' clerks should be perpetually reading over with female typists. That is one reason. Another objection is that there are a great many divorce papers which have to be copied by typists, and they do not always contain very proper material.

46,341. Could not the first difficulty be got over. Is there any great objection in reading over?—There is, I think, or it has been thought so at all events.

46,342. You do not consider there is any serious difficulty about that?—It has been thought so. I cannot say more.

46,343. But you personally do not think so?—I do think it very objectionable—I do not say so objectionable as risky; you cannot tell what might happen.

46,344. Do not you think it could be obviated by some other arrangement?—We cannot take away the right of the clerks to go into the room. It could not be kept as a copying department where the solicitors' clerks would not have access.

46,345. When we were listening to the statement of those giving evidence this morning it struck me that a great deal of the work that they described might be done, as it is in other departments, by women?—Some of it would be no doubt, but then the women are also, as a rule, paid by salary, and that is what I object to for the greater part of the work, because I think it is better when paid for by the piece as it prevents arrears.

46,346. Would there be any objection to paying women by piece also?—No, I do not see that there would, except that they prefer being on the establishment.

46,347. The men would also prefer being on the establishment, so as regards that there is no distinction between the men and the women, but I suppose, according to the present scale, the women are very much cheaper than the men?—They get 2*s.* a week.

46,348. They would be less expensive?—They earn less at present.

46,349. But you think a great deal of the work could be suitably done by women in the Scrivenery Department?—I think it is better as it is.

46,350. Independently of that objection of which you have spoken you think it would be suitable work for women?—I think it is better as it is.

46,351. (Mr. Coward.) One question on that subject?—Do you happen to know that women are employed in offices where they do typewriting work?—I believe so.

46,352. And I can tell you that they are extraordinarily efficient. I may say in times gone by my firm used always to employ a particular well-known firm of law stationers in London to do all our work. Something occurred that induced us to go to a lady who has got a staff of typists who are women, and I can tell you that the difference between the work done by these women and that done by the firm I speak of

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

is incredible; the women's work is done thoroughly well to time, it is done excellently as far as quality is concerned, and they never make any mistakes—it is quite extraordinary. What would prevent the copying of all wills in your office by female typists. The divorce work might readily be kept separate; there would be no difficulty whatever about it?—There still would remain the objection, as I say, of the access of the clerks to their room.

46,353. Why should you have clerks; you might have all the work done by the ladies?—Solicitors' clerks have the right to read over the copies with the clerks.

46,354. But then there would be two or three together, would there not?—Yes; there might or might not be, but it is a question of whether it is desirable.

46,355. Do you think there would be any difficulty in having a room with three or four lady typists and a clerk coming in and going to one of the ladies and reading over the work. One can hardly understand there being any real difficulty about it. However, this is a matter on which we may look for some outside evidence?—I can only express my view, that I think it is undesirable. I cannot put it any different from that.

46,356. Without having tried it?—I only express my opinion. I cannot say more.

46,357. You and I would both begin upon the assumption that efficiency and the efficient conduct of your work is the thing to be aimed at?—Certainly.

46,358. I will assume that, and that the work in your office has to be done in the very best way that it can be done, and most efficiently?—Yes.

46,359. I see that you have employed in your office altogether 125 people, and the cost of it is about 27,000*l.* a year. Now, I should like to ask you, whether, if you were employed to superintend that office and do that work in the best way it could be done, you could suggest any alterations that could be made in it. You have here four registrars, six principal clerks of the Seat, and so on. Could you suggest, to begin with, any reduction in the number of all these people who make up the 125?—I think very shortly I should suggest that the staff should be increased. The work is increasing all the time, and we have to keep on simplifying it, as far as absolutely possible, to get it done.

46,360. May I conclude then that the work is not efficiently done now?—No; you may not conclude that.

46,361. So I should think. Then have not you enough clerks to do it now?—We have enough to get it done, but the work keeps on increasing and we have to look ahead.

46,362. Then you would say that it would be impracticable, consistent with efficiency, to decrease the number of employees in that office?—Yes, certainly.

46,363. Now I come to the salaries. Do you think that the salaries are what should be paid for the work that is done?—As I said before, I think that the registrar's clerks ought to be paid second class salary. Apart from that, I should leave the classes as they are.

46,364. It is rather a curious thing—a thing which you would not find, I think, in an ordinary office—that these clerks, when they once get into a class, get increases of salary wholly irrespective of merit?—You mean their yearly increment?

46,365. Yes?—That applies, I imagine, to all Government departments.

46,366. Do you think that a good plan?—The salary does not become very high when they have got to the maximum.

46,367. Does it not?—Not the maximum of the class. The senior member of the third class, who is in receipt of the maximum of the scale, which is only 200*l.* a year, was appointed in 1899. He has been 16 years getting to the 200*l.* a year. You cannot complain of that as a very rapid increase.

46,368. But I think it would depend upon what he is doing and what his duties are, and whether he performs them efficiently or not. It may be a very large salary for one, and an insufficient salary for another. Similarly they are promoted from one class to another by seniority?—Not alone by seniority, but chiefly.

46,369. I think I am right in saying that you told us that, as a practical matter, they were so promoted?—From the lower class to the second it is chiefly by seniority, with efficiency. If they were not considered efficient to be promoted they would not be.

46,370. You would never go outside the office to get them; for instance, you do not recruit them from solicitors' offices?—We cannot do it. We cannot appoint straight to the second class.

46,371. Why not?—There is no provision for it at all. I do not think the President has power to do it.

46,372. Under what authority are they appointed?—We have not yet heard that there was any express qualification for it?—No, but all appointments to the office from outside are made to the bottom of the third class. After that it is by promotion.

46,373. You say you might appoint them from solicitors' offices or anywhere to the third class?—Yes, to the bottom of the third class.

46,374. Is there any real necessity whatever to recruit the second class from the third except that that is the practice?—I think it would be very unfair if it were not so, without gaining any advantage, because we have several people in the third class quite competent to be promoted to the second class. There are too many, in fact, competent to be promoted, only we have not enough vacancies to put them in. There is not the slightest difficulty in filling up vacancies in the second class.

46,375. I suppose it is not very onerous work they have to do in the second class?—Some of it is. It varies. There are a number of second class places where there is a good deal of complicated work to do; in others not.

46,376. With regard to the registrars, do you consider it necessary for the registrars to be in court during the hearing of all these cases?—That is a matter for the judge. The judge considers it necessary.

46,377. He hardly does that, because when there are two courts sitting you are in one and your clerk in the other?—But if any question arises and the judge wants me, he has only to send into the next court and I can go to him at once.

46,378. But you can equally be at hand if not in court?—It would take some time.

46,379. Do you, in your view, consider that there is any necessity for you to sit in court while a case is going on?—I do not know that it is absolutely necessary that I should be in the chair in court the whole time the court is sitting; but there are many questions arising in the course of a case upon which it is essential that a registrar should be there.

46,380. Would not you find that there are many cases that would be decided without the necessity for asking you a single question?—It is not only for the actual case. When I am in court I am doing other work, not anything to do with the actual case. Except a few notes with regard to the case, I am doing other work connected with the court.

46,381. You think your presence is necessary?—It is necessary for the other part of the work.

46,382. It is rather a high salary to pay for a man to sit in court, unless he is really wanted?—But one is occupied with other work.

46,383. Such as what? Do you mind telling me?—In probate matters. I have to abstract the motions for the judge. Cases which are brought in during the week, on Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday, for the following Monday have to be shaped for the judge. Then one has applications from solicitors with regard to settling orders; they have to go into my room, and I go out of court to do that. We have solicitors appearing and sometimes counsel. With us the decrees are connected with the registry work; grants have to be sent for and various notes and applications made.

46,384. But they are very different from the decree in Chancery, for instance?—They are more simple, no doubt, than most of the decrees in Chancery; but we have some complicated decrees. We have complicated orders for variations of settlements which have to be settled very carefully.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,385. But that is done in quite another way; there is plenty of time to do that?—No, that is done on motion in court, and we have to draw up those orders.

46,386. Yes, for a settlement to be varied, but that is not when you consider a variation in a settlement?—That is done in the registry, but the order for the variation, which is often very different from the report which is made, has to be settled when one is in court.

46,387. Is that a very complicated matter?—Sometimes they are not very complicated, sometimes they are; they vary.

46,388. I am bound to say I do not quite appreciate how that can be. You dealt, in your first day's evidence, with the question of taxations as imposing a great deal of duty and onerous obligations upon you. Is the taxation of a bill of costs really such a very complicated and elaborate matter?—It depends on the nature of the bill.

46,389. Of course you may have to consider such a question as whether three counsel should be allowed, and also whether documents have been properly copied, but, apart from that and apart from the one item of instructions for brief, is there anything in a bill of costs or should there be anything in a bill of costs that is not absolutely scale charges?—A great deal. There are a great many bills that one can tax without any trouble at all, that are, as you say, nothing but scale charges, such as bills up to the setting down of a case; but where a difficulty comes in sometimes is when solicitors attend the taxation and fight very much over every item.

46,390. It depends upon whether they know their work or do not know it?—Whether they know their work or do not know it, it makes it then very difficult to tax, especially with regard to "Instructions for Brief."

46,391. The "Instructions for Brief" is the real complication?—In a large bill where people claim large sums—500*l.* or 600*l.*—"Instructions for Brief" wants very carefully working out, especially when they are fighting, and it takes a long time and careful thought.

46,392. Is not all the other part of the bill work that could be done by a subordinate?—No, because there are other points.

46,393. You do not want to exercise your talents upon that work, do you?—There are other points where the bill is fought. If a bill is not fought you can get through a taxation comparatively quickly.

46,394. So I should think?—That applies to all taxation, not only in our branch of the business but in other branches.

46,395. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You represent before us the principal Probate Registry?—Yes.

46,396. In what sense do you represent it here?—Because I have been asked to give evidence here.

46,397. By whom. Who chose you?—You mean because I am not actually the senior registrar.

46,398. That is what I was leading up to?—The notice from the Commission was sent to the senior registrar, and he wished me to give evidence, as I have had a great deal to do with the senior registrar's work; a letter, I think, was sent to the Commission and it was acceded to.

46,399. Who is responsible in your department for the ordinary discipline and control of the department?—It is rather difficult for me to answer that question, because I lately have practically dealt with most of the senior registrar's work.

46,400. You may say you are acting senior registrar?—More or less.

46,401. And the senior registrar or anybody who is acting for him is responsible officially for the discipline and control of the department?—Yes.

46,402. The senior registrar gets an extra salary of 100*l.* a year for being the senior registrar?—Yes.

46,403. I have asked for the ages of the officials, but I have not been able to obtain his age. Is he 86?—I could not tell you. He is old, but his exact age I do not know. I did not know he was so old as that. Do you suggest 86.

46,404. I do?—I do not know whether that is correct or not, though I knew he was over 80.

46,405. To whom is the senior registrar responsible for the discipline and organisation of the office?—A certain amount is on his own responsibility; in other respects he is responsible to the President.

46,406. The President is in a certain sense the supervising head of your office?—Yes.

46,407. Does your experience suggest that it is convenient that the head of an ordinary administrative office should be a busy judge?—The actual administration is by the senior registrar, subject to directions given by the President.

46,408. When was the President last in your office?—He does not come very frequently.

46,409. When was he last there?—I could not say now exactly, but he does not visit often.

46,410. When was he last there?—I could not tell you now.

46,411. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Has he ever been there?—He came once, I think.

46,412. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) When?—I could not tell you now. He has never been all round the office.

46,413. Supposing the senior registrar were in fact, owing to age, incompetent to do his work, whose business would it be to find out that fact, report it, and act on it?—I cannot tell you that. I did not know there was any question of incompetence arising just at present.

46,414. What is the length of the working day in your office?—The office hours are 10 to 4.

46,415. Is a clerk allowed to go out of the office for lunch?—Yes, he is allowed; they arrange between themselves.

46,416. How long are they allowed to be out for lunch?—It is generally half an hour, I think; but there is a luncheon department in the office, and a great many of them do not go out at all.

46,417. Is there a definite strict rule as to how long they should be out of their rooms for lunch?—The ordinary arrangement is half an hour.

46,418. I know, but is it an offence to be out of the office longer?—Sometimes they may by special leave be longer if it is an occasional thing.

46,419. Whom do they ask for special leave?—They have to ask the head of the department if they go out for longer than half an hour.

46,420. When does the office close on Saturdays?—At one o'clock.

46,421. What holiday has each clerk in the course of a year?—36 working days.

46,422. Is the attendance of clerks at the office regulated by an attendance book?—Yes.

46,423. Have you seen any attendance books at the office lately?—I have not seen them the last week or two.

46,424. You did not see any attendance book yesterday?—No, I do not see them daily.

46,425. Are you satisfied that the attendance books are kept properly?—I have been satisfied.

46,426. Some of the clerks are chosen to be registrars' clerks?—Yes.

46,427. Are those chosen by the registrars themselves, or by the senior registrar?—They are asked for by the registrars themselves, and are approved by the senior registrar. That means that the registrars can choose certain clerks. They have a choice amongst a certain number. They could not choose people whom it was not convenient to send to them.

46,428. Do the registrars' clerks sign the attendance book?—No, they do not.

46,429. Why not?—Because they are in personal attendance on the registrars, who know exactly what they are doing with regard to their attendance, and it is not thought necessary.

46,430. Is there a rule that all clerks are to sign the attendance book?—I am not aware of a rule to that effect.

46,431. Was there ever an agreement with the Treasury that there should be an attendance book?—These clerks are kept very late some days, and some days get away earlier, but their attendance is absolutely known to the registrar.

46,432. But my question was whether there was a rule?—If there is such a rule, it was considered that it did not apply to them.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,433. If the registrar himself does not attend the office, is the registrar's clerk invariably required to attend the office every day?—He attends the office because he has other work to do with regard to the grants. If one registrar is away other work has to be got ready for the other registrars.

46,434. Is it, in fact, an invariable rule that if a registrar is not attending his office his clerk is?—Certainly, in the ordinary way.

46,435. Is the meaning of "in the ordinary way" that it is an offence if the clerk is not there?—No, what I rather mean is that, supposing for instance there was a day at Easter or some day when one registrar is away, probably the clerk would be away too; but in the ordinary term time, when the work is going on, if the registrar is away, the clerk would still have his own work to do at the office which he would come to do.

46,436. What are the hours of work of the clerks in the Long Vacation?—During the Long Vacation the hours are from 11 to 3.

46,437. Is there anything in the nature, for instance, of the Calendar which could not, as a matter of fact, be largely done in the Long Vacation?—All the searching work in the Calendar Department must be done from day to day. Some of the Calendar work could be allowed to collect, but I doubt whether they could get the printed Calendar out so soon as they do if it were done in that way.

46,438. Are you sure it would not be possible to get some annual work assigned to the Long Vacation?—I should not like to say it is absolutely impossible, but it would be very difficult.

46,439. Has anybody ever tried to do so?—It has always been so difficult to get the Calendar in print in reasonable time. That has always been a struggle, and now we have got it up fairly close.

46,440. In other Government departments there is a registry for the whole department in which all letters received by the department are registered. Do you know that?—Yes.

46,441. Is there such a general letter registry in the principal Probate Registry?—No, there is not, because we have so very little correspondence.

46,442. I was told that the principle in your department is that work should not be done by correspondence, but by personal application?—There is a rule to that effect. It is one of the rules that the business applications shall not be made by correspondence.

46,443. Why, from the point of view of the convenience of the public, should that rule be made?—I do not know why it should have been made. Our business is done by solicitors, not by applicants in person, and they ought to come and attend to the application.

46,444. I can understand that it may be convenient to you, but can you indicate how it is more convenient to the public that that rule should exist?—I think so. It would lead to more trouble if all the applications work were done by correspondence.

46,445. Trouble to the public?—It is not with the public so much as with solicitors.

46,446. But even a solicitor is a member of the public?—In that sense; but it is the ordinary public who can come to the Personal Application Department.

46,447. I know; and supposing that a man, as a matter of fact, finds it more convenient to apply personally, he would do so. I am taking the case where he wants to write and you refuse to allow him to write, because you say there is a rule that he is not to?—If the rules were altered, and some department were established to deal with the questions by correspondence, I do not say it is impossible.

46,448. We are considering whether the rule should be altered, and we ask your advice on the point?—I should say there is no real grievance against the present system.

46,449. A certain number of people attend with wills in what, I think, is called the Personal Application Department at your office?—Yes.

46,450. Those are largely people who make a journey to London for the purpose?—Some do.

46,451. And they are not, on the whole, the richest people in the country?—No.

46,452. What they ask for and get at their first interview in your department is very simple information indeed as to what the procedure is, and what they should do?—As far as possible we desire that the people who come up from the country, if it is a poor case, should get their cases through the same day. If they are coming from London, we just take the instructions and get the papers ready, and get them to come up to be sworn another day.

46,453. Take a London case: the applicant comes from some part of London, and you simply, on receiving a statement of his name and business, tell him what he has to do, and ask him to come again?—He gets all the particulars, and you make an appointment for him to come again, and the papers by that time are ready to be sworn.

46,454. Before that very simple interview takes place, he has to wait in your waiting-room?—If the clerks are engaged; but I think a good many of these people who are waiting in the waiting-room are waiting whilst their papers are being prepared, and not for the first interview. If they are merely country ones, and have given their instructions, they are sent to wait there until the papers are ready to be sworn.

46,455. I was told in your office yesterday that some wait three or four hours?—It is very rare, I should think, but if they do wait like that, it is whilst their papers are being prepared, so that they can do it all on one day.

46,456. You can say with confidence that nobody waits for an interview so long as three hours?—I should say it is entirely wrong.

46,457. If that were the case, that would amount to a serious public inconvenience?—Certainly. There were some letters in the newspaper not very long ago saying how extraordinarily they get through their work in the Personal Application Department.

46,458. You say you may want more clerks. Have you sufficient clerks to arrange that everybody, within a few minutes of calling, shall be able to see someone?—I think we have enough to deal with matters at present. There is a little awkwardness just at present, because some of the staff of one or two of the departments are on military service and their places are filled temporarily, so we have not quite so efficient a staff as we had.

46,459. Is your normal staff sufficient to secure that the general public shall get their first interview without delay?—I think so. It is a question wanting a little arrangement, and I was going to look into it myself, to see if the arrangement is absolutely best for making the appointments for these people.

46,460. The first information given when they first call—taking the papers and so on—is very simple indeed, is it not?—In some cases, not always.

46,461. Let us suppose that the more difficult case is referred to somebody else, then practically everybody in your office, in nine cases out of ten, could do what is wanted?—Some of the quite simple ones.

46,462. Would it not be possible, instead of telling off one clerk for that business to arrange, if he was busy when anybody called, that some other clerk should be called up to see the applicant?—There are a certain number of clerks in the department who are considered competent to deal with taking instructions from these applicants.

46,463. But you just told me that everybody is competent, in fact, to do that in nine cases out of ten?—But in practice it is better that a certain number of people should get used to doing a certain class of work, and thus get through it quicker. If a clerk, who has not done the work, is suddenly told to do it, he does not get through it so quickly.

46,464. Meanwhile the public are waiting?—I do not think there is any cause for complaint on the ground of waiting.

46,465. Would you say that the work of your office, in dealing with anybody who calls, is rather like that of a big shop on the technical side?—I do not quite follow your question.

46,466. Would you say that the irregular calling of the public at certain hours and having slack hours at other times, and the fact that the public convenience is best met by prompt dealing with everyone as he calls, is a problem which is also found in a big shop?—I should think so, but it is not quite so easy to deal with a Government staff as it is with your own private staff. If you have a private business you can always arrange things better.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,467. A large part of the work of the office is keeping certain books, giving the name and date and reference to wills, which books are open to the public so that the public can inspect them?—The public calendars; yes.

46,468. Most of these inspections take place within a year or so of the death?—A great many of them.

46,469. The calendars relating to any time within a year or so of the death are kept in manuscript?—For the last year.

46,470. And they are not in strict alphabetical order?—No; they are under small divisions of the alphabet.

46,471. Therefore, a member of the public who wants to look up "Brown" has to look through all the "Browns," for instance?—Yes, for the period.

46,472. And if he is looking up the letter P he has to look up all the P's?—No, not all the P's; there is a sub-division.

46,473. That could be obviated by some card indexing arrangement?—It was considered a few years ago at the time smaller divisions were made in the calendar, and it was thought that it would not work so well.

46,474. Your clerks come into the office at 100*l.* a year, and proceed by process of seniority, subject to efficiency, up to 600*l.* a year?—They do not all succeed in getting up to 600*l.* a year, because there are only five first class places, and they cannot all get there.

46,475. But it is a process of seniority, subject to efficiency?—They have a chance.

46,476. Work paid for at 600*l.* a year ought to be very high class work?—It is an average salary for what is called first class work.

46,477. Is the work, in fact, first class work?—I think so.

46,478. Do you think it is a good arrangement to recruit a man at 100*l.* a year and let him go up after very many years to 600*l.* a year for first class work. You are familiar with the custom in the Civil Service by which in other offices men are from the beginning recruited for different types of work. Would that be possible in your office?—That means by constituting a lower division?

46,479. Yes?—It is so difficult to carry it out. If one could have started with the idea that one had a lower division for a certain portion of the work it might be done, but it is very difficult to carry it out now.

46,480. As to the district registrars, there are a certain number of district registrars who are full-time officers?—Yes.

46,481. It would be perfectly easy to move them from the towns in which they now are to other larger and more convenient towns simply by the direction of the authorities?—If there is to be any alteration of the districts in any way there would have to be statutory authority. The divisions are laid down by statute.

46,482. If a statute were passed empowering a certain authority to make such a rearrangement, there could be no question of compensation in moving a whole-time man from one post to another?—I do not know, I cannot say whether any question of compensation would arise or not.

46,483. Finally, as to the scriveners, can you conceive an arrangement by which there was a fixed nucleus of established scriveners based upon the normal amount of work, but added to in times of stress by extra people taken in temporarily?—I think it is better that the staff should be elastic.

46,484. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) You told Mr. Wallas that you were acting more or less as senior registrar at present?—Yes.

46,485. Is that because the senior registrar is not in constant attendance at the office?—No, it is not for that reason. I have been a long time in the department, and the senior registrar, although he is well acquainted with the practice of the court—he was a barrister in our court—has not had so much knowledge of the departmental work, and since he has been the senior registrar he has practically left the greater part of it to me.

46,486. That is to say, he is not competent to discharge the duties which previously were considered to be part of the work of the senior registrar?—I should not like to say not competent, but he has practically left it to me and I have done it, and I have always seen the President on any question arising.

46,487. You are aware of the rule that applies generally in the Civil Service of compulsory retirement after 40 years' service or after a certain age?—Yes.

46,488. That does not appear to apply to your department?—It does not apply to any of the legal departments. Where it has been applied in some of the other branches it is not applied to people in the position of registrars.

46,489. Can you give us any reason why it should be general throughout the Civil Service and your department should be exempt from the rule?—I cannot give you any reason at all.

46,490. You are aware that you have amongst the principal clerks men who have had more than 50 years' service in the department?—We have not very many. Of the principal clerks of Seats, I think there are two over 65.

46,491. And one second class clerk who has had 50 years' service?—I think he is dead now.

46,492. You said that a clerk must enter in the third class, and that you cannot make appointments direct to the second or first class. Is it possible to make appointments direct to posts above first class clerkships?—The appointments of registrars are open to persons who are qualified in accordance with the statute. Barristers, solicitors, or clerks of the principal registry who have served five years can be appointed.

46,493. There is a registrar whose name appears in the list below yours, who was appointed in 1903—12 years ago. Was he appointed directly to that position?—He was before that a district registrar at Norwich; he never was in the office. He was a barrister in our court. He was the son of Mr. Inderwick, K.C., and then he was appointed district registrar at Norwich, and, when there was a vacancy up here, he was appointed registrar here.

46,494. You told us that the clerks to the district registrars were not competent to go to the head office as clerks there. You consider it is competent for district registrars to go to the head office?—I do not know that a district registrar as such would have the qualification if he had not been a barrister. This one was a barrister, and that is a qualification for appointment either as district registrar or principal registrar.

46,495. You told Mr. Coward that the increment of salary was given without evidence of efficiency on the part of the recipient?—That is so, but there have been cases where there have been complaints of people, and the increment has been stopped for a year or two if it has been thought that a clerk is not deserving of it.

46,496. Have not you to supply a certificate each year before the increment can be granted?—No.

46,497. Looking through the list I see there are cases where clerks in the third class have a greater length of service than clerks in the second class, so would it be fair to assume from that that the promotion of those clerks has been arrested because they were not considered competent to pass to the higher grade?—I do not think so. I do not think there are any cases now.

46,498. (Chairman.) Is it not the case that the former copyists, who were appointed third class clerks, are not eligible for promotion?—Not beyond the third class. The top one is not eligible for promotion, and as I pointed out the other day the next senior did not want to be promoted.

46,499. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Supposing a young fellow had a desire to become a third class clerk in your department, how would he proceed to get such an appointment?—He would ask to be put on the list of candidates which the President has, and he would be asked to produce references, and then when vacancies occur the list of candidates is considered by the President.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,500. Is there any qualifying examination?—Yes; a qualifying examination. They are nominated, and then go to the Civil Service Commissioners.

46,501. Is it necessary that they should have experience in a solicitor's office or anything of that sort?—No.

46,502. The clerks to the district registrars are really private clerks of the registrars paid out of the public money?—Yes, they are paid out of public money.

46,503. But they are really appointed by the district registrars?—With the approval of the President.

46,504. Although they are paid out of public money, in the smaller district registries, I understand, if the registrar be a solicitor, they do some part of his private work also?—I do not think there is so much of that done now as there used to be. It used to be done frequently, because there were a great number of solicitors who sometimes had the registry and their office all in one.

46,505. Is there any district registry where the number of clerks is less than two?—No.

46,506. Could you say what the salaries of those clerks are, or is there something like a fixed scale?—It depends upon the scale of the registry and the number of grants in the registry. Take a registry with 600 to 900 grants. There would be four clerks—the chief clerk getting 200*l.*—that means the maximum salary (it may be slightly less), the second 150*l.*, the third 100*l.*, and the fourth 80*l.*

46,507. With regard to the amount of work that there is in some of these district registries, the case of Chichester was mentioned?—That is the smallest registry.

46,508. Where the number of grants is less than 300 and there, I assume, they have two clerks and the registrar?—Yes.

46,509. Is the amount of work that these three persons would have to do equal to the amount of work that would be expected from three clerks in your Central Office?—It is so difficult to say, because three clerks in our office would be engaged on a particular branch of work. There would be a mass of work of which they would take their own share. Here, although there are a very few grants, they have to do omnium gatherum work of all different kinds. You cannot compare it with the ordinary work of three clerks in the principal registry.

46,510. But with an average of one grant a day, do you mean to leave the impression on our minds that there is work that justifies the employment and payment of two clerks and a registrar?—The difficulty is that if it is kept as a separate registry, I do not think you could do without two clerks. You could not do all the copying work and the other work and see people with one clerk. Time is taken up with interviewing people, although there may be only one grant. People come to order copies of wills.

46,511. Going back to the question of the appointment of the third class clerks, you told us that it is not essential that they should have legal knowledge. What objection can there be, therefore, to recruiting them in the way clerks are generally recruited in the Civil Service, that is, by means of an open competitive examination?—I have said, according to my view, that if there was open competition and not a very high standard of examination, which there probably would not be for our department, we should get a lower class of clerk than we do now.

46,512. What reason have you to suppose that?—Because the people who come in now are capable of learning higher work, and they are gentlemen, and they are a fair standard and type of men. If it is simply by open competition, all the better class men will go in for the higher examination places.

46,513. From what class are your clerks drawn?—A great many of them have been to universities. We have seven of our clerks who happen to be barristers. We have two or three who have passed as solicitors.

46,514. And they go into your service as third class clerks at 100*l.* a year—barristers and solicitors?—Yes. I do not say there are many barristers. We have seven at present.

46,515. Were they qualified as solicitors and barristers when they entered as third class clerks?—Some of them, and some have passed the examinations since.

46,516. Are you aware that the intermediate class of clerks, to whom reference has been made by a member of the Commission, have to pass a rather severe examination; they are lads who have been to public schools?—I do not understand the intermediate class.

46,517. There is in certain departments—at Somerset House in the Estate Duty Office, for instance—a class of clerk called the intermediate class?—That I do not know anything about.

46,518. They are paid 100*l.* a year, and they pass a fairly severe examination. Do you say you know nothing about them?—I do not know them.

46,519. Therefore you would not be able to say how they would compare with the kind of men you get. Who nominates or makes the appointments to the Scrivenery Department?—They are not actually appointments; they are employed with the approval of the senior registrar, and they are selected either by the head of the Scrivenery Department or record keeper, as a rule.

46,520. What salary will the head of the Scrivenery Department have, and what is his rank in the service?—The head of the Scrivenery Department is a second class clerk. He does not appoint. It is a question of recommending typists, and they are engaged, and if they give satisfaction they remain. It is only a temporary appointment.

46,521. Then this second class clerk has this amount of patronage?—You can hardly call it patronage. He comes in the way of knowing a lot of typists.

46,522. (Chairman.) There is one point I omitted when you were dealing with the district registries. Are the clerks to the district registrars eligible for appointment as district registrars?—No.

46,523. Do you consider that they ought to be eligible?—I think not. At the present moment they are a different stamp and different class altogether.

46,524. Is not the work which they do similar to the work done by the clerks in the principal registry?—Not in the same way, because no grant could issue in the district registries without the notice of application for the grant being sent to the principal registry. Everything that is done there is checked in the principal registry.

46,525. But in the larger registries at any rate they must do practically the whole of the work that is done in the principal registry?—A good deal of similar work.

46,526. You consider that work done in the principal registry qualifies the clerks for appointment as district registrars, but you do not consider that similar work done in the district registry qualifies them?—I do not say that one or two chief clerks may not be competent to become district registrars, but the class of district registrars' clerks, as a whole, is not such as to qualify them to be district registrars.

46,527. You would be in favour of maintaining the present position?—Certainly, unless the whole system is altered.

46,528. (Sir John Kempe.) Do you happen to know how the numbers of the different classes of your clerks were originally arranged with the Treasury?—There have been different organisations. There was an organisation in 1882 and a fixed number of first, second, and third class was arranged, and the classification was made to assimilate to the classes in the Central Office, with the exception that there were special places for clerks of the Seats, as being outside that classification. On later reorganisation questions, some of the clerks of the third class were reduced.

24 February 1915.]

Mr. ALFRED MUSGRAVE.

46,529. The classification has little or no reference to duties in fact?—It was all worked out on the basis of duties at the time the numbers were fixed.

46,530. It is not a mere ladder of promotion?—No. There was a report upon the duties when matters were considered, and certain places were considered to be entitled to certain classes, but they were not absolutely fixed. It was arranged that the clerks were to be interchangeable.

46,531. You said earlier in your evidence that there was hardly any difference between the second and third class duties?—In some cases; I do not say all. There are some third class duties and some second class duties which are not very different.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 25th February 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK.

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.

Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. RICHARD DURNING HOLT, M.P.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. LAURENCE CHURTON COLLINS and Mr. ERNEST WILLIAM LEADER (third class clerks, Principal Probate Registry), called and examined.

46,532. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Collins.) You appear as representing the third class clerks in the principal Probate Registry?—Yes.

46,533. What is the number of the clerks in the registry?—103.

46,534. How many of those are third class clerks?—64.

46,535. Are all those 64 eligible for promotion?—No, only 54.

46,536. The remaining 10 being the old copying clerks who were appointed without any right to promotion?—Quite so.

46,537. The age for entry is between 20 and 30, I think?—Yes.

46,538. And the salary of the third class is from 100*l.*, rising by annual increments of 10*l.*, to 200*l.*?—Yes.

46,539. How is promotion made from the third class to the second class?—Almost invariably by seniority.

46,540. Have there been any cases in which promotion was made, not by seniority but by selection?—Yes, there have been cases now and again.

46,541. Are those cases of a particular man being passed over or of an exceptionally good man being selected from somewhere below the head of the list?—Generally the man passed over was not qualified for that particular work of the department where the vacancy occurred.

46,542. That is to say, it was a special promotion on the ground of the particular work that had to be done by the second class man rather than on the outstanding merits of the clerk who was promoted?—Yes.

46,543. So that normally, you may say, seniority is followed in promotion?—Yes, normally, it is by seniority.

46,544. What is the average rate of promotion?—The last five years it has been 1·2.

46,545. And for the last ten years?—2·3.

46,546. And for the last 20 years?—2·7.

46,547. And the number of promotions in different years is very irregular, is it not?—Very.

46,548. From the figures you have put before us I see that in one year, 1905, there were eight promotions and three appointments to district registrarships out of the third class?—That is so.

46,549. Whereas in certain other years there has been only one promotion and no appointment to a district registrarship?—Yes.

46,550. So that the incidence of promotion is very uneven?—That is so.

46,551. What is the present length of service of the men at the head of the third class?—The head of the third class has been in the Service 16 years in May next.

46,552. That is to say, between 15 and 16 years?—Yes.

46,553. At what age were these men appointed?—At the age of 20—not necessarily at the minimum age of 20, as some, of course, may have come in at a later age than 20. Speaking for myself, I came in at the age of 21.

46,554. So that the men at the top of the third class would be of ages varying from 36 to 45?—Yes. Mr. Leader, for instance, did not come in until he was at the age of 25.

46,555. Have a considerable proportion of the third class clerks now reached their maximum salary?—Yes; no less than 25 will have reached their maximum on 7th March.

46,556. That is to say, there are 25 who have ten years' service or more?—Yes.

46,557. You represent that the rate of promotion is unduly slow?—Yes, unduly slow. That is our grievance.

46,558. What remedies do you suggest?—I think the remedy we most seek is superannuation, that is, that those men who have done 40 years' service, and are over 60, should be compulsorily retired. Although we see that will react on ourselves when the time comes, at any rate we would rather have it like that, because we should move up quicker when we are young.

46,559. You would be in favour of the application of a rule of that nature?—Most decidedly.

46,560. The rule which applies in the Civil Service generally is that a man may retire at 60 and must retire at 65, and may be called upon by the head of his department to retire at any time between 60 and 65?—Yes.

46,561. You speak of a rule of retirement after 40 years' service. I am not aware that any rule to that effect exists formally in the Civil Service, although it may possibly be the practice in some departments to allow men to remain until they have served 40 years. Is not that the case?—Yes, that is so, I think.

46,562. You would advocate the application of the general Civil Service rule to this department?—Yes, we should be quite satisfied, I think, with that application of the general rule to our department.

46,563. Do you consider that that would be advantageous on general grounds as well as from the point

25 February 1915.]

Mr. LAURENCE CHURTON COLLINS and Mr. ERNEST
WILLIAM LEADER.

of view of promotion?—I think it would, as a rule. There may be cases where it would not be, perhaps, altogether advantageous. For instance, it is advantageous when men have got to a certain class where, by remaining longer, they will never get any higher than that particular class they are in.

46,564. Do you think the performance of the work would suffer if the Civil Service rules as to retirement were applied?—I do not think it would.

46,565. And might it even in some cases be improved?—Yes, improved.

46,566. Have you also any representation to make with regard to appointments to district registrarships?—Of course our feeling is that as we are particularly qualified for the work, and we are really the only people who have had a special training for the work of the district registries, we should certainly have, at any rate, a larger proportion of them than have been generally allotted to us.

46,567. During the last 10 years the proportion given to clerks in the principal registry has been smaller than in the preceding 10 years?—Yes.

46,568. Do you know what the reason of that is?—It lies entirely with the President as to whom the district registry will be given to.

46,569. It is a matter that entirely depends on the personal views of the President?—Exactly.

46,570. It is not due to any difference in the character of the appointments that have fallen vacant in those years?—No.

46,571. You say you yourself were appointed at the age of 20?—21.

46,572. What had been your experience before you were appointed?—I was at Balliol College for six months, and then my father and I talked the matter over, and it was decided that it would be better for me, if I went into the Civil Service, to start early. At first I was going in for the ordinary Home Civil Service, and, finally, some one recommended the Probate Registry, and said: "As he is young, he can go in earlier," and I got a nomination for the Probate Registry. I went in at the age of 21.

46,573. Then you went straight from Balliol without waiting to take your degree?—Yes.

46,574. That being the case, you had not any experience in a solicitor's office before being appointed?—No; but Mr. Leader had.

46,575. (To Mr. Leader.) What was your age on appointment?—I was 25 when I was appointed.

46,576. What had been your previous experience?—I was articled to Mr. Herbert Oldfield, a solicitor, and passed my final examination in 1895. I had nearly five years' experience as a solicitor.

46,577. (Mr. Coward.) In serving your articles?—In addition to the time of my articles.

46,578. (Chairman.) Did you find, when you came into the office, that your experience in the solicitor's office was of value to you?—I think I may say it has been of very great value to me.

46,579. As regards experience of law in general, or for the particular work you had to do in the office?—I think, as far as legal training goes, one has a certain outlook on things that, I think, is not usually the case. I had also a certain amount of probate experience in the office in which I was, which was of assistance.

46,580. Then it is more a question of attitude of mind and general outlook than the particular knowledge that you acquired, that you found valuable?—Yes, the training of the mind, I think.

46,581. Would you have had any difficulty in learning the work of the office if you had not had experience in a solicitor's office?—In the office you start from the beginning, and there are numbers of cases that occur in the office that are brought to one's notice which you never get in a solicitor's office. For instance, I was 10 years in a solicitor's office, and the grants that we have frequently in the registry I had never heard of in that time.

46,582. By that you imply that there is a considerable amount of the more difficult work in the Probate Registry which you had never come across in the ordinary work of a solicitor's office?—Yes.

46,583. That work you have to learn, anyhow, after you enter the office?—Yes, you have to learn; but when reading for the solicitor's final examination you have to cover the whole law of the country, and you read from the text books about the various kinds of grants, although you never in practice have them.

46,584. (To Mr. Collins.) Did you find any difficulty in learning the work of the office, although you had not been in a solicitor's office?—No, I cannot say I did, although I quite understand, according to Mr. Leader, that you get a legal way of looking at things probably which you do not get at once in the office. In the office we have to begin at the beginning and learn step by step, until we get a thorough knowledge of probate, of course, and nothing else.

46,585. Did you find yourself at a disadvantage, as compared with your colleagues, from not having had legal experience?—No, I cannot say I have found any disadvantage.

46,586. (Mr. Holt.) You told us that you considered you had some special claim to appointment to district registrarships. Are there no clerks in the district registries?—(Mr. Leader.) They have a staff in the district registries, yes.

46,587. Would not their staff have a natural claim to the district registrarships?—I do not think that is a question that really affects a third class clerk in the principal registry. I know nothing whatever of the rules under which the clerks in district registries enter the service, whether by nomination or whether they are simply appointed by the district registrars as ordinary clerks.

46,588. Are the clerks in the principal registry practically all Londoners?—Do you mean where we spring from?

46,589. Yes?—I do not think so. I think many of the men came from various parts of the country.

46,590. When you came in was there any advertisement of the vacant position?—I had the pleasure of knowing Sir Francis Jeune, and he told me that he thought I should do well in the office. He gave me a nomination to the office, and when there was a vacancy I was informed of it and went up for examination, and was appointed to the office when the vacancy fell due.

46,591. Then you heard of it through private friends?—Entirely.

46,592. (To Mr. Collins.) Does the same apply to you?—The same applies to me. It is not a competitive office; the examination is not competitive. The entrance is entirely by nomination from the President, and the examination fee is one of the highest paid, I believe—6*l*.

46,593. Then the whole of the introduction to the office really depends upon getting information through private friends, and having it brought to your notice by private friends?—I think so entirely. There is no competition.

46,594. And a person who had not private friends would probably not know anything about it?—Probably not.

46,595. When you applied for this situation, what was the ultimate goal of your ambition?—I suppose the same that everyone else has.

46,596. What is that—to be registrar?—Registrarships have been given in the office, but they are very rare indeed; but I think the ultimate goal of one's ambition is to be principal clerk of Seat. That is the highest position that is open to the ordinary person in the office.

46,597. That is what you considered your prospects?—Yes.

46,598. (Mr. Boutwood.) In the last paragraph of your memorial you speak of a memorial to the President of the Probate Division. What was the answer to that memorial? What did the President say?—I think he merely acknowledged the receipt of the proposal, and made no remark on it.

46,599. Tell me something, if you can, about the clerks who have been sent to the district registries. Apparently the salaries in those district registries run from 200*l*. to 1,200*l*. What sort of registry is it that one of your third class clerks goes to?—Out of the last ten appointments which the President has had at his disposal four have been given to clerks in the office.

46,600. What registries were they?—One is Northampton.

46,601. What is the salary there?—A salary of 250*l.*, and it was commonly known that there was a difficulty in the President disposing of that registry at all. It was practically hawked round, because only barristers and solicitors and clerks in the office are eligible, and finally a clerk was asked to accept it, and he did. In regard to the other registries, Mr. Nepean went to Bristol.

46,602. What is the salary at Bristol?—Bristol is worth 600*l.* (Mr. Leader.) Mr. Nepean was not a third class clerk. At that time he was well on in the second class.

46,603. What were the other two?—(Mr. Collins.) Wakefield went to Mr. Thomson, who is a son of the late Archbishop, and he also was in the office; and Carlisle went to Mr. Hunt.

46,605. What was Mr. Thomson's position in the office when he went to Wakefield?—First he went to York, and then he was transferred. He was a second class clerk. Mr. Hunt, who went to Carlisle, was a principal clerk of Seat.

46,606. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Who was his father?—(Mr. Leader.) I have no knowledge at all.

46,607. (Mr. Boutwood.) (To Mr. Collins.) Did you pass an examination?—Yes, I passed a qualifying examination, as it is called.

46,608. The usual examination?—Yes.

46,609. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Are either of you, Mr. Collins or Mr. Leader, registrar's clerks?—(Mr. Leader.) Neither of us. We are both clerks at the Seats.

46,610. Have you ever been registrar's clerks?—No.

46,611. (To Mr. Collins.) During the last month have you seen Mr. Registrar Pritchard?—Yes, I have.

46,612. Do you remember when?—Last week, I think.

46,613. In your representation you say that one President persuaded certain old men to retire. What President was that?—Sir Francis Jeune did, I remember, just before I came in. That was a year when I think there were nine retirements.

46,614. You say, "The improvement which has taken place latterly has been due in part to the resignation of a number of quite young men, partly to one President having persuaded several old men to retire." That must have occurred latterly. When was that?—I do not remember a case. Is that in our memorial?

46,615. The words in the memorial signed by G. W. M. Baker, Henry F. O. Norbury, L. C. Collins, James Chapman, Harold Bostock, and Ralph A. Cameron, are: "The improvement which has taken place latterly has been due in part to the resignation of a number of quite young men, partly to one President having persuaded several old men to retire."—That would be in 1905, when there were a few old men who were invited to retire.

46,616. In what part of the office were those old men?—One was in the Searchers' Department.

46,617. What was his rank in the office?—He was in the second class after 47 years' service, with no prospect of getting any higher. Mr. Neville was also a second class clerk with 43 years' service, and Mr. Ryves was a second class clerk, and he retired after 39 years' service.

46,618. You say the President persuaded them. In your opinion, did it depend entirely upon their own decision whether they went or not?—Yes, I think it did.

46,619. (To Mr. Leader.) And is that your opinion?—Yes.

46,620. (To Mr. Collins.) You were at Balliol?—Yes.

46,621. While at Balliol did you sit for Responsions?—No, because I had already passed the Oxford and Cambridge Higher Certificate.

46,622. Did you sit for any examination at Balliol?—Yes, the Entrance Examination for Balliol.

46,623. During your period at Balliol did you sit for any examination?—No, I sat for no examination.

46,624. When you left Balliol did you go at once into the Probate Office?—No, I went to Scoones' first.

46,625. Did you do any paid work in London between the period at which you left Balliol and the period at which you entered the Probate Office?—Yes, I took a tutorship for a few months. That is all.

46,626. Then you did not leave Balliol to go into the Probate Registry?—No, I did not. I left Balliol to go into the Home Civil Service, and then Mr. Scoones said, "He is too young for that." I was but a year at Mr. Scoones', and finally he suggested to my father the Probate Office.

46,627. (Mr. Holt.) What part of the Home Civil Service were you intending to go into?—The ordinary open competition.

46,628. Class I.?—Class I.

46,629. And you left Balliol in order to qualify for that?—Yes.

46,630. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) When any one of you is late in the morning, that fact is recorded in a time-book?—It should be. We have an attendance-book, and we sign at the time we arrive.

46,631. Why do you say "should be" instead of "is"?—Because 10 minutes is a sort of latitude allowed.

46,632. Still you sign?—Yes, still we sign.

46,633. What do you sign, then?—If we are up to 10.10 we sign as 10.

46,634. (To Mr. Leader.) Is that also your practice?—I believe that is the rule in all Civil Service offices.

46,635. (To Mr. Collins.) If you are after 10.10 a.m., what do you sign?—We sign the time we actually arrive.

46,636. Have you yourself during the last month, or say, since Christmas, signed any time later than 10?—No, I do not think I have been later.

46,637. (To Mr. Leader.) Have you?—I have not been late at all.

46,638. What happens if any clerk does sign a later time than 10 o'clock?—The book is usually taken to the registrar at certain periods, when the times are officially looked through.

46,639. What happens then?—I do not know.

46,640. (To Mr. Collins.) Who is the registrar out of the four registrars to whom it is taken?—I think any registrar may ask to see the attendance-book.

46,641. Mr. Leader tells me that the attendance-book is taken regularly as a matter of routine to the registrar. Which registrar is that?—(Mr. Leader.) I should correct myself. There is a senior registrar's clerk, and he has the book taken to his room. We colloquially say it is taken "to the registrar."

46,642. He is Mr. Pritchard's clerk?—Yes, Dr. Pritchard's senior clerk.

46,643. The book is taken to Dr. Pritchard's senior clerk, and can you recall any instance in which anything happened because that book was taken to Dr. Pritchard's senior clerk?—(Mr. Collins.) We can only judge by our own department.

46,644. In your department can you recall any further action being taken?—No further action has been taken. I suppose it has not been thought necessary.

46,645. Then it is not taken to Mr. Musgrave's clerk?—We really do not know to whom it is taken. (Mr. Leader.) The messenger collects the book.

46,646. (Mr. Coward to Mr. Collins.) I see that you have 64 third class clerks?—Yes.

46,647. I suppose most of you do different sorts of work, or do you do the same work?—Mostly different work.

46,648. Will you tell me what you do. For instance, you are supposed to be there at 10 in the morning?—Yes.

46,649. Will you give me an account of your day's work. Take yourself?—We —

46,650. Not "we," but "I"?—In my room I vary the work as much as possible, so that each man has different work to do every week.

46,651. I am just asking you to be kind enough to tell us what your work is. When you go in there at 10 o'clock in the morning what do you do?—I may tell you that my work this week will be different from what I will be doing next week.

46,652. Let us have your work this week?—When I arrive, there is a basket that contains all the letters that come from the district registries—applications for grants from those registries.

46,653. With the wills?—Sometimes with the wills, sometimes not; it depends on the nature of the case. If it is a very simple case the will is not sent, but the will is quoted.

46,654. That is to say, the name of the deceased, the names of the executors, and then you grant the probate upon that?—Exactly.

46,655. And the amount, I suppose?—No; the amount is not given, but the names of the executors, the appointment of the executors in the will, and the names of the people who are applying are given. Those are opened and looked through, and, if quite correct, they are passed, and a certificate is written stating that the case has been searched, that is to say, that no other application has been received at the principal registry or nobody is making one at the principal registry for that particular grant. That is searched by the searchers upstairs, who look through the books to see that there is no other application.

46,656. Who does that? I am asking you about yourself. If you could tell me what you yourself do, and how you do it, I shall be glad?—I write the certificate for this, stating that the case has been searched and no other application has been made.

46,657. But you have found out from the work of other clerks that that has been done?—Exactly.

46,658. You are not telling me very accurately what you do. I want to know whether I can get from you exactly what you do?—I thought I told you that they were searched by other clerks to see that no other grant had been made, and I myself write out the certificate stating that these names have been searched and no other grant has been made. Then those are put into envelopes and sent to the district registries.

46,659. (Mr. Holt.) Do you sign the certificate?—No; I do not. The certificates are not signed.

46,660. (Mr. Coward.) It is a mere memorandum?—Yes, it is a mere memorandum.

46,661. That there is no other application for probate?—Yes.

46,662. And that all is in order?—That all is in order. Then these entries are looked over by the principal clerks of Seats, and if anything is wrong with them they make a memorandum, the certificate is not sent, and the mistake or error or omission is corrected.

46,663. But if you are competent for this work and have looked over it, what does it want another eye over it for?—I do not look over these particular entries.

46,664. I have not found out from you what you do except that apparently you open these envelopes, tell somebody else to do this searching work, and you make a memorandum that it has been done. Is that about it?—Yes.

46,665. That must require long education?—That is as far as the country notices are concerned, but that is only by-work; it is not the actual work we do.

46,666. Then let us come to the actual work?—Now we get to the work that comes in for the day; that is, applications for grants.

46,667. Will you kindly confine it to yourself?—Yes. There are applications coming in for grants at the principal registry. There is a document called the Oath, and the fee sheet showing that the fees have been paid, and the will, and the Inland Revenue Affidavit. These cases are entered into a book.

46,668. Just pausing there, the solicitor's clerk who knows his business brings you these things and has them all arranged for you in apple-pie order?—Exactly.

46,669. Now will you go on with what you do?—We make a note of those cases in a book. I make a note of those cases in the book, and I write it down.

46,670. The name of the solicitors, and the name of the applicants. Is that right?—The name of the deceased—not the name of the applicants—where the residence of the deceased is, and the date of death.

46,671. In columns in a book?—Yes, in columns in a book. Then the case is sent to the principal clerk of seats.

46,672. Is your work with that done then?—Just temporarily. He looks over it, and if he considers that the grant can be written the cases come back from him certified that they are correct and can be written, and then I write out the grant; and on the grant is written the name of the deceased, the place of residence, the place of death, whether there is a will and one codicil or a will and two codicils, the names of the executors, the amount, the name of the solicitors, and the date. The engrossment of the will is then affixed to this, which is called the grant, and that is a grant finished.

46,673. The grant is on a printed form?—Yes.

46,674. And you fill up the blanks?—Yes. Then in addition to that there is a memorandum, and an exact duplicate of the grant is made with the addition of the addresses of the executors.

46,675. Do you do that?—I do that, and that is called the "Act." In addition to that there is what is called a calendar slip, which is another concise description of the Act, not so much in full but abbreviated for the purposes of the calendars when they are sent to be printed at the end of the year. In addition to that I put on the actual will itself the details—that probate of this will was granted to such and such a person.

46,676. Is that your work, may I take it?—You may take it that that is an example of my work.

46,677. Do you think that there is anything you have told us that any intelligent man of 25 could not do after one day's work? Could not you show me how to do all that you have said that I should have to do in that office in a day?—Yes, that is so. I have given you an instance of the simplest kind of case. Now there are many cases which are very complicated. That is the simplest case you can have.

46,678. That is your ordinary day's work?—That is the simplest kind of case, but now you can have a case which is very complicated.

46,679. I have no doubt that when you have a complicated case you would go to the registrar or somebody and ask him what to do?—No, we are there to learn complicated cases. It is true we must have a knowledge of a simple case, but when it comes to complications that is work which can only be done after being there for years. I have been for 10 years at the Seat, and even now I can be puzzled by a case.

46,680. Yes, I can understand it. Your hours of work are 10 to 4?—Yes.

46,681. And one hour for lunch?—No, half an hour is generally as much as one can get.

46,682. Really?—I very rarely take more than half an hour.

46,683. And you are back at work at the expiration of the half-hour?—Yes, half an hour.

46,684. With regard to vacation, how long do you get in vacation?—We get six weeks' leave.

46,685. And at Christmas?—We get Christmas and Boxing Day.

46,686. The 21 days?—Not 21 days.

46,687. And 10 days at Easter?—No, we get six weeks in all, and two days at Christmas.

46,688. And at Easter?—Two days at Easter.

46,689. Yours is an office that works more than many of them—more than the Central Office through the Vacation?—We do work right through the Vacation? (Mr. Leader.) We have no short hours except during the Long Vacation, I think that is what you mean?

46,690. (Sir John Kempe.) I see in the memorial from the Central Office of the Supreme Court the second and third class clerks say that their salaries are fixed on a lower scale for work of equal importance to that of other departments of the State. Do you make the same claim. Do you consider that your work is on an equality with the work of the Central Office of the Supreme Court?—(Mr. Collins.) Yes, as far as I know, but I do not know what their work is.

46,691. Then you cannot tell me what they are comparing their work with?—No, I do not know at all.

25 February 1915.]

MR. LAURENCE CHURTON COLLINS and Mr. ERNEST
WILLIAM LEADER.

46,692. Nor can you tell me in comparison with what class of clerk they consider they are more lowly paid?—No, I have no idea.

46,693. You entered upon your clerkship by nomination and not by competition?—By nomination.

46,694. Do you consider that, having entered the office by nomination only, you have as much claim as those who have entered by open competition—I mean as much claim to all the rights of the Civil Service, so to speak. It is a common argument among Civil servants that those who enter by open competition have earned a claim to all the rights of the Civil Service. You would not go so far as that?—No, I do not think I would.

46,695. You entered by no competition?—We had a qualifying examination.

46,696. A very simple one—less than the lower division?—Yes. I have not heard that argument advanced, so I hardly know what to say to it.

46,697. Still, primâ facie, you have not earned the rights of Civil servants in the same way that the general Civil servants have earned theirs—they have had long training for examination, and so on. You simply come in by nomination, and you step into a salary for the work which you do. However, you make no claim on that point?—No.

46,698. The numbers in your office of first, second, and third class clerks, in comparison with the ordinary Civil Service classes, give a very good prospect of promotion—a better prospect of promotion than to the ordinary Civil servant. I suppose you are longer waiting for promotion because there is no compulsory retirement?—Quite so.

46,699. If you had compulsory retirement you would have a better prospect of promotion than the rest of the Civil Service practically?—No, not better than the rest of the Civil Service.

46,700. Better than many of the departments of the Civil Service. The proportion of your first and second class to your third class is much higher than in the majority of offices in the Civil Service; you have rather more than one to two. Perhaps that you have not gone into?—We claim there is a disproportion in the second and third classes as compared with the Central Office.

46,701. You take second and third together as against the first; but I am speaking of the third class only?—Yes, of the third class only, as against the second.

46,702. (Mr. Matheson.) Are there any people in the third class who have taken their degrees at the Universities?—Yes.

46,703. Can you tell me at all what proportion?—Roughly about 10.

46,704. Are there any who have a solicitor's qualification?—Yes. Mr. Leader has a solicitor's qualification. We also have barristers.

46,705. I gather from an attendance book (which I have looked at) that in the Long Vacation some clerks do not attend for more than about three or four hours?—(Mr. Leader.) I do not know what they do in other parts of the office, but our hours during the Long Vacation are practically the same as at ordinary times. We are short-handed during the Long Vacation because most of the men have to take their leave during that time, and we have to be there at 10 o'clock, and usually are there until 4 o'clock or after.

46,706. (Chairman.) Which branch of the office are you in?—The Seats. (Mr. Collins.) Might I say that we have a certain amount of work to do every day which has to be kept up to date.

46,707. (Mr. Holt.) What are your views as to the conditions under which you can be got rid of? Do you consider that you have, so to speak, a freehold for life? (Mr. Leader.) Do you mean as things are at present?

46,708. Yes, as things are at present?—That is what we are trying to have altered. We want to put our case before you that we should all benefit by compulsory retirement.

46,709. Is it your view at present that nobody has any power to turn you out if you do not choose to go?—I really do not know what the powers of the President are. I believe the only power of turning anyone out is if they are guilty of misconduct.

46,710. That is, as long as you do not do anything criminal, nobody has a right to send you away. Is that your view of the position?—That is my personal view. I should not like it to be taken as evidence, because I have not any knowledge of the subject. (Mr. Collins.) That is my view, too, as far as one's knowledge goes.

46,711. Therefore, if any one of you at the age of about 90 were to find it very difficult to get down to the office at all, it would be a great act of grace on your part to retire?—It would be so looked upon by our juniors.

46,712. As an act of grace?—Yes.

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER, recalled and further examined.

Witness: I should like to make an addition to my answer to a question which the Chairman put to me last time. The suggestion was that none of the principal clerks now had any right to succession, and I said they had no right to succession; but I want to make this addition: Though it is a fact that the principal clerks in the office have no right to succession, there is not the slightest doubt that those who were qualified under the Act came into the office on a tacit understanding that they would in due course succeed to the registrarship. I wanted to make that quite clear.

46,713. (Chairman.) You are of opinion that they came in with that tacit understanding, but not with a statutory right?—I do not say that they have not a statutory right. The registrars must, under the Act, be appointed from among the principal clerks, and though the principal clerks now in the office came in with no right of succession reserved to them, still they came in, as I say, on a tacit understanding that if they were qualified under the Act they should succeed to the registrarship.

46,714. I will read you a paragraph from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie's memorandum prepared for the Chancery Registrars' Committee, and ask you whether you consider that that correctly states the position: "There is at this moment only one of the principal clerks with the statutory right of succession to a registrarship"—this was prepared for the Committee which sat in 1907—"five others have been appointed with notice that they have no vested right "of succession; three others have been appointed simply "as second class clerks in the Supreme Court, and have "no better rights than any other clerks in the Chancery "Division, except the advantage and opportunity which "any of them has of showing himself to be a desirable "man to retain and promote in the department." Is that a correct statement of the position at that time?—I think that was a correct statement, with this proviso, that I think the clerks coming in came in on the understanding that they would succeed. I think that is the way they understood it.

46,715. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) They understood that?—They understood that.

46,716. (Chairman.) But it is stated that five of the principal clerks had notice that they had no vested rights to succession?—They had no right to succession. They had notice of the fact that they had no statutory right of succession. That was abrogated.

46,717. But you consider, that though they have no statutory right of succession, they had an expectation of succession?—I think they had a tacit understanding that they should succeed, and they came in with that idea, and I can certainly say for one—my own clerk—that he certainly would not have come in unless he had thought he would succeed to the registrarship on that understanding.

46,718. (Mr. Boutwood.) As I understand it, the registrars are required to be clerks in the registry, and there is a statutory qualification for registrarship?—Yes; clerks in the registrar's office.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

46,719. Then Sir Kenneth spoke about one principal clerk with a statutory right?—He had at that time.

46,720. What was the Statute?—5 Victoria, chapter 5.

46,721. What does that say?—“On the death, resignation, promotion, or removal of a junior registrar for the time being the vacancy thereby occasioned shall be filled up by the senior of the clerks to the registrars for the time being, to whom no sufficient objection to the satisfaction of the Lord Chancellor shall be made.”

46,722. Is that still effective, or has that been repealed?—It has never been repealed.

46,723. How is it, then, that these five have not got the right which comes under that section? Who took it away from them?—That has always been a puzzle to me.

46,724. What was the authority that could override those enacted words?—I should say none whatever.

46,725. Who purported to do it? Who gave these five men notice that they had no right?—It was done by the Lord Chancellor at the time, on the advice of Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie.

46,726. (Mr. Holt.) Who was the Lord Chancellor at the time?—That would be in the year when Mr. Jolly was appointed.

46,727. (Chairman.) Those appointments have been made at various times, I think; so they probably were made under several different Lord Chancellors?—I am looking for the date of Mr. Jolly's appointment.

46,728. His original appointment was in 1898, but his appointment as registrar was in December 1912?—That would be the date.

46,729. It was not only the last appointment, but the previous appointments of clerks to registrars, which were made with notice that there should be no vested right of succession?—When Mr. Jolly, who is the junior registrar at present, was appointed.

46,730. He was appointed in September 1898?—That is the date when he was first appointed to the office. It was in Lord Halsbury's time.

46,731. Do you consider that that section of the Act of 5 Victoria being in force, the Lord Chancellor has no power to appoint anyone as registrar, except one of the clerks?—That is my opinion.

46,732. Has the Lord Chancellor large powers under the Judicature Acts for regulating the numbers, duties, and salaries of officers in the different departments?—I think he has, but I am alluding now only to the appointment of registrars. I have here the order under which Mr. Jolly was appointed a registrar, and that is dated 1913, and was made under 5 Victoria, chapter 5, and the subsequent Acts.

46,733. It appears, on the face of it, that it was made under that Act and subsequent Acts?—Yes, but perhaps I ought to say that I pressed for an order being made under the Act. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie wanted the order made by simply putting the order in this form: “I, Lord Chancellor, do appoint so and so, one of the registrars of the High Court of Chancery.” I wrote him a very strong letter stating my objections to the order being drawn, except under the Act. I have a copy of my letter which I wrote to him on that occasion. I wrote to say that I thought it was a very serious matter for any appointment to be made to the registrarship except under that Act, as I thought that such an appointment might affect its validity. He answered me by saying that the Lord Chancellor signed the order appointing Mr. Jolly in the form in which I had sent it, but I was not “if you please”—his expression was—to take that as a precedent for the future. I think I have given his exact words from recollection.

46,734. Then if the section of that Act of 5 Victoria were repealed, do you consider that the clerks to registrars, having been appointed with notice that they would have no vested right, would have any ground for complaint?—I think they would. I should think, undoubtedly, it would be a very serious matter to them, having regard to the terms on which they considered they came into the office on their appointment.

46,735. The terms on which they accepted their appointments were that they had notice that they had no vested right to succession?—They had no vested right to succession, but I cannot say more than that it was understood by them that they would succeed, and I think they so understood it; in fact, I know they so understood it.

46,736. At the end of your evidence the other day we were dealing with the question of the amalgamation which has been suggested at various times between the Chancery chambers and the Registrars Office. You expressed your opinion against that amalgamation?—I did.

46,737. And you gave as one reason that, if that amalgamation were carried out, it would be necessary to attach particular registrars to each group of courts?—I thought so. I do not see how the amalgamation could be carried out in any other way.

46,738. Referring to the Report of the Kekewich Committee, they recommended that the two offices should remain separate?—Yes.

46,739. But they also recommended, did they not, that the staff of the Registrars Office should consist of six registrars, eight principal clerks, three clerks, and three assistant clerks, and that this staff should be divided into three groups, each of which should consist of two registrars and clerks adequate to dispose of the orders made, whether in court or in chambers, by one of the three pairs of judges among whom the business of the Chancery Division is, according to the system now prevailing, divided; and they further recommended that each of those groups in the office should, by a system of rotation by sittings, move from one group of courts to another group of courts. So that the Kekewich Committee recommended the attachment of a particular section of the Registrars Office to a particular group of courts, while the office remained separate?—That part of the Report of the Kekewich Committee was dissented from by both Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Christopher James, and they followed the opinion of all the Chancery judges, who thought that the Registrars Office ought to be maintained as a separate department.

46,740. Still, that was the recommendation of the majority of the committee?—The recommendation of the majority, but not of the Chairman and Mr. Christopher James.

46,741. The Chairman and Mr. Christopher James do not say that that would be impracticable, but they say it would be undesirable?—They say it was a step that was to be deprecated.

46,742. Yes, but not that it would be impracticable?—They do not say it would be impracticable.

46,743. So that it is not an insuperable obstacle to the amalgamation of the two offices?—I do not say it is insuperable, but in my opinion it is very inadvisable.

46,744. What are your reasons for thinking it inadvisable?—I think the Registrars Office ought to be a separate establishment entirely from the masters.

46,745. That is rather a different point. I was asking, what are your grounds for thinking it undesirable to attach groups of registrars and clerks to each group of courts, whether the office remained separate or was amalgamated?—I think the registrars ought to be an independent body, and they ought to rotate among the judges, so as to convey to the judges what they know is the opinion of different judges as questions crop up on matters which occur in different courts from time to time.

46,746. But it was proposed that these groups should rotate. The words of the Report are: “We further recommend that one group shall be attached to each of the three pairs, not permanently, but for regular periods of not less than one sittings, so that at the end of each period each group shall be attached to a different pair of judges for the ensuing period”—that is a system of rotation. The arrangement there recommended would secure a system of rotation?—I suppose that is possible.

46,747. Apart from that question of division into groups, you were beginning to state your general objections to the amalgamation of the two offices?—In my opinion the registrars ought to be an independent body. They act as advisers; they supervise the orders of the judges and also of the masters, and see that they are all in order, and they carry out the practice of the court. I think they ought to be an independent body entirely, so as to be able to retain this supervision over all the orders made, and to let the judges know, or the masters know, the practice of the different sides of the court, and impart the knowledge they have acquired to the judges and masters as questions arise.

MR. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

46,748. As regards their knowledge and power of applying that knowledge to the orders, would there be any practical difference if they formed part of the same office as the masters?—It would not affect the orders, but would affect the practice in making those orders.

46,749. Why?—Because you have to see that all the judges make the orders in conformity with the practice of the day.

46,750. What would prevent the registrar from seeing to that in his somewhat altered position?—I do not say he could not do so.

46,751. Why should he be in a less favourable position to do so?—I think if he is attached to one group of judges more particularly it narrows his information.

46,752. But the recommendation is that they should rotate?—Yes, but I do not know how you would carry that out.

46,753. What would be the difficulty? You and one of your colleagues would be attached to the first group this sittings, to the second group the next sittings, and to the third group the following sittings. In that way you would have complete rotation between the different groups of courts and the different judges?—I suppose you would have to alter all the rooms and make the registrars go and join the masters in their offices.

46,754. The question of the actual arrangement of the rooms is another point. Apart from the local arrangements, in what way would the registrars be in a worse position for giving effect to their knowledge of the practice?—I can only say that that was considered by Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Christopher James, and their view was acquiesced in by all of us. We thought it much the best for us to be in an independent position.

46,755. That is your opinion, but I am anxious to get at your reasons for that opinion?—I think it is better for the office that the registrars should be an independent body.

46,756. Why would they be less independent?—I think if you are attached to one group you rather lose your independence. Do not you think so?

46,757. But you would not be attached to one particular group?—You would be for the whole of one term attached to one set of masters only.

46,758. But you would go on to another group in the next term?—I think myself it is far better to remain as it is—an independent body—and I think the profession would like it, too.

46,759. You do not give any reasons for that opinion?—I cannot give any reason, except that I think that is the opinion of all the judges, and was the opinion of Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Christopher James.

46,760. And of yourself?—And of myself.

46,761. But you cannot give any of the reasons which have induced you to form that opinion?—I think it is better for the office that it should be in an independent position and be as it is. That is my opinion after my long experience.

46,762. Are you satisfied with the present system of the appointment of clerks. They are appointed by the Lord Chancellor, I think?—Yes.

46,763. Does the Lord Chancellor consult you as regards candidates?—No, not as regards the appointment of principal clerks. I am consulted as regards the appointment of assistant clerks, that is to say, I have the names proposed sent to me and the candidate comes to me, and I have to report upon whether I think he is a desirable candidate, but I am not consulted with regard to the principal clerks.

46,764. Do you see the candidates?—He sends me the principal clerks whom he does appoint, but I have to report to him upon the assistant clerks.

46,765. Are you consulted with regard to promotion from the third class to the second class?—There is no promotion from third class to second class clerkships in our office.

46,766. How do you mean?—None of the third class can ever become second class. The principal clerks are appointed from second class clerks now.

46,767. The principal clerks, that is to say, the clerks to registrars and second class clerks combined, are never promoted from the third class?—Never. They are different. The third class clerk has only to pass the ordinary Civil Service examination.

46,768. Then there is no opening to third class clerks for promotion at all?—Not in our office.

46,769. They are limited for the whole of their lives to a maximum of 200l.?—And as regards that, I may say that they are anxious to get away from our office for that reason, and to get to the masters' department, where they can rise to be first class clerks.

46,770. That is not unnatural?—That is not unnatural; I have encouraged it and recommended several of my own department to go.

46,771. Would not that be one advantage of amalgamation of the two offices, that it would open an avenue of promotion to third class clerks?—It would in that way, so far as they are concerned.

46,772. As regards the appointment of principal clerks, you are not consulted by the Lord Chancellor?—I am not.

46,773. The candidates are not sent to you to report upon?—They are not. If I may be permitted to say so, I think that is a very hard part of the appointment to third class clerks. I have been trying to get for the last two years my assistant clerk something extra. He got to his maximum in 1896; he is a splendid man, and he has served as assistant clerk to two senior registrars, Mr. Pemberton and now myself. He is most efficient, and I could not do without him. I have been trying to get him something extra. I tried to get him made second class clerk, without success, and now I have been trying to get him an extra 50l. a year, but have not succeeded. I think it is hard where a head of a department recognises a specially good and worthy person, not to be able to get him anything extra at all. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie said he hoped to get something extra for him, but has not been able to get anything out of the Treasury.

46,774. Your department is unique in that respect—that the third class clerks have no opportunity for promotion in the office?—I think so.

46,775. What about the hours of attendance for the clerks? What are the regular office hours?—They come at a quarter past 10 and sign a book at a quarter past 10, and my clerk goes and gets the books. There are three books, one signed by the principal clerks, one signed by the assistant clerks, and one signed by the entry, petition, and cause clerks. Those books are fetched away about a quarter past 10 and a line is drawn. I give them usually about five minutes grace, and anybody who arrives after that time must come into my room and sign the book below the line.

46,776. What is the hour of leaving in the afternoon?—The office hour is until 4 o'clock, but a great many of them do not leave till after that, because they do not leave as a rule until their registrars do. Some of the registrars in court do not come out of court until a quarter past 4, and others of them until half-past 4, so they do not get away very often until half-past 4 or a quarter to 5.

46,777. Are those the usual hours for your personal work?—My usual practice is to get there four days a week at 10 o'clock or sometimes a quarter to 10. I was there at a quarter to 10 this morning; it depends upon what time the judge sits.

46,778. At what time do you generally leave?—At 4, or between 4 and half-past, if I am not in court. If I am in court then I leave on getting out of court. It depends how late the judge sits. Then I change my clothes and probably have one or two people to see.

46,779. So the normal hours of the clerks may be said to be from a quarter past 10 to 4, and sometimes a little later?—Yes.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

46,780. Do they ever get away before 4?—No, except by leave of their registrar.

46,781. What are there vacations?—They get the vacations which we all get.

46,782. The regular legal vacation?—We do not get away from the Long Vacation until at least a week after the judges.

46,783. Do you have to return before the judges resume?—No, we do not return until the judges come back—the 12th October.

46,784. Is there any vacation work at all?—Yes.

46,785. How many registrars are in attendance?—Two registrars, two principal clerks, and two assistant clerks divide the vacation work between them. I was vacation registrar this year.

46,786. Does that mean attendance every day?—Attendance every day. I did not go myself on Saturdays, but one of us had to be there. I sent my principal clerk on Saturdays, but, as a rule, it means Saturdays as well.

46,787. And the registrars and the principal clerks take it in rotation to do the vacation duty?—A fresh appointment would take the vacation work first; otherwise, it is done by rotation.

46,788. Does that apply also to the short vacations?—Yes, it applies to short vacations as well. The Christmas Vacation is a fortnight, and so the two vacation registrars for the year each take a week.

46,789. And that applies to clerks too?—That applies to clerks too.

46,790. Does that apply to the assistant clerks?—Yes.

46,791. At present there is no fixed age for retirement, either for registrars or for their clerks?—No; under the Act it is “during good behaviour,” except that I should add, as I think I said last time, that the last appointment of Mr. Jolly as registrar, by direction of the Lord Chancellor, is to terminate if and when he attains the age of 70.

46,792. Are you in favour of fixing an age for retirement? Dealing with the case of the registrars themselves first, would there be an advantage, do you consider, in fixing an age for retirement, as has been done in the case of Mr. Jolly?—I do not see that anybody could find fault with fixing 70 years as the age for retirement.

46,793. As regards the clerks, what do you consider the age of retirement should be? I suppose in the case of principal clerks the question would very seldom arise under the present system?—It would not arise except in case of illness.

46,794. I see there is one second class clerk who is now of the age of 65. How does that arise?—He is a very old officer. He was at the Rolls in the old days, and came from the Rolls to our office when the Petitions of Course to the Rolls were abolished. He is a most valuable man; he attends to all the Petitions of Course; he has a great knowledge of practice of that kind. The Kekewich Committee recommended that that seat should be abolished and should be merged in the rest of the office. They said: “The work of the petition and entry clerks will be very largely reduced if Orders of Course are made and drawn up in chambers”—that has not been done—and all orders are printed as suggested “in this report; and apart from this, we see no reason to doubt that the duties of these clerks may be assigned to some of the staff according to our scheme.” I thought myself that what work was done by a petition clerk could be done by the assistant clerks, but I have been unable to arrange it so, because this particular petition clerk, a very valuable man of some age who has been there all these years, took it as a personal grievance if he were to be changed from his work, so I have been unable to effect the alteration I intended to make, during his term of office.

46,795. Do you see any reason why the ordinary Civil Service rule of power to retire at 60 and compulsory retirement at 65 should not be applied in the office, apart from the registrars themselves?—I do not see any reason why it should not apply.

46,796. Would there be some advantages in applying it?—I should qualify that by saying, “to any new appointments”—not as regards the older men.

46,797. Apart from any question of existing rights, as a matter of principle, you see no reason to urge against it?—None whatever.

46,798. I see the Kekewich Committee also recommended that appointments and promotions should be made by selection and not by seniority, and that power should be taken to remove any officer if sufficient cause were shown. Dealing with the first point, that is a matter which directly concerns the Lord Chancellor and not yourself?—Yes.

46,799. Are you in favour of that recommendation of the Kekewich Committee being carried out?—No, I am not in favour of it.

46,800. You would adhere to pure seniority?—I think so. Of course the Act of Parliament provides that the senior registrar could raise a valid objection “to the satisfaction of the Lord Chancellor,” but I have never known it done, and I can speak from the year 1872.

46,801. Does the section require that the senior clerk should be appointed?—The senior clerk to the registrars, according to the section: “and that on the death, resignation, promotion, or removal of the junior registrar for the time being, the vacancy thereby occasioned shall be filled up by the senior of the clerks to the registrars for the time being, to whom no sufficient objection to the satisfaction of the Lord Chancellor shall be made.”

46,802. Apart from the question of the statute, do you consider that it is desirable from the practical point of view, that the appointment should be by seniority or by selection?—I think it ought to go by seniority.

46,803. Why?—All these men have been through their articles as solicitors; they are solicitors. Supposing they are university men, they have been up at Oxford and Cambridge and taken their degree and subsequently passed two legal examinations.

46,804. (Mr. Coward.) They pass one if they have been at the university?—No, they pass the Intermediate and the Final. They have the Intermediate Examination after the first year.

46,805. Are you quite sure about that?—Yes, quite certain. If they are non-university men they have to pass three examinations—a preliminary on general knowledge, and two legal examinations.

46,806. If they have passed in law at the university, do they escape the Intermediate?—I believe that is so, but I am not quite sure.

46,807. (Chairman.) Among a body of men who have passed certain examinations, there are usually some men who are better fitted than others for performing important work?—That is so; I quite admit it.

46,808. Is it not desirable in the public interest that those who are best fitted for performing the important work should be promoted to the most important posts?—I think it very difficult to make a selection.

46,809. (Bishop of Southwark.) The difference between them is not so great as all that?—It is not sufficiently great to signify.

46,810. (Chairman.) Another recommendation of the Kekewich Committee was that the senior registrar should be given greater powers of control over the work of registrars in general. That was partly combined with their recommendation about groups. They proposed that the senior registrar of each group should be responsible for the work of each group, and that the chief registrar should have certain special duties imposed upon him. Do you consider that the senior registrar should have greater powers and responsibility?—I consider I have all the powers I want. I regulate the office, and they all come to me if any question arises in the office, and I think they are extremely good about attending to all my regulations on matters connected with the office.

46,811. (Mr. Boutwood.) Can you give orders to the other registrars?—I do not interfere between them in their own work, but the general supervision of the office is under my direction.

46,812. (Chairman.) The organisation of the office, I think, is that certain particular clerks are attached to each registrar?—That is so.

46,813. As regards the discipline of those clerks, is that under the control of the registrar to whom they are attached, or is it under the control of the senior registrar?—I consider that it is under the control of the senior registrar, but I think the registrar to whom they are attached would come to me if he has anything to say or to find fault with. I have always found myself that it is best not to interfere between a registrar and his clerk, unless I am compelled to do so, about any particular matter. As a rule, I think it works very smoothly.

25 February 1915.]

MR. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

46,814. As regards the other registrars, you have no responsibility for their work?—Nothing as regards their work.

46,815. They are entirely responsible for their own work?—Yes. I wrote to Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie a letter on the 25th July 1907 on that subject. This is the letter: "The senior registrar is at present recognised as having the entire control of the office, and conducts, as you know, the official correspondence, and he reports on all questions connected with the conduct and business of the office as a whole, but he is not, as the report says, responsible for his colleagues, and it is difficult to see how he could be so responsible, and I am sure it would lead to considerable friction if he was to interfere, even if he had time to do so, with his colleagues in the conduct of their own work. They are all men of some age and long experience, and quite able to manage their respective departments. At the same time they at present constantly refer to the senior registrar on every sort of question of practice or management, and the senior registrar from time to time calls meetings of registrars to deal with the matters referred to him." That exactly expresses my view.

46,816. You told us that the recommendation of the Kekewich Committee as regards the attendance of clerks in court in place of registrars in certain cases has been carried out?—It has.

46,817. Have any other recommendations of that committee been carried out?—I have stated in my memorandum in reply to your questions exactly what has been carried out. The number of registrars, in the first place, has been reduced and is now nine, and I am given to understand that the reduction contemplated is to eight registrars and eight clerks and eight assistant clerks.

46,818. On that point the recommendation of the Kekewich Committee was that it should be reduced to six?—But that was not acceded to. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie was kind enough to ask me for my opinion on the report of the Kekewich Committee. I wrote him my opinion on the matter. I have a letter from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie dated 14th April 1908, saying that there had been a battle over the Kekewich Report, but the Treasury had agreed to treat the office on the basis of nine registrars, nine clerks, and nine assistant clerks.

46,819. In fact, it was decided not to carry out that recommendation?—Yes.

46,820. Apart from the recommendation about clerks sitting in court in certain cases, has any other recommendation been carried out?—They said in the report something about delay in drawing orders, and then Order 62, Rule 14a, provided that orders should be drawn up and entered in 14 days. My observation about that is, that though it is not practicable to carry out this rule strictly in case of long and complicated orders, it has had the good effect of making solicitors hurry up. As I said, the delay in drawing up orders was principally their fault, as they did not trouble to leave their briefs and get the orders through; but now, I may say, there are no complaints that I know of as to any delay.

46,821. There is no delay at present?—None.

46,822. So that recommendation has not been carried out, but the object has been attained in other ways?—I think, in consequence of the recommendation, Mr. Justice Parker then suggested the rule which carried out one of the suggestions they made about the delay; otherwise, none of the other recommendations have been carried out.

46,823. One recommendation at the end of the report was to this effect: "The use of shorthand writing facilitates despatch in all departments of " business, and we venture to suggest, as a matter for consideration, whether it would not be well to promote it, at least among the assistant clerks." Have any steps been taken to give effect to that recommendation?—None; and I do not consider that we want shorthand writing in our office, as the assistant clerks have no use for it.

46,824. (Bishop of Southwark.) I am not quite clear about the difference of the work as between the third class clerks and the second class clerks. I understood you to say that no third class clerk could possibly get promoted?—Not in our department, beyond the maximum of 200*l.* a year. He is appointed at 100*l.*, and goes up by increments of 10*l.* to 200*l.*, and that is his maximum.

46,825. He can never become a second class clerk?—Not in our office.

46,826. Is that because the work of the second class clerk is essentially different?—He is a higher grade of clerk. I think for some of the third class clerks 200*l.* a year is quite enough; but there are some who, I think, might well be promoted to a higher salary. Even if they were not made second class clerks they ought to get some addition to their salary.

46,827. I will put the question in another way. Do you think that the work could be done by having a larger number of third class clerks and having no second class clerks?—No.

46,828. The second class clerk's work is something quite distinct?—Quite of a higher calibre.

46,829. In what way would you say higher?—I do not know that I quite follow the question. Only one particular class of work is assigned to third class clerks. The second class clerks are all principal clerks, and are on a different footing.

46,830. (Mr. Matheson.) All of them are qualified solicitors?—All qualified solicitors, except the three I have mentioned, who are not qualified.

46,831. (Bishop of Southwark.) That is to say, the second class clerks have a legal qualification?—The second class clerks should have according to the Act, but, as I pointed out, three have been appointed who had no legal qualification.

46,832. And their work very soon becomes responsible work that requires some legal knowledge?—Yes. Third class clerks would not be capable of doing second class clerk's work in our office.

46,833. I wanted to be clear about that?—That is quite clear.

46,834. (Mr. Matheson.) You express yourself as against promotion by selection. Does not that really rather suggest that the work of a registrar does not require special ability beyond the qualification of being a competent solicitor?—Well, I suppose some men make better registrars than others, but I think it would be very difficult to select from two principal clerks. I should probably consider one a better man than the other, but it would be difficult to say, and I think the difference would not be so great as to warrant putting the lower man over the head of the man above him.

46,835. No doubt the person who is responsible for promotion has a disagreeable task, but would you say in your experience of the office that you have not known very considerable differences in ability between the different clerks?—Undoubtedly.

46,836. You have known differences?—Yes.

46,837. (Mr. Shipley.) Who was it who appointed those three gentlemen who had no legal qualification?—I got a letter from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie to say that the Lord Chancellor had appointed these unqualified men as second class clerks in the office.

46,838. Which Lord Chancellor was it?—The first time an unqualified clerk was appointed was in 1906, and he is now third clerk—Mr. Melville. I have a letter here on the subject. We rather took exception to this appointment, and I have found a letter in which Sir Kenneth wrote to Mr. Pemberton, the senior registrar at the time, to say that he was not a solicitor and that one of us had expressed some surprise at the appointment, and he went on to say: "I have always understood that it was thought a good thing to diminish the number of clerks with titles to the "registrarship, and I have always understood that the new class of second class clerks were an entirely independent body who might, if qualified, be appointed principal clerk, as Mr. Jolly was, on their merits, but not with any exclusive rights. I doubt whether, as the law now stands, Mr. Melville could be advanced to a principal clerkship, but there is nothing against his being appointed to a second class clerkship in the first instance, and, if it emphasises the distinction between the clerks and the others, so much the better. I am sorry I did not consult you, but I thought I knew your views."

46,839. (Chairman.) Mr. Melville has since been appointed a clerk to a registrar?—He has since. He is now third on the list, but if the Act stands he and two others, as I have explained, never can become registrars.

46,840. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) What are the names of the two others?—More and Timmis. Those three since they have been in the office, I may say, have been called to the Bar.

46,841. (Mr. Holt.) Does that debar them from becoming registrars?—At present under the Act they are not qualified unless they have passed their articles in a solicitor's office.

46,842. (Chairman.) Do you consider that their appointment as clerks to registrars was illegal?—I consider it was.

46,843. (Sir John Kempe.) I see in the ladder of qualification laid down by the Kekewich Committee for the appointment of registrars there are two alternatives suggested. The qualification for appointment as clerk is being called to the Bar or being admitted a solicitor. Then a principal clerk should have had either three years' experience in the office as a clerk, or been a practising barrister or solicitor of five years' standing. For registrars he should have three more years as principal clerk, or be a barrister or solicitor of 10 years' standing. That is to say, six years as a clerk is considered as equivalent to 10 years as a practising barrister or solicitor. Is that carried out?—No, it is not.

46,844. Why is not that carried out?—It is not for me to say. They cannot carry out that method of appointment to the office as long as this Act of Parliament stands good. They may do anything they like in regard to appointing to the office, but he cannot become a registrar under this Act unless he is a principal clerk to a registrar.

46,845. That suggested alternative was never provided for?—It has never been provided for. I might say that, personally, I see no reason why a barrister should not be qualified to be principal clerk as well as a solicitor, but it is not so according to the Act of Parliament.

46,846. You think ten years as a barrister would not qualify for a registrarship so well as six years as a clerk in the office?—I think being six years in the office gives him the information necessary to draw up the orders. He has been trained up to draw these rather technical orders, so it is better for him to prepare for the position of registrar by rising up in the office than to appoint anybody from outside. In fact, I do not think anybody from outside could do our work; it would be impossible.

46,847. Not even with legal training?—Not even with legal training.

46,848. (Mr. Coward.) You have been a registrar for some 26 years?—Yes.

46,849. And you were a solicitor before that?—I never was a solicitor. I passed my examination.

46,850. But you were articled to a solicitor?—Yes, I was articled.

46,851. And then you got your appointment at once?—I did.

46,852. The training that the registrar and the master on the Chancery side go through is identical?—Identical.

46,853. They are both solicitors?—Both.

46,854. And I suppose you would agree that you could not have a better training for the post of registrar than that of a solicitor?—I quite agree, it is the best.

46,855. It certainly would be a better training than that of the Bar for that particular post?—Much better.

46,856. When you were appointed, did it take you long, with the aid of a book called "Seton," to undertake your duties as registrar? Was it very troublesome to you with the aid of that book, which, no doubt, you know?—I know it well. I assisted in supplying forms and information for two editions; I know it perfectly.

46,857. Nobody better. You have to know it from A to Z?—You must know it.

46,858. Is that the foundation of the whole thing? The registrar must be familiar with his Seton, or he is nowhere?—That is exactly it.

46,859. Of course you must qualify for that, and it may take you a long time to know your Seton properly?—Yes.

46,860. But when you know it, if you have intelligence and savoir faire, you are competent to be registrar, I think?—Yes; but there are so many new questions always cropping up. Even now I never find a day without something fresh coming up.

46,861. Some modifications of a Seton decree?—Yes, there are always modifications.

46,862. That is what it is; it is the modification of a Seton decree?—New points are arising so as to vary those decrees.

46,863. You have the little tournure de phrase?—You also want to know all the Chancery Fund rules with regard to money orders. You must have those at your fingers' ends as well.

46,864. The whole point of my observation is that there is no distinction between the training of the master and of the registrar?—No.

46,865. Therefore, one would find it rather difficult to see why there should not be an amalgamation of the offices?—Amalgamation could be done undoubtedly. I do not want to say it could not be done, but the masters are not competent to draw our orders and you would not appoint us masters.

46,866. It would not be done?—It could not be done.

46,867. The orders would not be drawn probably with so much skill or science?—The masters are unable to draw our orders.

46,868. It is that tournure de phrase that distinguishes it?—But the masters would be unable to draw our orders, and also they would not have time to do so.

46,869. Not between 10 and 4? That is the very point I was coming to. You never practised as a solicitor?—No, I never practised.

46,870. But you went through the curriculum; you were an articled clerk?—I was an articled clerk.

46,871. Probably you did not work so hard then as you would have done if you had been earning your living?—I should like to add that I remained four years in the solicitor's office after my articles.

46,872. Do you mind saying in whose office it was?—Walters, Young & Co.

46,873. I suppose you were very qualified?—I thought I was.

46,874. In that office, what sort of hours did you keep?—I would get there about 10 and stop till about half-past 5.

46,875. You were not over-worked. I suppose for a solicitor's office you would not call those very long hours. Do not you call them very easy hours?—I think it is a fair time—10 to half-past 5.

46,876. Some have to get down to the office a good time before 10, and do not leave until 7 o'clock at night and have some work to do afterwards?—Quite so.

46,877. So if you compare the work of the masters with the ordinary work of a solicitor, you would find that it was greatly in favour of the master. It would not hurt the master to do two or three hours a day more, would it?—I should not like to say that. I think a good many of the masters stop there until about 5 o'clock.

46,878. Some of them may stop until 5, but I rather think you will find that some of them go at half-past 3?—I do not know anything about the masters. We do not.

46,879. One word about the vacation. There is only one registrar at a time in attendance in vacation?—Quite so.

46,880. That is to say, two of you are in attendance, one for half the time, and the other for the rest of it?

25 February 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

—Yes. I should like to qualify that by saying that if one is ill he calls upon the other man to do it. We have to do it between us, but I have found one enough, and I wrote and told Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie so when he asked me.

46,881. There is only one judge to do both common law and Chancery work?—That is so.

46,882. The result of that is that the work cannot be very onerous?—No, it is not; and I have found one vacation registrar sufficient.

46,883. With regard to the third class clerks, can you tell me what they do? What does your third class clerk do?—He is a kind of go-between between the public and me. He sees all the solicitors when they bespeak orders; he keeps a book with all the orders bespoken, and the names of the solicitors. When the orders are bespoken, he makes an entry, when it is given out for drafting another entry, when it comes back from the stationers another entry, when it goes out to the solicitors another entry, when it comes back from the solicitors, and when it is approved, and so on, in separate columns other entries. He arranges my appointments for me. Every day I am not in court I have a string of appointments. He arranges when I am to be seen, and brings my papers into court, sees after the stamping of my orders. He is backwards and forwards to court with papers when I am in court, because I am doing work all the time, and always having papers brought in and out, which I do scrappily, and as well as I can, otherwise one would never get through one's work.

46,884. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You have attached to you, I understand, a clerk to the registrar and a third class clerk?—That is so.

46,885. Which of those gentlemen is the clerk to the registrar?—He is my principal clerk.

46,886. What is his name?—Mr. Garrett, son of the police magistrate.

46,887. He was appointed in 1904 at the age of 25 to his present post?—No doubt that is correct.

46,888. He was appointed, you told us, under a tacit understanding that he was to proceed in due time to the registrarship?—I was speaking to him about that the other day. I think that they had undoubtedly a tacit understanding that they would succeed to the registrarship.

46,889. You will understand that to a tacit understanding there must be two parties?—Yes. I suppose he must have been interviewed by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie. He said to me that if he had not had that understanding, if he had not thought, or at any rate understood, that he would become a registrar, he would never have taken the appointment.

46,890. But to a tacit understanding there must be two parties, of which Mr. Garrett must be one. Who is the other?—I do not know. It is all done by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie.

46,891. Your statement is that Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie entered into a tacit understanding?—Please do not say that. I do not think so at all. I know nothing at all about that.

46,892. But to a tacit understanding there must be two parties?—I cannot say.

46,893. I ask you that question: Do you agree that to a tacit understanding there must be two parties?—Undoubtedly.

46,894. Was Mr. Garrett one of the parties?—I suppose he was. I imagine that he understood—I read to him what I was going to say to you and he agreed to it—that there was a tacit understanding that he should succeed to the registrarship.

46,895. You meant a tacit understanding between two parties, of whom Mr. Garrett was one. Now I want to know who was the other one?—Sir Kenneth Mackenzie.

46,896. You say there was a tacit understanding?—I do not say there was one. He says he thought there was one, and I thought it was a tacit understanding that all the clerks appointed to this office, having regard to this Act of Parliament, should succeed to the registrarship.

46,897. You are responsible as senior registrar for the general organisation of the office?—I am.

46,898. Responsible to whom?—Responsible to the Lord Chancellor.

46,899. If you think it would be to the advantage of the office that any official should alter the nature of his work, you are responsible to the Lord Chancellor for seeing that that advantageous arrangement is carried out?—Undoubtedly.

46,900. You have told us that you thought there was an advantage to the office that Mr. Hayes's work should be changed?—I do not think so in the present circumstances. I think he has been so long at his present work which, having regard to his age, he does so extremely well, that I do not propose to make the alteration until he has retired.

46,901. You thought it would have been to the advantage of the office if it had not been that he objected?—I do not think there is much in it myself, because we have arranged it so that one of the assistant clerks takes it in turn to go and attend to the seat to which his successor would be appointed. Under the circumstances we have only eight assistant clerks, because one of the assistant clerks was made entry clerk. When that vacancy occurred we tried to get another assistant clerk appointed, to raise the number to nine, but Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie demurred to that because he thought the recommendation was that the petition clerk's work could have been absorbed amongst the others. I think it could have been done, but, having regard to the length of service of the present petition clerk in his particular department—and he came to me and really made himself quite ill over it—I said, "Well, during your time it shall remain as it is." So what I do is I send up one assistant clerk to the registrar without a clerk. I made out a rota so that each registrar, except myself, dispenses with his assistant clerk for a certain portion of each day in the week. So Hayes retains his post during the length of his stay in the office.

46,902. You say you are consulted with regard to the appointment of all the assistant clerks?—That is a new regulation. I had a letter from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie to say that in future all assistant clerks before being appointed to the office would be sent to me, thus following the practice as it is in the master's office.

46,903. About when was the date of that letter?—I should think it was at the time of the appointment of the last assistant clerk—about two years ago.

46,904. Two assistant clerks—Mr. Hardy and Mr. Lewis—were appointed in March 1913. Were you consulted about their appointments?—Those were two very experienced writers who had been acting as assistant clerks on many occasions when one of our assistant clerks was ill, and they thoroughly knew the work of an assistant clerk. So in Mr. Lewis's case Mr. Registrar Leach, for whom he had done work, wrote and recommended him for the appointment. As regards Mr. Hardy, I think Mr. Pemberton, the senior registrar at the time, wrote and asked for his appointment, he being so accustomed to do the work, that they preferred having him to fill the post permanently rather than having a stranger from outside.

46,905. They were at their appointment aged 54 in one case and 55 in the other?—They were two writers.

46,906. Did that appointment give them any pension rights?—That would be so undoubtedly, but they only get $\frac{1}{60}$ th for every year of service now, and they were writers.

46,907. You said you had attempted to get 50l. a year increase for your assistant clerk. What is his name?—Collyer.

46,908. His age is 62?—Yes.

46,909. The office is really organised very much as if it were nine separate small departments, each with a registrar, a clerk to the registrar, and another clerk?—Exactly.

46,910. Therefore in functions and work there is no difference between the clerks to registrars and those described here as second class clerks?—The second class clerks occupy the position of clerks to registrars. The first six are supposed to be on the establishment, the others are only second class clerks. Until they become one of the six they are not supposed to be on the establishment.

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

46,911. Their difference is not a difference of function at all, but solely a difference of pay?—That is it.

46,912. (Mr. Boutwood.) Is there any examination for your second class clerks?—None.

46,913. It is pure nomination?—It is pure nomination. I have been asked about that, and I deprecate any examination; I do not think it necessary, because they are either university men or have been through their articles as solicitors.

46,914. Do you bring men in sometimes to the first class?—No. In our office we do not distinguish them as "First Class Clerks"; in the masters' offices they do.

46,915. With regard to your principal clerks—the six clerks to registrars—did they all come from the second class, or did some come straight from outside?—They are appointed first in the office as second class clerks and rise up.

46,916. Is there any considerable difference between the sort of work your second class clerks do and the work of the second class clerks in the other legal offices?—Yes, a great deal of difference. Our men are all qualified solicitors, and they draw these technical orders. In none of the other offices do they do such technical work as we do.

46,917. There is one Chancery document which I see a great deal of—those long schemes regulating charitable endowments. Who actually draws those?—We do not draw any schemes regulating charitable endowments at all.

46,918. The Court often makes schemes?—Yes, the Court makes orders to confirm schemes. We have those orders to draw.

46,919. Who drafts the schemes?—That would probably be done by counsel and come up from the masters to us.

46,920. Then you simply draft the confirming order?—We draft the confirming order.

46,921. (Mr. Holt.) I understand that each registrar has a clerk?—Each registrar has a principal clerk and an assistant clerk.

46,922. Then you have four second class clerks altogether, three of whom act as principal clerks?—Three second class clerks. The first six clerks are on the establishment.

46,923. One of those second class clerks is Mr. Welbank?—You are talking of the assistant clerks. I thought you were talking of the principal clerks. Mr. Welbank is our entry clerk. He is a second class clerk.

46,924. If I leave out Mr. Hayes and Mr. Welbank there are only eight clerks. Is that wrong?—You are quite right. There are only eight clerks in the list, but we have got a ninth who does not appear here because he is not on the establishment. He is a man named Barnes. When there was a vacancy here on the last appointment Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie sent to me Barnes, who was at the House of Lords, a son of Mr. Thomas Barnes, who is clerk in the Companies Winding-up Branch, and he wrote to me to say, "I am sending down to you Barnes, a very nice fellow, to act temporarily as second class clerk." He has never received any increase of pay, and is not on the establishment at all. I went to see the Lord Chancellor himself on the subject of the appointment to the office, and the Lord Chancellor told me that he did not think it expedient to fill up this vacancy until this Commission had reported.

46,925. So that Mr. Barnes is holding the place temporarily?—He holds a second class clerkship at 250*l.* a year, and has not got any increase at all yet.

46,926. I understand that Mr. Blaker and Mr. Timmis will automatically become principal clerks?—They will become principal clerks automatically.

46,927. And then, having once got this appointment as second class clerks, they only require longevity to become senior registrars?—There only requires to be a vacancy for one of them to be a principal clerk.

46,928. If they can live long enough they become senior registrar?—Both cannot, because Mr. Timmis is not qualified.

46,929. Mr. Blaker can become senior registrar if he can manage to live long enough?—He can.

46,930. Then, if one once becomes a second class clerk, all one has to do is to live long enough, and you get to the highest place?—If you are qualified as a solicitor, but only with that qualification.

46,931. You told us that you think that, in spite of the letter written by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, these officials have a vested right to become registrars?—I think myself they came into the office under the impression that they would become registrars when vacancies occurred.

46,932. But does not a person who accepts an office with a right, which depends entirely on statute, take the chance of the statute being repealed?—He must do so.

46,933. Is not that his particular risk—that the statute may be altered?—Of course he must run that risk, undoubtedly.

46,934. And when he has received such a notice as that contained in Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie's letter, has he any ground of complaint if the statute is altered?—I think it would be very hard upon him.

46,935. Supposing you accept a position in which your vested interest depends upon a statute, and at the time of accepting that position, you have notice that there is an intention to procure the repeal of that statute, or that persons are agitating to repeal that statute, have you any ground of complaint if the agitation is successful?—I think they must take the risk.

46,936. It is a fair risk to take?—Yes, I think they must take it.

46,937. Do you consider that the notice to Mr. Jolly, that he must retire at 70, is binding on him?—I very much doubt it, because he holds his registrarship during good behaviour under the Act of Parliament. I put it in the order acting on my instructions.

46,938. Does "good behaviour" include capacity to perform your duties properly?—Well, if a man was incapacitated from performing his duties, he would receive notice that he was no longer required. Retirement on the ground of health I am talking of now. I have known, since I have been in the office, two or three men who retired in consequence of ill-health, and one or two I know were so unwell that they could not petition for their retirement.

46,939. Were they retired under pressure?—I have known men retire under pressure.

46,940. (Chairman.) Does not the Act give power to retire a registrar who is incapacitated from performing his duties personally, in section 48, which says: "Registrars, and clerks to the registrars, appointed and to be appointed under this Act, shall hold their respective offices during their good behaviour, and so long as they shall personally give their attendance upon their respective duties, and shall conduct themselves honestly and faithfully in the due execution of the duties of their said offices respectively." That would appear to give power to remove a registrar who is so far incapacitated that he cannot attend to his duties personally?—Quite so, and it has been done.

46,941. (Mr. Holt.) You told us you had suggested that Mr. Collyer should be promoted to be a second class clerk?—My original suggestion was that I thought he had been such a long time in the office that he should be promoted to a second class clerkship. That failed. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie said that there were already two, Mr. Hayes and Mr. Welbank, and I could not have another, and then I suggested to him that, as he was my clerk, considering his length of service and what he did for me, and that in fact he had reached his maximum in 1896, he was deserving of some extra pay. An extra 50*l.* a year had been given to the senior master's clerk, and I thought that was a strong reason why my clerk should have the same.

46,942. Do I understand that if Mr. Hayes or Mr. Welbank had disappeared there might have been no objection to promoting Mr. Collyer to a second class clerkship?—I think I could have got him promoted.

46,943. Therefore there would be promotion open to a third class clerk if a vacancy occurred in one of those two places?—There would, by special application

25 February 1915.]

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD FARMER.

It would not be except by special application. I forget about Mr. Hayes, but certainly in the case of Mr. Welbank he was recommended for a second class clerkship when he went to the entry seat.

46,944. Had he previously been a third class clerk?—Yes.

46,945. In your department?—Yes, he was clerk to Mr. Registrar Church.

46,946. I understand that you yourself were a clerk for about 17 years?—I was not really. I was deputy registrar for a man who was ill for more than two years, so I really became registrar after about 13½ years.

46,947. Could a deputy registrar be appointed now?—There has not been one now for a long time, I was twice deputy registrar, once for Mr. Registrar King for about six weeks, and once for Mr. Registrar Coe, who was ill, and whose leave the Lord Chancellor extended for about two years.

46,948. When you were deputy registrar, did you receive the salary of a clerk or a registrar?—I received the salary of a registrar for the time I was doing his work, so he would be the gainer for the time of the vacation. I only got so much a month while performing the duty.

46,949. Therefore the important part of your experience in doing the work of a registrar was what you obtained whilst you were a clerk?—Precisely. I may say that I am teaching my clerk all the time. He comes in to see me every day about orders. I am continually explaining orders to him, and telling him about orders, and thus training him up.

46,950. If you spend all that time training a man, is it absolutely necessary that he should be a solicitor?—He must have a knowledge of law. I consider, to qualify a man for our office, he ought to be either a solicitor or called to the Bar. He must have a knowledge of law before he comes to us.

46,951. Supposing a man of 25 years of age, having a knowledge of law in every sense of the word as a solicitor, or being called to the Bar, is taken on as a second class clerk, would he then have sufficient knowledge to enable him to proceed to the position of registrar?—No.

46,952. With the training as clerk would he?—Certainly.

46,953. Then it is not necessary that he should have been a solicitor so long as he comes primed with knowledge of the law?—I think he must have knowledge of the law. The only way you can get knowledge of the law is by going through articles or being called to the Bar.

46,954. Quite so, but there is a considerable difference between the two?—The advantage of having a solicitor is this: The clerks to solicitors are perambulating our office all day long, and these articulated clerks come before us with the Chancery clerks of different firms. They come round and get information as to our office, and acquire a great deal of knowledge before they come to us.

Mr. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT, called and examined,

46,955. (Chairman.) You are managing clerk in the office of Messrs. Sharpe, Pritchard & Company?—Yes.

46,956. How long have you been in a solicitor's office?—Over 40 years.

46,957. As managing clerk, how long?—Just about 34 years.

46,958. To what branches does your work specially relate?—The Chancery Division, lunacy matters, and company work.

46,959. Does your work bring you largely in contact with the offices of the courts?—A great part of my working life exists in the courts and chambers. My work as a solicitor's clerk necessitates my being in court or chambers each day the Court is sitting.

46,960. Have you also work with the Chancery registrars?—Yes, I know the Chancery registrars very well.

46,961. And with the taxing masters?—Certainly.

46,962. Before dealing with particular points, will you give us your opinion generally as to whether the work is done satisfactorily and rapidly?—That is rather a wide subject. I think that in recent years there has been a very great improvement as regards delay. There is no delay to speak of now on the Chancery side.

46,963. Neither in chambers nor in the Registrars Office?—No, in neither. Some chambers are better than others; but, speaking generally, they are very up-to-date and well up to time.

46,964. How soon can you get an appointment in chambers?—In some cases you can get one almost the next day. Certainly in some chambers you can get an afternoon appointment in two or three days; in others you have to wait a week or ten days, perhaps a fortnight.

46,965. What is the reason for that variation?—I think it is only the constitution of the different individual masters; some are slow, and others quick.

46,966. Some are quicker than others?—I think so.

46,967. And with regard to the Registrars Office what do you say?—The only delay there is because you cannot get an appointment, as the registrar is sitting in court. If they are in chambers you can see them almost any day. I have no difficulty at all there.

46,968. In your dealings with the Registrars Office, is it the registrar himself or the principal clerk you deal with mainly?—The registrar; we seldom see the principal clerk.

46,969. It would be an appointment with the registrar for settling the order?—Certainly.

46,970. There is sometimes delay in that, owing to the fact that the registrars have their work in court?—Yes, that is the only cause of delay.

46,971. Apart from the question of delay and rapidity, is the manner in which the work is done thoroughly satisfactory?—I do not want to go into any individual cases, so I do not care to deal with that personal matter, if I can help it.

46,972. Without entering into questions of individuals, are there differences in the efficiency of different officers?—Yes, great differences.

46,973. Speaking now of Chancery chambers, the efficiency and the manner in which the work is done there no doubt depends, to a considerable extent, on the office staff as well as on the masters themselves?—It does to a very great extent.

46,974. Has there been any change of recent years in the manner in which that staff is appointed?—I cannot say when; but there has been a change, I suppose, some 10 or 15 years ago.

46,975. The present system, as we have already heard from other witnesses, is that practically all the appointments are made to the third class, and that the first and second class clerkships are filled by promotion?—Yes, that is my experience.

46,976. Formerly appointments were more frequently made to the higher classes?—They were nearly always made to the higher classes. It was unusual, in my earliest recollection, for promotions to be made. It was more usual for the judge to appoint some managing clerk from outside to be first class clerk.

46,977. Will you give us your opinion on these systems; which do you think the better?—Speaking as a practical man, having work in the chambers, my opinion is that the appointments should be made from among the managing clerks. They should be appointed to either first or second class clerkships, according to their ability.

46,978. You think it is better that appointments should be made direct to those classes?—I think so. My opinion is that a third class clerk cannot possibly learn the work of a first class clerk, because his work is entirely different. He simply issues summonses and gives appointments, takes care of papers and puts them away. He cannot possibly get the experience that a first class clerk ought to have.

46,979. He sees, I suppose, a great part of the work that is going through the office?—If you mean by seeing the work seeing papers, that may be so; but he does not read them all, and cannot read them all.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT.

46,980. You think that the work that he does does not constitute sufficient training for the work of the higher classes?—Certainly not; he gets no training at all. He may have a bundle of notes put before him to put away, and he puts them away. He sees an appointment the master has adjourned to a particular day, and he makes a note of the appointment; but beyond that he knows nothing of what is going on, and some of the notes are not very full.

46,981. You think the work of a clerk in actual work in a solicitor's office would be the right training for a man who was going to be appointed to one of the higher classes?—Yes, because he comes before the master and discusses all sorts of points that arise before him. In some cases you have to go before a first class clerk to settle the certificate and take accounts, and so forth. You are constantly doing that. Then you go before counsel and discuss matters with him, attend consultations, and attend court and hear matters going on. You are bound to get experience which is most valuable to you in work in chambers. I do not think you could find any third class clerk who could get sufficient knowledge of these matters from his official position.

46,982. Do you find in practice that difficulty arises from the insufficient knowledge or training of third class clerks who have been appointed to the second class?—Yes. I think I may say, speaking generally, I have found it so.

46,983. You have found inconvenience from that cause?—Yes.

46,984. Then your view would lead to this: that there should be a sharp line of distinction between the third class and the higher classes; that men should be appointed to the third class without any prospect of going beyond it; and that men should be appointed direct to the second, and occasionally to the first class, for the purpose of doing the more important work?—Yes, certainly. I should qualify that in this way: there have been recent cases of appointments to third class clerks of clerks in solicitors' offices who have had a good deal of experience. I have known several recently. I do not say that those clerks would not be qualified to be promoted to second class clerkships, and afterwards to first class clerkships.

46,985. You think that if a man had had five years' experience in a solicitor's office before being appointed a third class clerk that would do?—No, five years would not do, because you may be appointed as office boy for five years and get no experience which would qualify you to be a third class clerk. I mean a man who has been in a solicitor's office for 10 or 15 years, and has had a good deal of outdoor work. I do not think every solicitor's clerk would be qualified to be appointed, but only those who had had outdoor work.

46,986. Those who have had outdoor work and served for 10 or 15 years?—Yes, I should think 10 years would be a minimum.

46,987. (Mr. Boutwood.) Would 100*l.* a year be enough for such a man as an initial salary?—They are taking it now, I suppose, with a view to promotion. I have known third class clerks appointed in that way who actually dropped their salary when appointed quite 50*l.* or 60*l.* a year.

46,988. (Chairman.) What sort of salary would a good man who had been serving for 10 years in a solicitor's office be getting, as a rule?—Well, he might be getting 150*l.* a year, but I do not think it would exceed that.

46,989. He would seldom be getting more than that?—I think not, if he started as a young man in the office and had to work his way up.

46,990. So it might be worth his while to drop to 100*l.* a year if he was going to rise to 200*l.*, with prospects of further promotion?—Yes, I should advise a young man to do that under present circumstances.

46,991. And you think a man of that sort would be suitable for subsequent promotion?—I think probably he would. I do not say all would, but you would have a chance of getting a good man.

46,992. And if he had served for ten years in the third class, doing the somewhat mechanical work that you have described, would not that have obliterated his qualifications?—I should think a man who had that experience would take some interest in the work and follow it up.

46,993. You think that, although entering as a third class clerk, he would improve himself?—Yes, I think he would make a point of it.

46,994. But unless a man appointed to the third class had had previous experience in a solicitor's office of something like 10 or 15 years, you would not consider him suitable for further promotion?—No, I should not. Perhaps I may qualify that. He may be qualified to be appointed a second class clerk, because that is not such difficult work as the work of the first class clerk, but I certainly should not think him qualified to be a first class clerk.

46,995. In your experience, is there a pretty clear line drawn between the duties of second class and first clerks?—Yes, certainly.

46,996. All the first class clerks' duties are very decidedly more important than the second class clerks' work?—Very decidedly more important.

46,997. Which do you consider the most important of the first class clerk's duties?—Settling certificates, and taking executors' and trustees' accounts.

46,998. Settling certificates in answer to accounts and inquiries?—Yes, and particularly certificates in partition actions.

46,999. Is that done practically entirely by a first class clerk?—Yes. He is supposed to draft the certificate and settle it, and then it is referred to the master for him to go through before it is engrossed and signed.

47,000. The final responsibility is the master's?—Certainly.

47,001. But the actual responsibility of drawing it is with the first class clerk?—Yes, before it goes to the master. Very often it is submitted to a conveyancing counsel in partition actions; but in administration actions a certificate answering general inquiries, bringing out particulars of the estate and dealings with the estate and finding the parties interested, is prepared by a first class clerk, and is not submitted to a conveyancing counsel, but goes to the master in the ordinary way. Some of these inquiries are very technical—when finding out who the parties interested in the estate are, and things of that sort.

47,002. And that work is conducted by first class clerks?—Yes. The master first reads the evidence and makes notes of the effect of it, and from those notes and the evidence the first class clerk prepares the certificate.

47,003. At present promotion from the lower to the higher classes is mainly by seniority?—I understand it is according to seniority altogether now, but I may be wrong.

47,004. Do you consider that that is a right system?—I think it is a wrong system.

47,005. You think the right system would be selection by merit?—Yes, I think a man ought to be appointed according to his abilities. If there is an able man in the office appoint him, certainly if he has had the proper experience; otherwise, go outside and get a qualified man.

47,006. Is that the system that is adopted in private practice in a solicitor's office?—Yes, a man does not go from one appointment to another unless he has got ability for the work.

47,007. And not so much attention is paid to seniority unless he has the ability?—No; at least that is my experience in our office.

47,008. Would you say that the result of a system of promotion by seniority is to discourage the able men?—I would not like to go so far as that.

47,009. But a system of promotion by selection would tend more to encourage a man to make the most of his abilities?—Certainly.

47,010. Do you think that the staff in the chambers, as at present constituted, is more than sufficient for the work?—I do, certainly. I think there is great waste, if I may use that term.

47,011. Could you tell us where the waste comes in?—There is not sufficient work for them to do.

47,012. Is that in all the offices, or any particular departments?—Speaking generally, I should say all round. As I said before, in some chambers there appears to be less work; but I do not think there is less work, only it is done more quickly than in the others.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT.

47,013. It has been suggested to us that one difficulty in the way of reducing the staff is that pressure comes at certain times of the day, and the staff has to be sufficient to deal with the work at those times of the day without keeping people waiting, and therefore there is some surplus of staff at slack times of the day?—I disagree with that entirely. It is not according to my experience.

47,014. Will you explain a little more fully, why you think that that is not correct?—I have never found any difficulty in times of pressure of that sort. I have never experienced it at all. I do not know what is meant by that, because the work goes on all day. There may be occasions when two or three people come in towards 4 o'clock, to get appointments or things of that sort, but they go to the third class clerks. I do not follow it at all.

47,015. You think there is no such special pressure at any particular time of the day as to make it necessary to have a special large staff to deal with it?—None whatever. The only pressure I have ever seen is just before 4 o'clock, when sometimes people who want to make appointments or to issue summonses will come into one set of chambers, and perhaps the clerk, who is wanting to get away at 4 o'clock, does not much like it.

47,016. In the Writ Department, for instance, is not the pressure mainly towards the end of the day?—I am not speaking of the Writ Department. I do not go there now. I do not issue writs, I send my juniors.

47,017. But in the Writ Department, would the writs accumulate rather towards the end of the day?—That may be. I would not like to say. As a rule I get mine out in the morning, if I can. I never keep writs back until the end of the day; but I cannot speak as to that department, because I seldom go there. I always send my juniors to issue the writs. It is really only messenger's work, as it were.

47,018. Do you think that there is any of the work at present done by the masters which could be passed down to the clerks?—Very little, I should think. In some Chancery chambers the first class clerk hears time summonses, makes orders for discovery, hears applications for stop orders, and takes summonses to proceed on orders—that is for directions to be given for answering inquiries directed by judgments. I do not think it would be safe to go beyond that.

47,019. You would not pass down any other work?—No, I cannot think of any at this particular moment. Of course, a solicitor's clerk would be very qualified to attend to these matters, because they come before him every day almost. We issue summonses to proceed and go before the master or first class clerk, and take directions as to answering the inquiries, and suggest who should answer them.

47,020. Is that work done quite efficiently by the first class clerks?—Certainly. In regard to stop orders there is not much responsibility; you only stop a fund being dealt with without notice. In the case of discovery there is a little more responsibility, but the present practice is to make orders for discovery, if asked for, almost as a matter of course, so there is not much judicial discretion there. Solicitors' clerks are very competent to deal with applications for time, because that is part of their work. We have to apply for time; we know how long it takes to prepare pleadings and to prepare affidavits, and therefore know exactly what time would be wanted or ought to be given.

47,021. Turning now to the Registrars Office, have you large dealings with that?—Yes. I am drawing up orders every day and attending appointments.

47,022. Is the work there of an extremely technical character?—Yes; you do want men there who have great knowledge of forms of orders.

47,023. (Mr. Coward.) Knowledge of Seton?—But Seton will not help you entirely; you must have practical experience as well. It is not a case of going to the book and taking a formal order and copying it out—oh dear, no.

47,024. (Chairman.) If a solicitor's clerk in Chancery work of 15 years' standing, say, were appointed a principal clerk in that office, how long would it take him to learn the work of the office?—He would know a good deal of it before he went in.

47,025. And how long would it take him to master it?—Of course it depends on his ability.

47,026. I mean a good man?—A good man would know it almost directly.

47,027. In a month?—I think you might give him a year.

47,028. But in a year he would master it completely?—Yes, I think so.

47,029. Would this be a correct description of it: That it is work of a technical character which requires great care and accuracy, but of which the range is not very large?—Yes; I think, speaking generally, that accurately expresses the work.

47,030. So that a good man who has some knowledge of it before he goes in could master it in a limited time?—Yes, I think so. Speaking for myself, I think after I had been at work 15 years in Messrs. Sharpe's office, I could have acquired it in a very short time.

47,031. Is the work well done?—Yes, very well done, as a rule.

47,032. And there is no delay?—No, I think not now. Of course there has been great delay, but that has all been abolished, because there is a rule that you have to draw your order up in 14 days.

47,033. That was a rule introduced after Mr. Justice Kekewich's Committee had reported?—I cannot say why it was instituted. I think it was made by the judges, who found that there had been much delay in drawing up orders. Occasionally matters came before them in which they found that an order had not been drawn up for months, and there was no one responsible at that time, and then this rule was passed. I did not know that it was the result of an inquiry by a committee.

47,034. It was introduced in 1907 or 1908?—Quite recently—some few years ago.

47,035. That was, I think, after Mr. Justice Kekewich's Committee had sat on the subject; but you are not acquainted with that?—I am afraid not.

47,036. We have heard that on the Common Law side orders in the great majority of cases are drawn up by the solicitors and then passed in the office?—Mr. Coward knows more about that than I do. I used to do Common Law, and we used then to get a little slip of paper, so big (describing), and carry it in, and that was the order.

47,037. (Mr. Coward.) It is never more?—No; that is my recollection.

47,038. (Chairman.) The orders are of a very simple character?—Very simple character.

47,039. The same system of the solicitor drawing up the order would not be applicable in the Chancery Registrars Office?—Not at all.

47,040. You think it necessary that the orders there should be drawn up in the office?—I think so. Sometimes, when an order is extremely difficult, the judge directs the junior counsel in the case to sign the minutes in Chancery actions.

47,041. So that in that case the work is done by counsel?—Yes, and the registrar simply puts it into shape. Sometimes then the registrar alters the form of the order because junior counsel, not being quite conversant with the practical working of the order, is not quite accurate in the way he has expressed himself in the minutes.

47,042. The question has been raised before various committees and commissions that have sat before now, as to whether the two offices of Chancery Chambers and Chancery Registrars should be amalgamated. The committee of 1886 recommended that; Mr. Justice Kekewich's Committee did not recommend it?—There is a difference of opinion upon it.

47,043. What is your opinion?—I think they could be amalgamated, and there would be a great saving if you had the proper men; but if you are going on with the appointments as they are now in chambers, I do not think you would get a qualified staff to do it.

47,044. You mean the men who are at present appointed to be masters in chambers?—I am not saying anything about the masters.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT.

47,045. You are speaking of the office staff?—Of course. I do not think the masters would have quite the experience. The masters are all qualified solicitors of so many years' standing, and some of them, but not many of them, would have practical experience in the registrar's work; others would have no experience at all in that work, and would not know anything about the work of the registrar's office practically.

47,046. But men of ability and experience who are appointed masters would have no difficulty in learning the work?—None whatever, but I do not see how a master is to learn it if he is appointed master, unless you mean that the masters are to sit as registrars.

47,047. The suggestion that has been made is, that ultimately the masters and the registrars should be entirely amalgamated, and that there should be one body of officers in the position of masters, who would do both the chamber work and the work of drawing up orders, and would take the work by rotation as it came in?—I see no difficulty in that.

47,048. No doubt, when the amalgamation first took place, the existing officers who had been working as masters would continue to do master's work, and those who had been registrars would continue to do registrar's work. Complete amalgamation and complete interchangeability of the officers would be brought about gradually. Do you see any difficulty in that?—I see no difficulty then, because certainly any master, I should think, would get practical knowledge in a year or so.

47,049. Would not an amalgamation of that sort result in some economy of labour?—I think great economy of labour.

47,050. For instance, at present in the case of Orders on Proceedings in Chambers, we have been told that the minutes are in some cases drawn up by the chamber staff and sent to the registrars for the purpose of drawing up the order?—I do not think that is quite right. If you have minutes they are generally prepared by the solicitor and carried in to the master, and he goes through them and settles them.

47,051. Perhaps "minutes" is not the right word, and "Memorandum" of Orders made in Chambers is the term to use?—The first and second class clerks indorse on the summonses a short memorandum of the orders made; but it does not come to more than this sometimes, that if you get a summons in proper form when issued, the clerk would indorse on the summons "Order as asked," and that goes to the registrar, and he draws the order. He knows the form of order wanted.

47,052. That would be sufficient for the registrar?—Certainly.

47,053. But in the case of more complicated orders resulting from proceedings in chambers, has not a more complicated memorandum to be drawn up for the information of the registrar?—Yes. In that case minutes are prepared generally by the solicitor, carried into chambers, and settled by the master, and then the master indorses the summons with "Order according to the minutes 'signed by me.'" That is the practical way of doing it.

47,054. In a case of that sort there would be some economy of labour if it was all done in one office?—Yes; because I think then the minutes could go at once to the stationer to be copied. In the case you are putting they go to the registrar's office, and are taken in by his third class clerk, who makes a lot of entries in a book. Then it goes to the principal clerk, who pencils on the minutes the formal part of the order, and he sends it to the stationer. I think all that could be saved, because, when you are settling the minutes before the master, it would take scarcely any longer to put in the formal parts of the order.

47,055. Do you see any difficulty in the amalgamation of the office staff of the two offices?—At first, I expect, there would be some difficulty. I do not think the registrar's principal clerks would have quite the experience that they ought to have to do the work of first class clerks. I should not like to say that they would not be able to undertake the work.

47,056. They have had no experience at present of the general work of chambers?—Some of them have not; some have. I can give particular instances where two of them at least have had general experience.

47,057. No doubt, in amalgamating the existing staffs, the difficulty that would occur with regard to masters and registrars would also occur with the staffs; certain individuals would do one side of the work, and you could not have complete interchangeability at once?—Quite so.

47,058. But, ultimately, do you see any difficulty in having a complete amalgamation of the staff?—No, none whatever; because, if you appoint a first class clerk from a solicitor's office, he would have sufficient experience to draft the orders and practically settle them for the registrar or the master to sign, in the same way as he prepares the certificates now.

47,059. A master who has heard the matter would be the person best acquainted with it, and, therefore, if part of his work was drawing up the orders, the best person to draft the order?—Yes; as he does now, in fact. He makes the order in some form or other; sometimes it is shorter, because he knows the registrar has a particular form, and he does not write it all out, but says, "The usual order in an administration action,"—"personal estate," or "real estate," or "at the instance of a creditor," or "at the instance of a legatee." That all has a meaning in the Registrars Office, so a very short endorsement will do. Of course, the master could draw up the order himself without any difficulty.

47,060. Then your opinion would be decidedly in favour of the amalgamation of the two offices?—Certainly, subject to getting a proper staff to carry out the work.

47,061. And your observations about the necessity of appointing men with practical experience in a solicitor's office to the higher classes would apply equally to the Registrars Office?—Certainly.

47,062. That is the system which exists at present in the Registrars Office?—No, I think not. I speak with deference, as I do not know much about the appointments except what I know from attending there, but I think they appoint young solicitors as principal clerks.

47,063. What I meant was that the third class clerks are not eligible for promotion to the higher classes?—No, they are not.

47,064. Appointments are made direct to the higher class of persons who have some knowledge of the law—it may be more or less, but, at any rate, some knowledge?—Certainly. I think the principal clerks are all young solicitors, and, of course, they are engaged entirely in drawing up orders, and by the time they have been there sufficiently long to be appointed registrars, they acquire a very wide knowledge of forms of orders, and things of that sort. The third class clerk simply takes in the papers and gives them out again, and gets no knowledge of the work at all.

47,065. A question has been raised before the Commission as to whether it is desirable to fix an age limit for retirement. Have you known any cases in which it might have been advantageous to have had an age limit?—A few cases. I should not like to particularise.

47,066. No, I do not ask you to name individuals, but you have known cases in which it would have been desirable to apply an age limit?—Yes, I think it would have been an advantage to the individual and to the public that the retirement should have taken place earlier.

47,067. Are there any other points which you would like to mention to the Commission on which you think improvements might be made in the organisation or working of the offices?—I think there is not sufficient work in chambers for the staff. I do not know whether you think that has been dealt with sufficiently.

47,068. You have already mentioned that in your evidence, but you wish to emphasise that you think at present there is not sufficient work for the staff?—Yes.

47,069. You think the staff might be considerably reduced without interfering with efficiency?—Certainly; and I think holidays should not be taken without leave. Saturdays, for instance, are nearly entirely given up to holidays now.

47,070. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Saturday morning?—Yes, the day.

47,071. (Chairman.) Do you find that there is no staff there on Saturdays to attend to the business?—

25 February 1915.]

MR. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT.

I will not say that, but when you are appointed to a public office, and you are supposed to be there every day in the week, including Saturday, I do not think you ought to go away unless the public authority gives you permission.

47,072. As regards the office hours, would it be any advantage to your work if the hours were made longer?—No.

47,073. You prefer that they should remain as they are?—Yes, I think they might start a little earlier sometimes. I have known them to come in at 11 o'clock instead of 10, but I think the hours are 10 to 4.

47,074. Sometimes between 10 and 11 do you not find the whole staff in attendance?—No.

47,075. And you cannot get your work attended to?—We do not often want it, but when we do it is sometimes difficult to get it done.

47,076. With regard to the vacation arrangements, are those adequate for the work that is to be done in vacation?—I think so. The judges are more strict now with vacation work, and I think, now that they are so strict, the work is fairly well done in the vacation. I do not think there is much delay. It is rather a rush from 11 to 2, if you have very heavy matters on.

47,077. Those are the office hours in the vacation?—Yes, 11 to 2, speaking from memory. I do not think there is much to complain of. I always understood that the vacation, according to the rules, was—say, for Christmas, from 24th December until 6th or 7th January. I think the chamber staff take it until the 12th January, when the judges sit. I think things of that sort ought to be altered.

47,078. They take the same vacation as the judges?—I think there is only one set of chambers who attend on those few days. I do not think that is quite right.

47,079. You mentioned that besides the Chancery Offices you have had experience in the Lunacy Office and the Taxing Office?—Yes.

47,080. The Commission has not taken evidence yet about the Lunacy Office, but if there are any points to which you would like to call our attention we shall be very glad to hear them?—There has been a recent Commission on that subject, and I should have thought all the points which would interest the present Commission had been brought in the evidence there.

47,081. You have nothing special to mention which did not appear there?—Off-hand I do not remember anything. They have a very efficient staff there, but then they specialise. They are like the registrars; their work is in a very confined area—a particular class of work for all the clerks.

47,082. (Mr. Boutwood.) I gather that the first class clerks hear simple cases in certain of the Chancery chambers?—Yes.

47,083. But they do not do it in all the chambers?—Yes, certainly. I meant they dealt with them fully.

47,084. But is that the case in all chambers, or only in certain of the chambers?—In all chambers the first class clerk makes orders of some kind, but I do not think the practice as to what they do is uniform.

47,085. It depends, I suppose, on the master?—Yes, I think some of the masters hear their own applications to proceed on orders, and some hear the applications for discovery.

47,086. But more or less of that work is done in all chambers by the first class clerks?—Yes, and they make the orders.

47,087. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You say that in the Long Vacation there is a crush of work between the hours of 11 and 2?—There is sometimes.

47,088. Do you think it would be in the public interest if the hours were lengthened?—I think it would be better if they would sit on Monday. It is only 11 till 2 on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays.

47,089. Then in vacation they do not sit either on Mondays or Saturdays?—No.

47,090. You would have them sit from Monday to Saturday?—No, I would not suggest Saturday in the vacation. You must remember the practitioners as well.

47,091. You suggest Monday to Friday, but why not begin at 10?—I would rather say keep on from 11 till 3. I do not think it would hurt if they sat for another hour.

47,092. With regard to the staffing of these offices, you make practically two proposals: First, that appointments to the higher clerkships should not go by mere promotion to the third class, but should be made by appointing superior and more experienced people; and next, that those appointments should be made by the judge personally?—Yes, by the judge. I think that is of great importance.

47,093. I want to deal with the second point—that these appointments should be made personally by the judge, and normally from among the managing clerks who appear before him. Do you not think there would be some inconvenience if a managing clerk knew that some appointment, which meant a very great deal to him, depended upon the goodwill of the judge before whom he appeared from day to day?—No, I think the judge is beyond that altogether. The class of judges we get would be beyond that altogether. I do not think they would be influenced at all.

47,094. You do not think that a managing clerk who felt that perhaps next week a judge might have to decide between him and another person, would hesitate to slightly offend the judge when in the interests of the client it was necessary?—I do not think so for a moment.

47,095. In the legal profession there has grown up a custom by which valuable appointments, when they are made by individuals, are very often conferred upon the relatives of those individuals?—That is only since this new arrangement, I think. I do not remember a judge making any appointment of a relative. I cannot call one to mind, off-hand.

47,096. But at this present moment, if I look, for instance, at the names of the masters of the Central Office, you would agree that I should find a very large number of the relatives of judges there?—I know one or two names that occur to me, but I do not think that would have affected the judge who appointed them. I do not think that for a moment.

47,097. And in the offices of the Chancery Division you will find a large number of people who are relatives of judges?—That comes about in this way: in the Registrars Office, for instance, the principal clerks are appointed from young solicitors. They have been articled and have passed, and, I think, they must have been admitted a year, or something like that, before being appointed. I suppose the relatives might have asked for a nomination. That is all.

47,098. But there is a custom by which, if a relative asks for a nomination, it is considered no impropriety to promise it?—I should think not, and I know some of the gentlemen who have been appointed have been most able men.

47,099. But, do not you think, seeing that this custom does exist, that if the unchecked appointments to these valuable posts were left with the judge that consideration, namely, that he had promised a nomination to a young relative, might continue to be effective?—I do not think a judge would appoint an incompetent man to his chambers, knowing the work that has to be done.

47,100. He might appoint a competent relative?—I do not see that there is much objection to that.

47,101. But a competent relative would not normally be the managing clerk to a solicitor?—I should doubt if he would appoint a man who had not experience as a managing clerk. Of course a judge is responsible for the work in chambers, or should be, and, I think, he would take care to have a good man there.

47,102. Have you any experience of the Probate Registry, Somerset House?—No, none whatever.

47,103. (Mr. Coward.) You have had great experience with a firm doing a very large amount of business?—Yes, all classes of work.

47,104. And, I should hope, it is thoroughly well done?—I should hope so. I have done my best.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT.

47,105. I was thinking of what you were saying just now—the great competency of the managing clerk from a solicitor's office for an appointment as first class clerk, rather than a clerk who is raised from the lower standards in the same office. I think you will agree with that?—Yes.

47,106. It would be very convenient for us to have an indication of the class of work that the solicitor's clerk does. I suppose I am right in saying that, practically speaking, you are more often than not at one or other or all of the chambers from 11 o'clock, or 10.30, until 4 in the afternoon?—Yes, as I say, the greater part of my life is spent in chambers.

47,107. Before you attend these applications and matters in chambers, you have to master them?—Yes, I have to read them all up and read the evidence. In some cases we prepare the summons if it is our application.

47,108. You certainly do not go to the master without knowing what you are going to talk about?—We have to know not only the subject of the application and the evidence, but we have to know the practice and the law to a great extent. We have to look it all up.

47,109. Certainly; and I suppose you would confer in any matter of difficulty with your principals?—Yes.

47,110. So that you have the advantage not only of your own, but of their experience?—Yes, and in some cases we go to junior counsel.

47,111. And you go to counsel and get their opinion?—Certainly.

47,112. So you go to the masters' chambers armed with knowledge of the case and knowledge of the law applicable to it?—Certainly; it would be no use going without that.

47,113. Having done your work in chambers, which brings you to 4 o'clock in the afternoon, then you have to go back, and I suppose do all the routine of your office?—Certainly; we then write our letters, reporting to and advising clients.

47,114. You do a large agency business, do you not?—Very large.

47,115. That means to say that you act in those matters for solicitors who are in the country?—Yes.

47,116. Therefore, you have, after each one of these cases has been dealt with, in addition to report to your principals in the country?—Certainly.

47,117. You write long letters that will explain to them what has been done?—Yes, and advise them what to do.

47,118. What to do in the future?—Yes; and very often we have letters asking our advice as to the course to be taken in particular cases, and for the purpose of answering those letters we have to look into the law and practice before advising our clients.

47,119. Again, you have similarly the opportunity of consulting your principals, who would advise you what to write, or probably write themselves, to the clients in the country?—The practice in our office is for us to write the letters. The principal sees them, and reads them, and if there is nothing wrong, he signs them.

47,120. What sort of time do you get away after that work is done? You are back in the office at 4 o'clock. Can you get away at 6 or half-past 6?—Usually, because I get there early in the morning—about a quarter to 9—and do a lot of work in the morning. I am at my work the best part of an hour before any one comes; and if I have affidavits to settle, or things of that sort, sometimes I may take them home.

47,121. What time do you get away in the evening?—About 6 or half-past. I do not like working at night. I like working in the morning, so I go an hour earlier in the morning.

47,122. Contrasting that experience with the experience of a third class or second class clerk in the masters' chambers, can there be any question whatever about it as to the efficiency of the two men?—You cannot compare the two.

47,123. They are not comparable?—No, the man in chambers issues summonses, enters appointments in a book, puts the papers away, keeps them in order, and gets them out for the master, and that sort of thing.

47,124. As to the vacation, the clerks in the masters' offices, or in many of them, have the whole of the vacation?—I know they do. I think it is very unfair. We only get a short time. We have to work longer hours and do all the work, as it were, and get a very much shorter vacation.

47,125. And are very much shorter, probably, in other ways, too?—Yes, with longer hours to work.

47,126. And the clerks in chambers are very well remunerated?—I certainly think they are very well remunerated.

47,127. I do not think you would have any difficulty in filling up their posts if there were any vacancies?—None whatever. There are plenty of able managing clerks about—comparatively young men.

47,128. You do not think it would be desirable to extend the hours of work? Supposing you reduce the staff in these various offices, would not it be possible to give them increased work to do after you and people like yourself have done their work before them?—I think an efficient clerk in the office could well do all the work necessary within the present hours of 10 till 4.

47,129. But I am suggesting to you that the number is too great?—When I suggested that there is room for reduction, I meant that those left could do the work just as well in the time, and there would not be too much work for them to do. I am quite sure that at the present time the work in chambers does not justify such a large staff, and if the staff were reduced I am quite sure they ought to be able to do the work in the same hours.

47,130. I have no doubt that in your office the clerks are not promoted by questions of seniority?—No.

47,131. Nobody ever heard of such a thing in a solicitor's office?—No.

47,132. Nor did you ever hear, I should think, of clerks who received an addition to their salaries entirely irrespective of their ability or progress?—No. I think, speaking generally, that would be unheard of in a private office.

47,133. I think, perhaps, you would agree with me that these salaries that are given in the Chancery offices are very very large?—I think they are generous—very ample for the position.

47,134. (Miss Haldane.) How does a clerk come in in your office?—We generally get him as a boy. I went in when I had had some previous experience. I had been six years in a solicitor's office before, and then I took the position of assistant Chancery clerk. After I had been there three years, I think it was, I was appointed managing clerk.

47,135. Then you take a boy in without any certificates of any kind?—Yes, we take a boy from school and we get a reference from the schoolmaster. That is all.

47,136. Then he does not require to have any special knowledge when he comes into your office?—No, not as a boy. We train him up. We have several in the office now who have been in since they were boys and are still with us, now married men with families.

47,137. And they learn their business as they go along?—Yes.

47,138. When you speak of the hours in vacation, does that apply to all the clerks, or are you speaking of yourself only, as managing clerk?—The hours in our office in the vacation are the same as at other times. We do not get shorter hours; it is only the officials who get shorter hours.

47,139. You were comparing your office hours with theirs?—I was speaking of the hours of the officials at the chambers of the judges or the courts. The hours in solicitors' offices are almost the same in vacation as at other times; we do not get much shorter time than at ordinary times. But I think Saturdays might be left out in the vacation, because we do get off sometimes a little earlier on Saturday afternoons.

47,140. (Bishop of Southwark.) When you said you went to the office at 9 o'clock in the morning and stayed till 6, that did not mean that everybody in the office did?—No.

47,141. (Miss Haldane.) I thought you said you went to the office about 9?—About a quarter to 9.

47,142. Does that apply to the whole office or merely to yourself?—The office hours are 9.45 to 6.

47,143. And the vacations are how much? They depend on the standing of the clerk, I suppose?—Yes.

25 February 1915.]

Mr. WILLIS GILBERT OAKSHOTT.

47,144. (Chairman.) Would the clerks in your office often have to stop beyond 6 o'clock?—Certainly, if there is any work to be done. We have no office hours.

47,145. But does it frequently happen that they stay until after 6?—Certainly.

47,146. (Mr. Coward.) They stay till the work is over?—Yes; they stay till the work is over. I frequently have consultations until after 6.

47,147. What is the length of the vacation for all your clerks? Do you graduate it?—Yes.

47,148. I suppose you get a month?—Yes.

47,149. And nobody would get more, except the principals?—No.

47,150. And the others, down to the boys, would get three weeks or a fortnight?—I think boys, when they first come in, only get 10 days for a year or so, and then a fortnight, going up to three weeks.

47,151. (Sir John Kempe.) You spoke of a great improvement in the offices of late years. Do you attribute that to the change in the rules or to the alterations in the staff?—That is only because there is so much less work. I say there is a great improvement as regards delay.

47,152. Is that due to any alteration of the rules of the Court?—I think it is because there is so much less work in chambers, consequent on the alteration in the procedure made by the rules.

47,153. Less work, of course, depends upon the public outside?—Certainly. I was before a master to-day, and he could have given me the whole of the day, he had so little to do.

47,154. You do not think there is any great improvement in the staff of late, and you prefer the old system of appointment?—I prefer the old system of appointment. I do not like to say anything about the present staff.

47,155. You think the important qualification is experience gathered by long time at the work?—Certainly.

47,156. And you think a young man, entering as third class clerk, cannot learn the work in the same way as a solicitor's clerk does?—No, because he does not do the work. The man outside does the work himself; the man in the office does not; he simply sits and does the same thing day after day.

47,157. But you said that sometimes a third class clerk is competent to be raised to a second class clerk?—Yes; of course there are different classes of men appointed, and some have had experience in a solicitor's office.

47,158. But if a man is competent to be raised from third to second class, is it not possible that he would also improve so much as to be competent to be raised from the second to the first class?—Not necessarily, because the work in the first class is much more responsible work, and is a different class of work altogether.

47,159. Has that anything to do with the class of men you get now, or do you think, if the men were more picked to begin with, they could assimilate the work more quickly?—Not unless they had experience beforehand.

47,160. They must have experience?—Undoubtedly, I think experience is necessary.

47,161. You speak of the Chancery work only. You know nothing about the Central Office?—I cannot speak much about the Central Office. I do know something of the Writ and Appearance offices, and I should think the appointments there might be made as they are now in Chancery chambers. I think they do all their work together there, and I think they might be promoted from one class to another.

47,162. Do you think you could get enough men from the third class if they had no prospects at all beyond?—I think so. We used to get them.

47,163. You would get quite a lower class of man for the third class if you started to bring in men of older age and experience to the second or first class?—They always used to get them. I do not know whether the salaries in the old days of third class clerks were a little more than they are now. It is a long time ago since an alteration was made, and I would not like to charge my memory. It may be that they had a little more salary to start with. We always used to get very good men as third class clerks.

47,164. (Mr. Shipley.) When you stop at the office after hours, are you paid overtime?—No.

47,165. Are none of the clerks?—No; or else my salary would be largely increased.

47,166. With regard to pensions, is there any system for pensioning in your office?—There is no system, but I am glad to say that in our office the principals always make some allowance to clerks who have been in their service a great many years.

47,167. You are treated generously?—Yes.

47,168. But there must be many firms of the "Dodson and Fogg" type whom I cannot imagine giving any pension?—No pension at all. It is the exception rather than the rule. It may be said that in agency offices we do not get large salaries, and that may have something to do with our getting some allowance after we leave the service.

47,169. Is there any particular insurance company that deals especially with clerks of lawyers?—We have a Law Clerks' Society, which is a sort of insurance, and we get a superannuation from them. It is a very good society. The subscriptions I pay is 15s. a month, and there is 50l. on death, and I should be entitled to 14s. a week superannuation if I were not able to work now.

47,170. (Mr. Matheson.) I understand you consider the work of the third class clerks to be purely mechanical clerical work?—Nearly so.

47,171. Your proposal would be to make that a self-contained class which would have merely a clerical qualification, and not a technical one at all?—That is so.

47,172. (Bishop of Southwark.) I want to be quite clear whether, in your opinion, the scheme of amalgamation would secure just the one advantage of economy of staff, or would there be any other advantages?—I do not think so.

47,173. That one thing would be attained; you would get the same work done, and just as efficiently, only it would be done by fewer people?—A great saving of staff I should think, because the third class clerk in chambers can do the third class clerk's work of the Registrars Office as well as his own.

47,174. And you do not apprehend any difficulties or disadvantages?—At first I think there would be some difficulty and disadvantage. I think there would be some difficulty in getting the present staff in chambers to do all the work of the registrars.

47,175. (Chairman.) During the transition there would be some difficulty?—Yes.

47,176. (Bishop of Southwark.) You will have to build up a new generation?—Yes, but I suppose, if the present staff of registrars were taken over, by the time they were extinct the amalgamation would have been complete.

47,177. (Mr. Boutwood.) And ultimately I suppose there would be a saving of time?—Certainly, there is a great deal of time taken up in endorsing summonses and taking them to the registrar, because you are supposed to leave a day for this, and a day for that, and a day for the other.

47,178. (Mr. Coward.) How long does it take to draw a Chancery order?—You can get them done most expeditiously. If they are really needed, and if you put your back into it, you can get the master to endorse the summons on the same day, and you can take it round to the registrar and see the principal clerk, and if he knows you he will get on with it, and perhaps you will get it the next day, or in case of injunctions the same day, but they are very special and very short.

47,179. But, speaking generally, it takes several days?—Yes, it is very quick work to get an order drawn up in fourteen days; you cannot always do it.

47,180. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would a solicitor's clerk not known to the officials get worse treatment?—You know what it is—you go round and you know the man, and you say, "I want this done."

47,181. If he knows you well and is friendly he does it?—Not particularly friendly, but if you have been round the chambers a long time and he knows who you are, if you go round and say, "This is an urgent matter, will you get it done at once," he will do it for you. I find them very obliging in that way.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 3rd March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK.
 The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
 Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
 Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.
 Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
 Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
 Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. JOHN ROGER BURROW GREGORY (a member of the Council of the Law Society), called and examined.
 Mr. EDMUND RALPH COOK (Secretary of the Law Society) was in attendance.

47,182. (Chairman.) You are a solicitor and a member of the firm of Rawle, Johnstone & Co.?—I am.

47,183. And before that had you read in chambers?—I had, in the chambers of the late Mr. Wolstenholme and in the chambers of the late Mr. Danckwerts, as a pupil of course.

47,184. And you come before the Commission to-day as representing the Law Society, of the council of which you are a member?—Yes. The Council of the Law Society have seen the statement of my evidence and generally approve of it; but it may be that in the course of your questions to me I may say something for which I should prefer to take personal responsibility entirely.

47,185. Your work as a solicitor has brought you more especially, I think, into contact with the Chancery Division?—It has with both divisions.

47,186. You have had contact with the King's Bench Division?—Yes, I have.

47,187. And with the other divisions, the Probate Division and Bankruptcy?—Yes, with practically everything, from the House of Lords to the County Court.

47,188. In the first place, as regards the masters of the King's Bench Division, the Commission has already had evidence as to the nature of their work, but we should like to have your opinion first of all as to how that work is done?—I think the work is done on the whole very satisfactorily. The masters, taking them as a body, are quite competent people, and are well capable of dealing with the work they have to deal with, and I think the work on the whole is well done. There is no serious delay, though just at the present moment there is a temporary delay owing to the emergency legislation, which has involved applications to enforce judgment in each case. The only complaint I have to make about the King's Bench masters' method of doing their business is the way in which they do it, that is to say, the conduct of their lists.

47,189. Will you explain that a little more fully?—When you go to attend a summons in chambers before a master in the King's Bench Division you have to find your opponent amongst, I do not think I speak too strongly, a howling mob of clerks. You call out the name of your opponent, and you get his clerk on the other side. Then you are rushed into a room full of a large number of clerks or parties who may be attending to the business, and the man who is able to force his way to the table first, and get his summons across the table to the master, is generally taken first. That is unsatisfactory. It only requires a little organisation. They should deal with their lists as the masters in the Chancery Division do, that is to say, people come into the room and sit down, and come up to the table as the master calls the case: It only requires a little thought and trouble, and it could be perfectly well done.

47,190. Are not the cases taken in the order in which they appear in the list?—They are taken in batches; there are so many summonses for 11 o'clock, so many for 11.30, and so on, and then that batch goes in. Then there is a second call.

47,191. In each batch are not the cases taken in the order in which they are printed in the list of that batch?—No, they are not, really.

47,192. (Lord Mersey.) Is not that because the people are not there?—It is sometimes, of course; and then, if your opponent is not there, you are asked to wait for the second call.

47,193. (Chairman.) Does the master not call each case as he comes to it in the list, and, if the practitioners are there, are they not heard in their proper turn?—It is in this way. I should be outside the door and my opponent would call out, "Rawle and Company," and I should say, "Here." Then we should hand our summons to the usher outside the door, who would take it in his hand, and when he had got five, six, seven, or eight, he would take them into the master's room and hand them to the master; and then they would come out practically in the order in which the usher had handed them in to the master. I have here—I do not know whether you would care to see it—one of the chamber lists. That (producing the same) is the King's Bench chamber list of yesterday or to-day. You see there are a great number of summonses there for 11 o'clock. They cannot all be heard at 11, some of those would come on at 12.30 or 1 o'clock.

47,194. Then would your suggestion be that the order in the list should be more closely followed?—I think that the list should be broken up into half-hours, so that the second call might come more quickly. I am sure that the masters, if they turned their attention to it, could do it with much greater convenience. And it involves a very great amount of waste of time.

47,195. Apart from that, have you any other criticism of the manner in which the business is done?—No, I do not think I have. I think on the whole it is done very well.

47,196. As regards the arrears that you have mentioned, we have been told that the amount of arrears is now diminishing, owing to the steps that have been taken to clear them off?—Yes, it is. I think it is merely temporary.

47,197. As regards the selection of persons to be appointed masters, at present I think all the masters in the King's Bench Division are barristers?—Yes, they are, I think.

47,198. The statutory qualification enables either a barrister or a solicitor to be appointed?—It does.

47,199. But as a matter of custom and practice they are all barristers?—They are.

47,200. Is that in your opinion desirable, or would you suggest any change?—Speaking as a solicitor for solicitors, I do not see why solicitors should not be appointed. The best master I think I ever knew was a solicitor.

47,201. A master in the King's Bench Division?—Yes. There are no solicitors there now, and I do not know why they should not be appointed; they are quite competent to deal with the work. But there is not so much reason for appointing a solicitor as master in the King's Bench Division as there is in the Chancery Division, because in the King's Bench Division the masters have no control of a staff; in the Chancery Division they have.

47,202. In the King's Bench Division the whole of the office staff is controlled, as we have been told, by a committee of masters, and therefore by the senior master?—Yes, but it is a very different kind of staff, and there is not the personal touch between a King's Bench master and his staff that there is between a Chancery master and his staff.

47,203. You mean that the staff is not divided into sections, each section attached to a particular master?—No, the work does not involve the necessity of it. A King's Bench master makes an order yes or no as a rule right away; a Chancery master's work generally involves some account or something to be done upon the direction that he gives, which is done by his clerk.

47,204. What are the qualities produced by a solicitor's training which you think necessary for a King's Bench master?—For a King's Bench master I do not think that a solicitor's qualities are so necessary if only for the one reason alone, that he has not to control a staff; if I may I would rather put it in this way: that it is not essential that a King's Bench master should be a solicitor, but that it is essential that a Chancery master should be a solicitor. At the same time I do not see why some solicitors should not be appointed King's Bench masters.

47,205. I will read to you a sentence from Sir John Macdonell's evidence, and ask your opinion about it. He is speaking of the question as to whether barristers or solicitors are more suitable for appointment as masters of the King's Bench, and he says: "The master has to deal with applications with regard to pleadings, for example—a large portion of his duties relates to pleadings, statements of claims and of defence and replies, and so on. A practising junior barrister has spent a considerable portion of his life in dealing with such questions. A solicitor has probably been occupied otherwise, and possibly more profitably than in dealing with those matters." What do you say to that?—I was almost going to say the same thing myself. In the King's Bench Division of course they do have to make applications with regard to pleadings; but I believe that an ordinary solicitor, such as the master I referred to just now, would be absolutely competent to deal with the question whether a man should give particulars of the deficiency of an engine, or whether he should answer further interrogatories, or whether his statement of claim shows any ground of action or not. I believe that the education of our profession and the practice of our profession are quite sufficient to qualify men to do that equally well as the ordinary barrister who is appointed a master.

47,206. Then you do not put it higher than this—that a solicitor of suitable personal qualifications would be equally well qualified for appointment as master?—I do not want to put it higher than that; I do not say that he is better for a King's Bench master, but I do for a Chancery master.

47,207. Then as regards the taxing masters, the Commission have had evidence as to the nature of their work, but here again we should like to have your opinion as to the most suitable persons for appointment?—I have no hesitation whatever in saying that a solicitor, and a solicitor only, should be appointed a taxing master.

47,208. What are your reasons for that opinion?—My reasons are that he has to deal with bills of costs in respect of work done in a solicitor's office, and it is only the training of a solicitor that enables him to know whether the work has been well or badly done.

One of the chief duties to my mind of a taxing master is not so much to allow for the work he sees before him as to allow remuneration for the work that he does not see before him; I mean to say the work that has been done in eliminating the chaff and producing the grain. For instance, a man may put a very poor brief before counsel and it may be an enormous document, and that sort of solicitor might think he would be entitled to a larger remuneration for a brief of that kind, whereas his opponent in the same case might have prepared a brief that covered but a few pages, but the brief on the few pages might contain the whole substance of the case and be a far more valuable document than the long brief. It is only a man who has been brought up in a solicitor's office who can, if I may say so, spot such things as that.

47,209. A barrister has to use the brief?—Yes.

47,210. Would not a barrister very quickly perceive that the brief contained a large amount of matter that was of no use to him and not essential to the presentation of the case?—I do not think he would. I have used the instance of a brief, but, of course, I must take all other documents. And then another thing that a taxing master has very often to do is to see whether the costs have been increased in any way by the solicitor's over caution, or, perhaps, by his being a little nervous and getting a little too much evidence; or he has to see whether a solicitor has taken the longer route when he might have taken the shorter one; and there are very many things that are only done in a solicitor's office, because the counsel never really sees the conduct of the case till the brief is before him, except when he draws pleadings and advises on evidence; and it does seem to me to be absolutely essential that the taxing master should be a solicitor. There is one taxing master who is not a solicitor.

47,211. At present the statutory qualification allows of the appointment of either a barrister or a solicitor?—Yes, it does.

47,212. The senior taxing master who appeared before the Commission expressed the opinion that it might be desirable sometimes to appoint a barrister; he thought that to have an element of that side of the profession represented among the taxing masters would be an advantage. You would not agree with that view?—No, I should not. I do not wish to say that I am raising any objection to the present taxing master, who is a barrister—he has been there some time, and has acquired a knowledge of the work, and I am not for a moment going to say that he is not satisfactory; but we have always looked upon it, you know, as rather a privilege of our profession that our bills of costs should be dealt with by one of ourselves.

47,213. You think that is the most suitable way?—I certainly do. I do not think there can be a shadow of a doubt about it. Anybody knowing the work of a solicitor's office, from the office boy to the senior partner, must see that there are a hundred and one things that can only be dealt with properly by a man who has actually done the work himself, and seen it done.

47,214. As regards the clerks in the taxing master's office, they take some part in the preliminary operations of taxing, a preliminary scrutiny of the bills?—Yes.

47,215. What qualifications and experience do you think are necessary for them?—I think they should be solicitors' clerks who have done the work themselves.

47,216. You think that a man who came in without experience in a solicitor's office would have a difficulty in learning the work?—I think he would have the greatest difficulty. I do not think he would ever learn it; it is really a sort of knowledge that you can only acquire by doing the work yourself; it is knowledge that you cannot get from books or reading, you can only absorb it.

47,217. If suitable persons, with some experience in a solicitor's office, were appointed as clerks, do you think they should be eligible for promotion as masters?—No, I do not. I think that the qualifications of a master and the qualifications of a clerk are entirely distinct. There are clerks, of course, who become partners in various firms, and good partners, but not as a rule. You see, when you get to a master there is a higher discretion exercised; and I think that, as a general rule, a man who has passed in as a first or second class clerk is not in the least degree competent to be promoted to master. The period for which he has been a clerk is of itself against it. He will not have become qualified under ordinary circumstances for, perhaps, 15 years, and by that time he is so imbued with the duties of a clerk that he has lost touch with the outside world, and—it is very difficult to express it—but he is a clerk and not a master, and always will be a clerk. If you promoted that man to master you would get a little mind; you would not get the broad mind that you get in a man who is just taken fresh from active practice and contact with his own profession and with the Bar, that you need for the appointment of a master.

3 March 1915.] Mr. JOHN ROGER BURROW GREGORY. (Mr. EDMUND RALPH COOK was in attendance.)

47,218. You mean that he would be inclined to attach too much importance to the small technicalities?—Yes; and not to exercise discretion.

47,219. On the other hand, during all his experience as a clerk he has been constantly seeing in what manner the master exercises his discretion?—Yes, but I do not think the advantage of that is to be compared with the disadvantage of the fact that he has been for a long time removed from the active practice of his profession.

47,220. That disadvantage, if I understand you aright, is rather a question of the whole mental attitude and standpoint than a question of actual knowledge or experience?—In the Chancery Division, as you know, we have to deal, I do not say every day, but very frequently, with questions that are really domestic questions: whether a ward of Court should be sent to Eton or say to Tonbridge, whether another ward of Court should be allowed to marry, whether the heirlooms of one of the show houses of England should be sold or not, and how that sale should be carried out—the master would probably decide that—whether a mother should be allowed 400*l.* or 1,000*l.* a year for the maintenance of her child. All cases of that sort are things that require tact and discretion, and tact and discretion that you would not get in a man who had been working to a certain extent in a groove for 10, 15, or 20 years.

47,221. You are dealing now rather with the question of Chancery masters?—I am.

47,222. Would these remarks apply equally to the taxing masters? Surely they have not questions coming before them requiring the kind of discretion you have been describing?—They do apply to taxing masters quite as well for this reason: One of the most difficult items that a taxing master has to deal with, if he is taxing a party and party bill of costs, is the item known as "Instructions for brief," which is a general item allowed to the solicitor for getting up the case. It is not every one who knows the work that is involved in getting up a case, even when the papers do not show it; they may rather do the reverse—the less the papers the greater the work sometimes. You want a man fresh from the work, who has done the work himself, to form a proper judgment on it, and you must remember that these clerks are taken from their profession fairly young.

47,223. Before we leave the question of taxing masters, I should like to ask whether you have any criticisms to offer as to the manner in which the work is done or organised in that department?—At present, none whatever. If I had been in this room 10 or 15 years ago I might have had a good deal to say. At present I think the work is very satisfactorily done. You have quite a competent set of men there. You have seen the senior master yourself, and I think the work is well done and very fairly done as between the solicitors and the public.

47,224. There are no arrears?—No, there are no substantial arrears.

47,225. The senior master told us that so far as there were arrears they were rather from delay on the part of solicitors, than on the part of the public. Would you agree to that?—I do not know. I myself am always anxious to get the bill taxed, and the amount allowed and the sum paid; but there are some of us who perhaps do not vouch their bills or leave their bills in the office; I dare say that may be true, but personally I have not experienced any delay in the taxing master's office. There used to be delay, but there is not now. You get a master sometimes who may have a very heavy bill; for example, some little time ago the Water Board bill was dealt with in the taxing master's office and that threw the master in arrear; or you might get a great big bill involving enormous expenditure like that American legitimacy case the other day, that would throw the particular master who got it rather in arrear. But those things pass off and equalise themselves.

47,226. Turning now to Chancery chambers, some of the remarks that you have already made apply to the work of the Chancery masters. That work is very different in its character from the work of the masters in the King's Bench Division?—Yes; it is much more administrative.

47,227. Much more administrative and much less purely judicial?—Yes.

47,228. At present the appointment of a Chancery master is confined, I think, to a solicitor?—Yes, by statute. You see they were chief clerks, and then their name was altered to masters.

47,229. And you are of opinion that that qualification should be maintained?—Most strongly. Their work is solicitor's work. For instance, one of the things they have to do is they have to conduct sales of property that is sold under order of the Court, they have to fix reserve bids, to settle the conditions of sale, appoint the auctioneer, fix his remuneration and fix his security—work which is done always by solicitors and never by barristers.

47,230. In dealing with matters of that sort, say fixing the conditions of sale and the reserve, is the initiative with the Chancery masters or is it with the solicitor; does the solicitor put before them suggestions on which they have to decide, or do they have to initiate suggestions themselves?—The initiative is with the solicitor; he carries in his draft particulars and his draft conditions and he nominates the auctioneer.

47,231. So that in all cases the master's discretion is a discretion exercised on something that is put before him, not on something he has to invent or initiate himself?—No; on a suggestion put before him.

47,232. But your view is that the discretion which he has to exercise is so closely akin to the discretion that a solicitor is exercising in the course of his business, that a solicitor's experience is the only experience that is suitable as a preliminary qualification?—Certainly; in fact, he is doing in his chambers in cases under the Court the work that the solicitors are doing in their offices in cases not under the Court.

47,233. Have you any criticisms or suggestions to offer as to the manner in which the work is done there, and as to the organisation of the office of the masters?—That question brings me to the question of Registrars. I think that the system under which the judges have their own staff of masters and masters' clerks is a very good system indeed; they are in touch with one another, and I think there is a certain amount of esprit de corps between the various divisions; they each like to see their work done the best. I think it would be an improvement if the judge's staff was completed by having a registrar attached to him who could draw up his orders, otherwise I think the organisation of the office good. Whether it is overstaffed or not is another matter.

47,234. From your point of view, the work is satisfactorily done in Chancery chambers?—Most certainly; excellently done.

47,235. And there is no delay there?—There is no delay at all. There, again, there used to be delay years ago, but there is not now.

47,236. Would you suggest that the registrars should be attached to particular Chancery judges or to particular groups?—To particular groups.

47,237. As the masters are at present?—Yes. As you know, perhaps, there are three sets of two judges each, a very excellent arrangement that has done much to decrease delay.

47,238. That would amount, I presume, to an amalgamation of the masters and the registrars; or would you retain the organisation of the Registrars Office separate?—I think they should be amalgamated.

47,239. You are aware that that question has been considered by several commissions and committees?—Yes.

47,240. I think you were a member of one committee?—Yes.

47,241. That was the Kekewich Committee of 1907?—Yes.

47,242. A previous committee, the Esher Committee of 1886, had, I think, recommended that amalgamation should be brought about?—Yes.

47,243. In fact, they carried their recommendation further; they would have amalgamated the taxing masters' and the registrars' offices?—Yes.

47,244. But in the committee of which you were a member, the Kekewich Committee of 1907, I think at that time the opinion of the Chancery judges was unfavourable to amalgamation, and the Committee accepted their opinion; was that not the case?—Yes, that was so. Mr. Stewart, the present Public Trustee, and Mr. Winterbotham, the present Official Solicitor, and myself differed on that, and we signed a minority memorandum.

47,245. Then you were in favour of amalgamation of the two offices?—Yes, we were.

47,246. Would the amalgamation of which you are in favour amount to a complete identification of the masters and registrars? I mean, in future appointments, would you consider that the person appointed should be able to perform the duties of master or registrar indifferently, or would you still keep the persons separate?—I think it would be better that you should have a group of masters; that they should all be masters.

47,247. That they should all be masters, and that they should combine with their present functions as masters the function of drawing up orders?—Yes.

47,248. You see no difficulty about it?—No, I do not. It would require, of course, a certain amount of thought in the actual arrangements, but, generally, I see no difficulty in it.

47,249. Naturally there would be a period of transition during which existing officers would continue to perform their existing functions?—Yes.

47,250. But the amalgamation could be gradually brought about as regards new appointments?—Yes. Might I refer you to our Report for one moment?

47,251. If you please?—In our minority Report on page 7, if you have it before you, we said: "In recommending that the staff of the Registrars Office be divided into three groups, each adequate to deal with the orders made by one pair of judges and their masters, we recognise that if this proposal be carried out it will be easy, if thought desirable, at any future time to carry out in its entirety the recommendations of Lord Esher's Committee, referred to in our Report, with which we are in accord."

47,252. Quite so; then as the first step you would recommend the attachment of particular registrars to particular groups of judges—that step to lead on to the further step of amalgamation?—I think that would be one of the most convenient ways of doing it.

47,253. Do you find that any inconvenience is caused by the present separation of the two offices of masters and registrars?—Yes, I do. A judge makes an order, and in drawing up that order some difficulty arises; you find perhaps that some remote infant has not been made a party, or that somebody has died, or there may be some little doubt what the judge meant. In that case we have to go back to the judge to do what is known as "speaking to the Court on the Minutes." That involves briefing counsel and so on. If it was all in the judge's own staff we should merely ask the master or the registrar, whichever you might like to call him at that time, to mention it to the judge or to put it in the judge's list on Monday, and we could go and ask the judge; it would all be much more under his own control.

47,254. In fact it increases the complication of the operations you have mentioned to have the separate offices?—Yes.

47,255. As regards the persons to be appointed, would your remarks in reference to Chancery masters apply to the registrars also?—Yes, more especially if they are going to be masters.

47,256. Turning now to the clerks, do you think that the present system of appointment produces satisfactory results?—In every office, of course, you must have certain items which are not of the very first class, and you have a considerable number of clerks here, some of whom are better than others; but, on the whole, you get a very intelligent businesslike set of men as first, second, and third class clerks.

47,257. The suggestion has been made that the clerks should be recruited by competition, either open or limited; what is your opinion as to that suggestion?—I have never been a good examinee myself, if I may say so, and I think that competitive examination in a case of this kind would be absolutely disastrous.

47,258. On what grounds do you think that?—First of all, I do not believe that anybody could propound a set of questions which would test the efficiency of a person for these appointments.

47,259. In the competition which is applied in the Civil Service generally, the method, generally speaking, is not to examine the candidates in the subject matter with which they would have to deal after appointment, but in general educational subjects; on the theory that if you get the best man in intellectual qualities and equipment, as shown by examination, you will probably get the best man for any particular work he may be put to. You consider that that theory is not applicable to the appointment of clerks in the Chancery offices?—Yes, and I will give you an example to the contrary. We have a very stiff honours examination in our solicitors' profession, and, of course, the majority of men who take first class and high honours in our examination do well, and are good men; but in my own experience I have known men take, I will not say first class honours, but honours, and do very well in their examination, whom I would not have had in my office as clerks at 50l. a year, so unpractical may they be.

47,260. Those would be exceptional cases?—Of course, they are exceptional.

47,261. I think you have already said that you consider previous experience in a solicitor's office important as a qualification for appointment as clerk?—I think I might say essential.

47,262. Supposing the examination were competitive, but only open to persons who have served a certain time in a solicitor's office, what would your view be?—That would mitigate the evil.

47,263. But still you are of opinion that it would not produce suitable clerks?—I do not think you would get the best men by competition. You would get the man who did himself most justice in the examination room, but I do not think you would get the man who was the best practical worker.

47,264. Do you think that under the present system, you necessarily get the man who is the best practical worker?—You get a very satisfactory set of men, and I am unable to suggest any better way of selecting them.

47,265. Would your opinion apply equally to the Central Office?—Yes, I think it would. The work at the Central Office is rather more mechanical than the work of clerks to Chancery masters; it consists in issuing or stamping the same sort of documents day after day; there is not quite the variety that there is in the Chancery Division.

47,266. An intelligent young man could learn the work of most branches of the Central Office in a very short time, without previous legal experience?—Yes, I think he could.

47,267. Is it your view that the clerical staff should, in most cases, as at present, be recruited from the bottom; that is to say, by appointment to the third class, with subsequent promotion, or that direct appointments should be made to the higher offices?—I think I have used the expression in the statement that I put in that, in my opinion, selection, as distinguished from seniority, is absolutely essential to efficiency. If you allow a man to move up merely by seniority, the probability is that you get the worst to the top.

47,268. Why the worst? I can understand it if you say the average?—You get the man who stops on longest.

47,269. Does the good man leave earlier than the indifferent man?—He may get into some other department.

47,270. If he is really a good man, he may rise to something higher outside the office?—Yes.

47,271. In fact you get the sediment rising to the top?—You do, if you can use that little Irishism; but I think that expresses it.

47,272. And that must be discouraging to the good man?—Yes; but I realise the difficulty, of course, in selection. You must get people to select who are willing to take upon themselves the responsibility of the selection. I think in the Chancery Division that ought to be easily done. I think the masters ought each year to furnish their judges, or whoever the selecting authorities may be, with a list of their clerks, in order of merit, or indicate who are the best, and then, when the time comes for promotion from one class to another, the judge, or the selecting body, would have something before them from which they might select the best men.

47,273. Is there not some difficulty when you have the clerks attached to individual masters, in getting a common standard of comparison for promotion?—Their work is pretty well identical, and the man who would be the best third class clerk to Mr. A. would probably, on promotion, be the best second class clerk to Mr. B.

47,274. On the other hand, different persons, as you know, have very different standards of excellence. Would there not be some difficulty in getting a common standard?—There is the human element, of course, which none of us can eliminate.

47,275. But irrespective of difficulties of that kind, you think that promotion ought to be entirely on merit?—I do, and not either by seniority or by interest.

47,276. Then you would be in favour, in some cases at any rate, of direct appointment to the upper classes?—Yes, but with very great care. You see, the injustice of that is that you may inflict very serious hardship upon the people below by stopping promotion.

47,277. The suggestion has been made with regard to some of the offices that the work of the third class is so different in kind from the work of the higher classes that it would be desirable to have a complete, or nearly complete, bar between them; to recruit for the third class men who would not expect to rise above the maximum salary of the third class, and to recruit the higher classes entirely on a different basis: to recruit direct for the second class, and to fill vacancies in the first class by promoting from the second or even occasionally to recruit direct to the first class. Do you think it would be desirable to make a complete separation of that kind?—I do not see why you should erect an insurmountable barrier at the top of any class, because you may find that you have in that class a man who is quite competent to go up into another class. For instance, the last clerk who left me to go into the office went in as a third class clerk and has proved himself an excellent man and has now become a second class clerk, and no doubt when his turn comes to be a first class clerk he will be equally good. If you had had the bar that is suggested that man would never have moved out of the third class.

47,278. So that you would leave the possibility of promotion from the third class, but would make outside appointments as well to the higher classes?—Yes, promotion from the third class subject to selection. If you could not count upon a good enough man in the third class to promote to the second class, you must take somebody from the outside.

47,279. A man would be subject to a very severe scrutiny; that is to say, he would not be promoted to the second class unless he was capable, in time, of doing the best work done by the first class?—That is so.

47,280. Do you think it would be an advantage to have a certain element with outside experience brought in to the upper classes?—In moderation.

47,281. Where would you get that element from; from what class would you recruit it?—From young admitted solicitors I should think, if you are going to appoint first class clerks, or middle-aged managing clerks.

47,282. I was referring to the suggestion that appointments should be made to the second class with prospects of promotion to the first class?—There are many young admitted solicitors, and also men of middle age, managing clerks. I think you have had Mr. Oakshott before you?

47,283. Yes?—He is the type of man I rather refer to, although perhaps he may be a little older than the man I should wish to appoint.

47,284. What sort of age do you suggest for appointment?—I think he ought to have had about seven or eight years' practice; that would bring him to about, say, 29 to 32.

47,285. That is considerably younger than most of the clerks at present promoted to the second class?—Yes; but you would, I hope, be taking a very good man.

47,286. Do you think it would be better to take a good man at that age than later?—I think it would, because you would have a difficulty rather later in getting a really good man. If he was a really good man he would be well in sight of a partnership by that time.

47,287. Turning now to the question of the hours of attendance at the offices, do you think that the present hours are suitable?—Of course the hours of the masters and of the clerks in the offices are different from the hours that we work ourselves. The hours of a junior partner in a large firm would probably be from soon after 9 in the morning to 7 at night, working hard all day. But you must consider the public. If you are going to allow the public, and when I say the public I mean, of course, our profession, to attend appointments up to 5 o'clock at night, you are going to have very great difficulty in doing your outside work, getting your reports off to the country and preparing your documents for the next day or subsequent days.

47,288. You think it would be undesirable for the offices to be open to practitioners later than 4 o'clock?—Yes.

47,289. There is work, I suppose, to be done in the offices after they are closed to practitioners?—I am quite sure that the best of the masters and the best of the clerks, whenever there is anything like approaching arrears, either take work home or stop very late. I think there is a very honest feeling among the clerks in the offices about that. There is a good deal of overtime done.

47,290. So that although the prescribed office hours are from 10 to 4, you think that actually longer hours are worked in many cases?—I do, whenever it is necessary.

47,291. On the other hand, I suppose it often happens that a master has finished his list before 4 o'clock, and gets away?—Yes, it does. The hours are easy—very easy.

47,292. As regards vacations, do you consider that the vacation arrangements are suitable for the performance of necessary work?—Well, it is difficult for me, even if I wished to do so, to defend a ten weeks' vacation in the summer; but that is a matter that has been discussed by very able people, and I think it will probably be some time before it is much reduced. But I do think that the masters might put a much more liberal interpretation than they do upon what is known as vacation business. There again it depends upon the man. Some masters will deal with almost anything if you bring it to them as vacation business; they are glad to do the work. Others are always ready to turn it away on the ground that it is not vacation business. I think they might put a more liberal interpretation on it than they do.

47,293. (Mr. Coward.) There is only one master present in the vacation on each side?—Yes, and I do not see why there should not be two.

47,294. One more?—One more.

47,295. (Chairman.) That would probably lead to a more liberal interpretation of the term "vacation business"?—Yes, I think it would, because the vacation master is sometimes rather hard put to it.

47,296. Is it at present purely a matter of discretion as to what is regarded as vacation business; is it not defined by rule?—There is no rule that I am aware of about it.

47,297. It is a matter of custom and discretion?—Yes, what is pressing.

47,298. The Royal Commission on Delay in the King's Bench Division made this recommendation: "We recommend that the offices of the Supreme Court (including judges' chambers) should be open for the transaction of every kind of business up to the 10th of August in each year, and be reopened and business resumed at least twelve days before the commencement of the sittings of the courts after the "Long Vacation." That has not been carried out yet, I think?—No. I appreciate, of course, why they said that; it was that they might at the beginning of the vacation finish off any work that was left by the judges, and that at the end of the vacation they should be preparing the work for the judges to do when they came back.

47,299. The work of the masters consists, to a considerable extent, of work preparatory to the hearing in court and consequent upon the decision in court?—In the Chancery Division, yes.

47,300. Is that not the case in the King's Bench Division also?—No, not nearly so much, because a King's Bench master's decision is a decision. In the Chancery Division in ninety cases out of one hundred it amounts to a decision.

47,301. But in the King's Bench Division it is frequently a decision on some part of the proceedings preliminary to the hearing in court?—Yes, but that is subject to appeal to the judge in chambers, which is an appeal. In the Chancery Division it is subject to an adjournment to the judge, and anybody is entitled on any subject to have the judge's decision, if he is not satisfied with the master's decision.

47,302. (Mr. Coward.) Without an order at all?—The master makes no order at all; he is bound to adjourn it to the judge if requested to do so.

47,303. If the parties object to his finding?—Yes, if either party takes objection.

47,304. (Chairman.) But still, the work, so far as it is not appealed against, is preparatory to or consequent upon proceedings in court?—Yes.

47,305. So that it would appear logical that there should be a period before the courts begin sitting, and after they cease sitting, during which that work should begin or continue?—Yes; I think that suggestion is quite fair.

47,306. Do you think that the recommendation of the Royal Commission on that point ought to be carried out, and would have advantages?—Yes; but I do not think those periods ought to be taken advantage of for starting any fresh work at the beginning of the vacation; it should merely be for clearing up what the judges have left.

47,307. Do you think, on the question of organisation, there is any work done by the masters which could conveniently be devolved upon the higher clerks?—I can only speak generally, and, speaking generally, I do not think there is. I think the master's day is fully occupied with his work, and I do not think he is doing any work that he could very well delegate to his clerks.

47,308. We have heard that in the Chancery Division the first class clerks do hear some of the simple summonses—summonses on certain points of procedure?—Yes, they do; and summonses for time.

47,309. And that is not the case in the King's Bench Division?—No; a master deals with those there.

47,310. Is there any reason why the same practice should not be applied in the King's Bench Division?—No; in the King's Bench Division there are two assistant masters, and I should think they might very well do it.

47,311. As regards the Lunacy masters, the Commission have not yet taken evidence from the Lunacy Department, but we should be glad to hear any observations that you have to make that apply specially to that branch?—First of all, I hope that it will not be thought that I am running the interests of my profession as against the interests of the Bar; but there, again, I do not see why solicitors should not be appointed Lunacy masters. Their work to a great extent is administrative and to a great extent domestic; it is the care of lunatics, and that sort of thing; work that could very well be done by a solicitor. Having said that, I do not want to carry that point further. The work in the Lunacy Office is done very well indeed. How it is done I do not know. For years there we have had as masters gentlemen who, had they not been there, one would not think would have been appointed as masters. I will leave it at that. But there you have had all the time an extraordinarily competent set of first class clerks, and they have kept the business going. There was a man there named Keeley. I mention him because he is dead.

47,312. (Mr. Coward.) A second class clerk?—He was a first class clerk. There is Mr. Romer there now and one or two others who are exceedingly competent men, and they have kept the business of that office going. Otherwise I think there might have been disaster there.

47,313. (Chairman.) You think that in the result the work has been done satisfactorily?—Yes; and it is good work. It is difficult work and special work, and it is done with great consideration for the patients, as we always call them in that department. The work is well done.

47,314. I should like to ask you one or two questions about the organisation of your own office. It would be interesting to the Commission, I think, to be able to make some comparison between the manner in which work is organised in the legal departments, and the manner in which it is organised in a solicitor's office. Do you divide the work up into different departments, each of which is served by a separate staff of clerks?—In my office there are my partner Mr. Rawle, my partner Mr. Johnstone, and two junior partners. Mr. Rawle is now quite a senior partner, getting on, and his work consists mostly in work done in the office; he is seeing old clients of the firm, the most important clients, and he has a far more extensive staff than I have, who do the outside work for him. I do mostly the litigation that comes into the Chancery Division. Sometimes if one of Mr. Rawle's clients, say, has a foot-path action, he will hand him over to me for the purposes of that action, although I may perhaps know nothing whatever about the conditions of the will and the settlement of his estate, and I will carry through that action for him. My partner Mr. Johnstone does Admiralty work, Divorce work, and King's Bench work, as a general rule.

47,315. Have you separate managing clerks for each of the branches; for instance, for all Chancery business?—I have all my clerks in the Chancery Division. If I want anything done in the Divorce or Probate Division, I get one of my partners' clerks to do it for me.

47,316. Would that be a chief clerk who specially deals with the work of that division?—Yes.

47,317. Have you a managing clerk for the King's Bench Division generally?—Yes.

47,318. Have you two managing clerks in any division?—We have a managing clerk and a junior, and there is a shorthand writer and a boy, a paper carrier who runs about to see when his appointments are coming in.

47,319. In each division?—That would be in the King's Bench Division, and that would be about the same in each division.

47,320. How many managing clerks have you; one for the King's Bench Division, one for Chancery, and one for the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division?—No, you might say that Mr. Rawle has one clerk who is managing clerk for Chancery; I have two Chancery managing clerks. We have certainly two managing clerks in the Chancery Division; you might say three.

47,321. (Mr. Coward.) And a conveyancer?—Yes, two or three conveyancers.

47,322. (Chairman.) And one specially for probate and testamentary work?—Yes, one does Probate work, and he has an assistant, and he does the Admiralty work, too.

47,323. So that for the Chancery work you have in all three managing clerks, if I understand you rightly; two of yours and one of Mr. Rawle's?—It is a little difficult to say, because if a Chancery application arose, and some of Mr. Rawle's clerks had something else to attend to, he would very likely do it himself. We have got a number of managing clerks.

47,324. Do your two managing clerks for Chancery specialise; does one of them take particular sections of Chancery business, and the other take other sections?—No.

47,325. They take the whole Chancery business?—Yes. I discourage specialisation as much as I can in my department of the office.

47,326. You endeavour to keep your men as general as possible?—Yes.

47,327. That was a point I wanted to come to. In the legal departments under the present organisation there seems to be rather a high degree of specialisation, and from what you say now I gather that in that respect they differ from the organisation in your office?—I try to get my clerks to have as general a knowledge as I can. For instance, supposing that in connection with a Chancery case it becomes necessary to prove a will, I should like the clerk attending the Chancery case to be able to do it. I would tell him to do it, and he would do it; but, if necessary, he would go and talk to Mr. Johnstone's Probate clerk if any question arose.

47,328. And you find no difficulty in training your clerks to deal with most matters of a general kind?—No, not if they are good men. I like to have a man who on an emergency can turn his hand to anything.

47,329. Do you consider that the same principle applies to the legal departments; that it is better that the clerks should not specialise too much, and that the object should be kept in view of making their work general?—I think that in the legal establishments it is better to keep a clerk to a particular kind of work, but at the same time it is very useful that a clerk before appointment should have a knowledge of other offices, because a clerk in the Chancery Division may have to draw an order up which will have to be looked at in the Companies Winding-up Department, or have to be acted upon perhaps by the paymaster, and it is very useful that he should have a knowledge of how the work is done in those other departments.

47,330. Would not the principles that you have been explaining lead to a considerable degree of moving about of clerks in the earlier part of their service?—No, because I should hope that, as you appointed clerks from active practice, they would have sufficient knowledge when they are appointed.

47,331. You do not think it is desirable that that acquisition of general knowledge should continue after they are appointed?—No, I am against translation from one department to another. There are instances of it in the courts now, and they have not worked satisfactorily—transfers from the Land Registry to the Chancery Division or vice versa—as a rule it is not satisfactory.

47,332. (Lord Mersey.) Will you tell me for my own information what you mean by the expression "amalgamation"?—As applied to the Registrars Office and the Masters do you mean?

47,333. I mean: What do you mean when you use the expression? You have used the expression very often and I do not know what it means?—At present in the Chancery Division an order made by the judge is drawn up by the registrar in a separate office altogether from that of the masters, and my suggestion is that each judge or pair of judges should have a self-contained staff of his own, including an official capable of drawing up orders; not that if there comes an order it should go to a registrar to be drawn up, whereas if a judge gives a direction it should go to his master to be worked out. I think he ought to have a self-contained staff.

47,334. That is the whole scope of amalgamation, is it?—Yes, I only used the word "amalgamation" as applied to the Registrars Office and the Masters in Chancery.

47,335. It applies solely to the Chancery Division?—Yes.

47,336. You told us something about promotion. I do not understand that you exclude seniority when you are considering the claims to promotion?—No.

47,337. Other things being equal, I suppose you would agree that seniority ought to be taken into account?—I do, certainly.

47,338. Then you told us that you did not agree that the best men for the higher offices were obtainable by means of examination?—No, I do not.

47,339. I understand you to mean by that that you regard qualities as more important than attainments?—Yes, I think if I understand that statement, I do; may I say qualities coupled with experience.

47,340. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You tell us that, apart from the question whether the Registrars Office should be amalgamated, you think that in the existing office the staff is more than sufficient. Your words are: "I feel that the staff is more than sufficient for its purpose and that some economy might be effected." Would you mind rather elaborating that statement by telling us in what respect the staff seems to be more than sufficient, and what degree of economy in your judgment could be effected?—I think that the Registrars Office is over-staffed. I think that for the purpose of drawing up orders one man ought to be able to draw up the number of orders produced by one judge.

47,341. (Chairman.) Including the orders made by the master at his chambers?—Yes. If the department was amalgamated I should arrange that the masters themselves should draw up more orders now than they do.

47,342. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) That means that you would cut down the number of registrars. There are nine registrars now; how many would you have?—One for each pair of judges would be ample.

47,343. How many is that?—That is six.

47,344. Six instead of nine?—Yes.

47,345. Would that involve any corresponding economy in clerks?—I should think that if each one of those registrars had a clerk that would be quite sufficient.

47,346. Then you would have six clerks to six registrars, and how many third class clerks?—You must have a man who can take his appointments.

47,347. That is to say, you would have six registrars, six clerks for the registrars, and six third class clerks?—Yes. Perhaps you heard Mr. Justice Kekewich's report referred to.

47,348. Yes?—We suggested three groups there. I see we suggested two registrars for each group, as we call it; that was with the idea of their being attached to each group or pair of judges. There would be four principal clerks in one group, and two in each of the other two. There would also in each group be one clerk and one assistant clerk. I consider that ample and almost more than ample, and I think if the departments were amalgamated you might reduce it.

47,349. Then you told us that you thought that a good way of appointing to a certain proportion of higher clerkships would be to appoint young solicitors of about 27 or 28 years of age, who had had some experience already?—Yes, if you found it necessary to go outside to recruit the class.

47,350. At present all appointments are normally made to the third class?—Yes.

47,351. And for a matter of 12 or 14 years such third class clerk does extremely mechanical labour, does he not?—Yes, quite, giving appointments and that sort of thing.

47,352. The effect of that, you tell us, is that he always has a little mind, as your phrase was?—If he goes on too long at that sort of thing I think everybody would get a little mind.

47,353. You think, therefore, that if he were appointed comparatively high up in the office after having done good work in a solicitor's office, that process of making small and narrow his mind need not be so marked?—That does apply in some instances, no doubt; but then I would repeat what I said just now, but you must exercise it with great care if you are not going to do injustice to the clerks already appointed.

47,354. I have that fully in my mind. If there were a certain proportion of men who went in at a later age, after having done well in the profession, and from the beginning were appointed to more important work requiring discretion, and if their minds were not made little, do you think that some of them might be eligible for higher posts later on?—I do not think that by that system you would get nearly such good men as you do now. Those men would have been clerks themselves, in nearly every instance, and they would not have had to exercise the thought and the discretion that a partner has to exercise. A partner's work is very different from that of a clerk. If anything goes wrong it is the partner who has to face it out, not the clerk.

47,355. (Mr. Coward.) I suppose you will have found that when a man has been, for instance, in an office, and you see him promoted to partner, you very soon see that man expand, do you not?—Yes, undoubtedly, when he has to take upon himself the direct responsibility, you do. Then he is appointed with the knowledge that he will expand.

47,356. If he is selected from amongst the class of practising solicitors, he has got the opportunity of that expansion already; he would probably be a better man than a man who had not had that opportunity?—Certainly.

47,357. At any rate, you would be able to gauge his ability better?—Yes.

47,358. Referring, for one moment, to the Lunacy departments, the two Masters in Lunacy have to exercise great discretion upon very intimate family matters very often, do they not?—Most decidedly they do.

47,359. I should just like to point this out: The Masters in Lunacy who have been at the Bar have never been brought into connection with the people with whom they will have to deal as masters—I do not mean the professional people, I mean the patients and their families and friends—whereas it would be part of a solicitor's duty to constantly be in communication with people of that kind, would it not?—Quite so. It has been my unhappy fortune to have to interview, in asylums and elsewhere, numbers of patients, and to ascertain their own views of what they have to do and how they are being treated.

47,360. The point I am upon is, would you not expect to find a solicitor a more competent person, other things being equal, to be a master in lunacy than a man selected from the Bar?—Yes, I should certainly.

47,361. For that reason?—For that reason, and for several others as well.

47,362. (Sir John Kempe.) When you make a suggestion for the reorganisation of the offices, I suppose you have in view chiefly the convenience of those attending the courts—solicitors and other people attending the courts?—Yes, I have, and the expense. I think the substantial reorganisation that I suggest is in the Registrars Office; I think that is overstaffed, and I think too much money is spent upon it.

47,363. I was referring for the moment to people appointed as clerks being promoted to masters. Is there not another point of view. I suppose the officers of the courts to a certain extent are put there to see that things are done rightly, to watch over the interests of the public?—Yes.

47,364. I mean as against the profession; but, at any rate, they have to see that orders are drawn up rightly and rules observed?—Yes, and they do very responsible work too.

47,365. To a certain extent, if those officers were recruited almost entirely from solicitors or solicitors' clerks, is it not rather like making the qualification of a gamekeeper that he has been a poacher?—Yes, to some extent it is; but then the poacher has by his poaching acquired a knowledge of the habits of the game—and it is just that knowledge that a managing clerk is acquiring while he is with a solicitor—he has acquired knowledge of how the work has been done, and anybody appointed fresh from outside, say, a banker's clerk, or an accountant's clerk, appointed to do the work of a solicitor's clerk, would for a very considerable time make, I think, a great mess of it as a rule.

47,366. You do not think that there is any reason for being distrustful, so to speak, of any one appointed from the profession on the ground that he might be got at? I know very little about the working of the courts, and I cannot speak with any experience, but you do not think there is any danger of that?—No.

47,367. The clerks in the office are not put there merely as watch-dogs?—No, not by any means.

47,368. But they are there to help the public?—They are there to help the public—to carry out the work of the public. They are not there merely to criticise; they are there to act.

47,369. You are satisfied as a rule with the Service as it is now, and you think the system of competition for filling up the places of the clerks is quite unsuitable for it. In a solicitor's office what class of people do you draw the clerks from?—Some of my managing clerks are sons of barristers' clerks. My shorthand clerk is the son of a coachman. They really come from all classes. Many of my clerks are sons of former clerks.

47,370. At what age do they come in?—We like to catch them young.

47,371. How young?—Soon after they leave school—about 15 years of age.

47,372. The elementary schools?—Yes, that is about what their education is as a rule. Many of the best of them—and that is one of the things we look out for—go to evening schools and polytechnics and places of that kind to try and improve their education, and if we find a boy doing that we like to keep our eye on him.

47,373. How do they pick up their knowledge which is so valuable afterwards for the public service?—They go about first of all as bag carrier to a managing clerk, and go in and out of the various offices in the Law Courts building, and gradually they are allowed to do more responsible work as they become more useful, and ultimately they become managing clerks themselves.

47,374. In that way do they acquire the knowledge that is required in the Central Office or Chancery offices?—Yes, they do; and it is only in that way, in my opinion, that they can acquire the knowledge.

47,375. Do you mean that if you take a boy, for instance, coming from a public school, presumably more highly educated than the boys you pick up in a solicitor's office, and put him into the Chancery offices, he would not pick up in the Chancery offices the same sort of knowledge that is brought by a boy who begins at the bottom, sweeping out the office, or carrying the bag, or whatever it is. Would not he pick it up much more quickly than a boy who comes in from your office?—Certainly not.

47,376. Why not?—Because he would not have the practical knowledge of having done the work himself.

47,377. Practical knowledge? Do you mean to say he must carry a bag to start with?—He must go about amongst the various offices, do the work himself, and see how the work is done. These offices are connected with one another a good deal, and if you took a boy from a public school and put him into the Chancery master's office straight away, he would have no knowledge at all of how the work in the paymaster's office was done, and, perhaps, half his work in the Chancery office would be drawing orders which were to be acted upon by the paymaster.

47,378. Surely a week's training in each office would give him that experience?—I do not think so; I do not, indeed. That knowledge is absorbed; you cannot get it by reading books.

47,379. Your proposal, it seems to me, is directed more to taking off the shoulders of the higher classes in these offices the training of their men. As it is now, the training is done by solicitors outside. It might be done by the higher officers in the public offices if there was more trouble taken, but you think the more concentrated knowledge gained in that way is not so valuable as beginning at the bottom and working up?—I do not think anybody would ever train them to do it. If I may use a simile, it would be trying to teach a man how to shoot with blank cartridge; he must do the actual thing himself.

47,380. (Mr. Shipley.) Is it usual amongst solicitors to give a pension to their clerks?—There has always been a custom in our office to pension clerks. We have always pensioned them. They have no right to it, and there is no superannuation fund or anything of the kind.

47,381. I suppose you fix the amount by talking it over amongst yourselves?—Yes, and considering what the clerk has done, and how long he has been in our service.

47,382. And promotion goes by merit and not by seniority?—Certainly, by merit entirely.

47,383. (Mr. Matheson.) With regard to the third class clerks, do your remarks apply to the clerks in the Probate Registry as well as those in the other big departments?—I am afraid my experience of the Probate Registry is not very great, but I do know something about it.

47,384. There seems to be a complaint of stagnation in the third class—I mean want of promotion. Have you come across that at all?—I do not know how that could be remedied.

47,385. At present there is no compulsory age for retirement of the clerks?—I did not know that there was not any in the Probate Registry. I thought all Civil servants had to retire at some age over 60.

47,386. (Chairman.) We have it in evidence that in all the legal offices there is at present no fixed age for retirement?—I did not know that.

47,387. (Mr. Matheson.) That is a very important question. I want to know whether you think, without some compulsory age for retirement, you can really provide adequately quick promotion; but if you have not considered it, I will not press the question?—I would not like to offer an opinion upon that. I rather came here to talk about it from my side of the table and not from the official side of the table. I am not prepared to discuss the terms of retirement.

47,388. There seem to be two possible ways of treating third class clerks. One is to say to them when they come in: "You will remain a third class clerk unless you show very exceptional ability, in which case you have a chance of promotion to the second, and, ultimately, to the first class." The other alternative is to say to them when they come in: "You may expect to rise to the second and the first class." The latter, I understand, is the present arrangement. Which do you think is the better?—I think it would be a great pity, as I said just now, to put any difficulty in the way of promoting a clerk from the third class to the second, and from the second class to the first class. I think you should be able to do it always, but that it should only be done if the selecting body is satisfied that the clerk is worthy of promotion.

47,389. But it makes a great difference whether you say "We are going to promote you if you are up to the average of a clerk," or you say, "We shall promote you if you show exceptional ability"?—I do not think they should have any right to, or, if I may say so, expectation of promotion beyond the fact that if they are entirely satisfactory they will be promoted, and that they will have a better chance than a man outside.

47,390. (Bishop of Southwark.) Do you think those cases of promotion would be very rare?—What cases?

47,391. You were speaking of promoting from the third to the second class, and so on, without making any real bar between the classes?—I should hope that they would be very numerous, and that the general rule would be that the man in the third class would prove himself worthy of being promoted to the second.

47,392. And even into the first class?—And thence to the first.

47,393. And it would be not uncommon?—No, I should hope it would be frequent. I think it would be.

47,394. You spoke of a list drawn up in the order of merit; who should draw up that list?—I rather hoped that you would decide on some body of selection. Whether it should be for the whole of the Civil Service or a separate body for the legal departments, I do not know. But it seems to me that it would be much less invidious if it were a committee. If it were to be confined to the legal departments I should think a committee composed of some of the judges with the assistance of some of the masters would be the best body for recommending the men to whoever would make the actual promotion subject to their recommendation.

47,395. I suppose ultimately it comes to the question, who has the means of selecting, and who has any knowledge of, and who is in contact with the people themselves?—I see no difficulty about that at all. The masters would have the means of knowledge and would know all the staff.

47,396. A master would be in such direct contact that he would be able to discriminate between the merits of the one or the other clerk?—Certainly.

47,397. Then I am not quite clear about the general trend of your argument. The impression you have given to my mind is, that on the whole the system, especially in the higher administrative parts, works satisfactorily?—I could not suggest any better system, and I think it works satisfactorily.

47,398. On the other hand you created the impression in my mind that there is a body of people with legal experience, namely, solicitors, who are much better qualified to hold a great many of these posts?—Such posts as taxing masters, and masters in Chancery, which are really solicitors' work distinguished from barristers' work. With regard to the masters of the Kings Bench Division I do not say so much, and I do not think there is such a distinction; but, on the other hand, I have said that one of the best King's Bench masters I ever knew was a solicitor.

47,399. Would the work be better done if those people were appointed?—In the King's Bench Division I do not think I could say it would be better done, but I could say it would be far worse done if barristers were appointed to be masters in Chancery or taxing masters—there is no doubt whatever.

47,400. (Chairman.) In the three departments where you think the solicitor's qualification is essential, namely, the Chancery Masters, the Chancery Registrars, and the Taxing Masters, they are at present, with one exception in the case of taxing masters, entirely solicitors?—Yes, they are.

47,401. (Bishop of Southwark.) Our main object, as I understand it, is to see that the public is served most efficiently?—I think you would have the public served best and most promptly if you confined those three offices to solicitors who have knowledge of solicitors' work.

Mr. FREDERICK CHARLES GOODCHILD, called and examined.

47,402. (Chairman.) You are managing clerk to Messrs. Trinder Capron & Company?—Yes.

47,403. And you have occupied that position for a long time?—About a quarter of a century.

47,404. Of which of the legal departments have you had special experience?—I had experience in Chancery for about 20 years, but during the last 25 years I have been exclusively engaged in the King's Bench and Bankruptcy.

47,405. Which are the offices with which you mostly come into contact in your work in these departments?—The Taxing Office, the Crown Office, the Summons and Order Department, the Writ Department, the Associates Department, and the procedure in the Commercial Court.

47,406. Does your business frequently lead you to appear before the masters?—Very frequently.

47,407. Apart from the masters, have you frequent contact with the first and second class clerks?—Very often.

47,408. Not so much with the third class?—The third class are left more to the junior clerks in the office to deal with.

47,409. Dealing with the question of the manner in which the clerks are appointed, do you think the results of the present system satisfactory?—I do not think they are satisfactory in some respects. The third class clerks are, with very few exceptions, confined to mechanical duties, and it matters not who is appointed to those places. The second and first class clerks have to exercise judgment and discretion, and that necessitates a very large acquaintance with the general practice and procedure.

47,410. Does the third class clerk not acquire that experience in the course of his work?—No, because the ambit of his duties is so restricted. For instance, a third class clerk issues the summonses at chambers, or files documents in the Filing Department. All he has to do is to exercise ordinary care, and to fill up and put the seals on documents, which work requires no very great amount of intelligence. That is why I say it is, in a sense, mechanical.

47,411. What is your inference from that?—My inference from that is, that a third class clerk, who chooses to enter the Service as a third class clerk, need not necessarily aspire to a higher position, unless he is a man of exceptional ability. Supposing, for instance, the head of his department thought he had developed a large amount of intelligence, which would qualify him for a higher post, then I should not shut the door to him; but, as a rule, the third class clerk is a junior clerk.

47,412. Then the result would be that, as a rule, direct appointments would be made to the first or the second class, and not by promotion from the third class?—That is my idea.

47,413. But you would leave the door open for promotion in exceptional cases?—Just so.

47,414. In that case, at what age do you consider the third class should be recruited?—It would depend, rather than age, upon the number of years a man had been in a certain office.

47,415. Do you consider that for appointment to the third class any legal experience is necessary?—It is not absolutely necessary, but if the third class clerks were recruited from junior clerks in solicitors' offices, I think they would much sooner acquire a knowledge of their full duties.

47,416. But the mechanical duties you have described would not take any intelligent youth long to learn?—When I say "mechanical" I do not mean purely mechanical; there must be a certain amount of care and knowledge. For instance, a third class clerk taken, say, from a source other than a legal source would be quite ignorant of the procedure and the necessity for this, that, or the other; whereas a junior clerk in a solicitor's office would know the reason for this, and the necessity for that, so that he would sooner acquire a full idea of his duties. I do not press the point. That is the only distinction I draw.

47,417. It would be merely a question of time; he would pick it up quicker?—Purely; and not a question of intelligence.

47,418. If you had that system which you suggest, in which promotion from the third class would be quite exceptional, would you get sufficiently good candidates for the third class, seeing that they would have no prospect of rising beyond an ultimate salary of 200*l.* a year?—I think so; but may I say that I do not think it wise to promote a third class clerk into another department. The promotion should be in the same department in which he is engaged, for this reason: The duties in the Summons and Order Department are very different from the duties in the Writ, Judgment, and Execution Department. If he were promoted from one department to the other, he would have to begin to learn the duties of the new department.

47,419. We have been told, I think, that at present it is the system to move the third class clerks round to each department, in order that they may get a general knowledge of the work?—That, I think, is a waste of time, because the clerk has to begin de novo and learn fresh duties, whereas a junior clerk appointed from a solicitor's office would be acquainted with every department in the courts, and if he were appointed to a third class clerkship there would not be the same objection to transfer him from one department to another.

47,420. But if the work of the third class clerk is, as you describe it, easily acquired in a short time, the inconvenience that arises from moving from one department to another would be very passing?—Of course, "a short time" depends to a great extent upon the intelligence of the clerk.

47,421. Assuming you have a reasonably intelligent clerk?—Yes; but even then we come in contact, or rather the junior clerks in the office come in contact, with the third class clerks, and very often have to teach them their business. I do not think that should be so.

47,422. But a clerk in your office has no difficulty in learning the work all round in all the departments?—Quite so; it is his duty.

47,423. Why should it be so much more difficult for a clerk in the legal offices to learn the work in the different departments than for a clerk in your office, who has not only that to do, but a great many other things as well?—Because a junior clerk in my office would already be possessed of the necessary knowledge to enable him to go to any department in the legal offices.

47,424. But he must have acquired that knowledge at some time?—Yes; in a solicitor's office.

47,425. Why should not the clerk in a department acquire it quickly?—Because it is rather difficult. A junior clerk in a solicitor's office has to know the routine and the requirements of every department in the building. That is his duty—he is not an efficient clerk until he knows all that—so that he can go indiscriminately to one or another department, and he knows exactly what is required there; whereas a third class clerk, appointed originally, say, to the Filing Department and transferred to the Writ Department, would never have heard of a writ, and he would not know the reason for the existence or routine of the office.

47,426. Would not he very soon learn it?—That depends a very great deal upon the clerk.

47,427. The effect of your suggestion would be that a man who at the age of, say 20, enters the Filing Department would do nothing for the whole term of his natural life, until he retires at the age perhaps of 70, but file affidavits?—Unless there is an opportunity in his particular department of promotion, and he is in a position to take that promotion.

47,428. And even if he is promoted you suggest that he should be promoted in the same department?—Yes.

47,429. Where his work would merely be a higher form of filing affidavits, if there is such a higher form?—Of course, there is superintendence required.

47,430. Would not the tendency of such a system be to produce an extremely narrow and mechanical type of man after 20, 30, or 40 years of filing affidavits?—I am afraid that would be a necessity.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CHARLES GOODCHILD.

47,431. But is it a necessity?—I think it is in the purely formal departments.

47,432. At present the system is to move the man about?—Yes.

47,433. Do you find that that produces inefficiency?—I do, and I can instance it in two cases. A first class clerk in the King's Bench Division, very experienced in his department, was transferred to the Chancery Division, of the procedure of which he knew absolutely nothing.

47,434. That is a more drastic procedure than that of which we were speaking, which was transfer between the different branches of the Central Office dealing with the King's Bench work?—It is a question of degree, and I am illustrating that as an extreme case. He was receiving his maximum salary, and he received an additional salary in order to learn the work of the Chancery Division. That, I consider, was a waste of time. He was very efficient in the department in which he was put. Another instance was where a gentleman was moved from the Central Office to the Chancery Department, and it was not a success; he was then moved to the Taxing Office, and that was not a success; and I really have lost sight of him now. But it illustrates in a degree what I was suggesting with regard to transferring clerks to different departments—even to the extent of first, as well as second and third class clerks.

47,435. To go back to the question of appointment, you suggest that appointment should be made direct in the majority of cases to the first or second class?—Yes, except in cases where promotion takes place.

47,436. At what age do you suggest that appointments should be made, and from what source?—I would rather suggest that age does not enter into consideration so much as efficiency.

47,437. Do you suggest that they should be usually appointments to the second class with subsequent promotion to the first class?—Yes, I think that is essential.

47,438. From what source do you suggest the candidates should be drawn?—Speaking in quite a disinterested way, because I do not suppose it would affect me personally, I think the best source is from efficient managing clerks in solicitors' offices.

47,439. What length of experience would you suggest as necessary?—I do not know that I should limit the length of experience, but the selection should be made by those high officials with whom the managing clerk comes in contact—who should recommend his appointment. I do not think it would be wise to fix a limit to the age.

47,440. But without going into the question of fixing a limit, normally what age would you consider suitable?—Other things being equal, I should say from 35 to 40.

47,441. That would be a man with 15 to 20 years' experience?—Yes, I should not be inclined to place it lower than that.

47,442. And you suggest that the selection should be made by the high officials with whom he comes into contact; that is to say, I presume, by the masters?—The masters or the judges, or whoever it may be.

47,443. Do the managing clerks often come into direct contact with the judges?—Very often.

47,444. In chambers?—Every day, and in court, in the Commercial Court as well.

47,445. Not in the other courts?—Not when the judge is sitting on the bench, but in the Commercial Court the managing clerk conducts interlocutory applications very frequently.

47,446. Would the present scales of pay for the first and second class be sufficient to attract the class of men of whom you are speaking?—I am afraid I am not sufficiently acquainted with the rates of pay.

47,447. The rate of pay of the second class is from 250*l.*, rising by increments of 15*l.*, to 400*l.*, and the rate of pay of the first class is from 500*l.*, rising by increments of 20*l.* to 600*l.*, with higher pay in some exceptional cases?—I think the first class would certainly attract them. With regard to the second class, it would depend upon the age of the candidate in question. He might be inclined to enter at that salary with the prospects in view.

47,448. With the prospect of promotion to the first class?—Yes, with a rising salary up to the maximum of the second.

47,449. You think that a thoroughly good man of 35 years of age, with between 15 and 20 years' experience in a solicitor's office, would be attracted by it?—He might be; but it might be a question whether, in a particular case, he should not begin at 300*l.*

47,450. As regards the present organisation of the offices, do you consider that it is satisfactory?—On the whole it is very satisfactory; in fact, I do not know a time in my experience when, speaking generally, I have to be thankful for so good an organisation.

47,451. The work is done promptly and without delay?—Speaking generally, yes.

47,452. And with accuracy?—With accuracy and courtesy, and everything which is desirable.

47,453. As regards the hours of attendance, the offices at present are open from 10 to 4 in term time, with shorter hours in vacations?—That is so.

47,454. Do you consider that those hours are suitable?—I do not think they could be improved upon.

47,455. Would there be any advantage in lengthening them?—I do not think so. I think it would be a disadvantage.

47,456. The practitioners do not want to have longer hours?—No, there are conferences and consultations after 4 o'clock with counsel. One has to conduct one's correspondence and do general office business after 4 o'clock, and if the hours were extended I think it would be an inconvenience.

47,457. As regards the vacations, it has been suggested to us that a more liberal interpretation might with advantage be given to "Vacation business"?—I think that would be an advantage.

47,458. It was also recommended by the Royal Commission on Delay in the King's Bench Division that the masters should work at full power for a certain period after the Courts rise and before they resume. Would it, in your opinion, be advantageous if that recommendation were carried out?—Not in that way; but if there were two vacation masters instead of one, that would, I think, meet all the requirements.

47,459. Throughout the whole vacation, or only at the beginning and at the end?—Throughout the whole vacation.

47,460. At present there is no fixed age for retirement either for masters or for clerks. Do you consider that it would be desirable to fix an age limit, as there is one fixed in the rest of the Civil Service?—I do not, because if a man is physically fit, the older he is the more experience he is capable of giving off.

47,461. Have you ever known cases in which officers have continued at their work after they have become less physically or mentally fit?—Not in modern times. In the times before the Judicature Act, when we were under the Common Law Procedure Act, it was a common fault; but in modern times I cannot recall any one who has been continued in office who has not been mentally and physically fit.

47,462. You have not known any such case?—No.

47,463. Have you any suggestion to make as regards the Commercial Court?—It has occurred to me for some time past that it would be a convenience to the Court and to the profession if a clerk of sufficient standing were appointed to be the clerk to the Commercial Court. At present the judge's clerk acts in that capacity in issuing applications; but there is a rotation of judges in the Commercial Court, and it is desirable that there should be a continuity of practice in that court, especially when one remembers that the practice in the Commercial Court is to a very great extent unwritten, and is only known to the practitioners in that court. There is more elasticity of practice in the Commercial Court than is given under the rules of the King's Bench proper.

47,464. Are the differences very great?—"Great" is a comparative expression, if I may say so; perhaps I had better explain. On interlocutory applications in the Commercial Court a judge makes an order. That orders implies, or may imply, various other things; that order is drawn up by a clerk in the Order Department who is quite conversant with the practice under the rules of the Supreme Court, but is not conversant with the practice in the Commercial Court and it amounts to this, that we always draw up our own orders in the Commercial Court, and if we have sufficient reputation with the staff of the Order Department they take our word that it is the proper order which was made.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CHARLES GOODCHILD.

47,465. In all King's Bench business you draw up your own orders, and you can take them to the Order office?—I do. I think it is pretty general.

47,466. We understand that the practice is almost universal?—Speaking for myself, it is universal.

47,467. So that in that respect there is no difference between the Commercial Court and the other courts?—Except that there are things in the Commercial Court which are not the subject of any written rules.

47,468. (Mr. Coward.) Such as what?—My Lord Mersey would be able to tell you more about that, I think. It is to a certain extent a give and take process that goes on on an application. The judge expresses his general opinion on an application which embraces various matters, and then he says "I think so and so" "ought to be done, and you ought to do so and so." That does not appear in the written order, and indeed it is dependent on the honour of those who ought to carry it out.

47,469. I do not know whether Lord Mersey follows this, but I am bound to say I do not quite know what you mean. If you would kindly give us an illustration I should follow it better?—An order may be made by the Commercial judge, and he may say "on the usual terms."

47,470. But what order?—There are so many divers orders that I should find some difficulty in particularising one. There is an amount of elasticity in the Commercial Court, which is not observable in the other parts of the work.

47,471. (Chairman.) But the "usual terms" would be perfectly well known to practitioners in the court?—Yes; but it would not appear on the face of the order.

47,472. And there are a large number of such orders?—Several. I would not say they are very large in number, but the difficulty we find is when we come to taxation and there happens to be a difference of opinion.

47,473. If such orders are numerous do the "usual terms" not become known in the Order department of the Central Office?—They are not expressed on the order. The order says "On usual terms"; then it is a question, on a fight on taxation, what was intended to be meant. I am taking that as an illustration.

47,474. The "usual terms" being generally questions of costs?—No, not necessarily. For instance there may be an examination of a witness de bene esse, and the judge may intimate that before that takes place the party applying should disclose his documents. That is not necessarily a part of the order, but it is a matter of honour between the practitioners that they carry out the wish expressed by the judge when he makes the order, and it is not incorporated in the order.

47,475. Does it amount to this, that in that court the orders are less explicit and leave more to be filled in according to customary practice than is the case in any other courts?—Yes; and the practice of the different judges is not always identical. I think a clerk attached to the Commercial Court would be of assistance. For instance, if one judge took a certain course on a question of practice it is very awkward if the succeeding judge makes a different practice. I base that suggestion mainly on the necessity for having continuity of practice in unwritten matters which come before the Court. I do not think I can put it higher.

47,476. And you think continuity of practice cannot be secured if the work is done in the Central Office?—I do not think it can be—not effectively.

47,477. Have you any observations to make with regard to the Taxing Office?—Yes, I think it would be a benefit to the public service if, saving the rights of the present holders of the office, taxing masters were recruited from first class clerks in the Taxing Office and from managing clerks of experience. I distinguish between the importance of the office of taxing master and the office of chamber master in that respect.

47,478. In the case of chamber masters you are not in favour of throwing the office open to promotion from the first class clerks?—Absolutely not.

47,479. But you would be in favour of throwing it open in the case of taxing masters?—Certainly, because at present a great deal of the work of taxing is done by some second class clerks and by many first class clerks. In addition to that it is not an unusual practice for a legal arbitrator to refer a bill of costs to a managing clerk. It has also been the practice—not very extensive truly—that on the eve of the vacation, when the taxing office is extremely full, for the parties to an action to agree to refer the bill for taxation to a managing clerk as if he were a taxing master.

47,480. Is that not permitted at present?—It is a question of arrangement between the parties.

47,481. Supposing the parties agree, is it not open to them to do that at present?—Yes, if they agree to be bound by the result. But it is not very extensively adopted.

47,482. That is a thing which could be done without any alteration of rules?—Quite.

47,483. (Mr. Coward.) The point, I suppose, is that it shows that the managing clerks are competent to do that kind of work?—That is so.

47,484. (Chairman.) But it has been represented to us by another witness that in the case of the taxing masters the experience acquired by clerks in the office does not give them the breadth of view and general experience of solicitor's business which is important for the purpose of the discretion which the taxing master has to exercise?—I do not agree with that, partly for the reason that many of the first class and second class clerks have come from solicitors' offices, and that is their qualification.

47,485. The majority, if not all of them, have been promoted from third class clerks, have they not?—I cannot say. If I see a gentleman in an office I do not know whether he is a third or second class clerk. The distinction is not obvious on the face of it. But I do not think that third class clerks are at all necessary in the Taxing Office. I should prefer to see second and first class clerks.

47,486. Is there not a considerable amount of mechanical work—casting bills, calculating folios, and so on?—Judging folios is done by experience and not by counting. It is a calculation, but one accustomed to look at a brief can say how many folios there are. I should say that that was intellectual rather than mechanical.

47,487. (Mr. Coward.) It is difficult to do when there are figures in the brief, is it not?—Not to one accustomed to it. I should say that there was not much difficulty to one accustomed to deal with it, even in the case of briefs with figures; you can see it at a glance. There is not the mechanical work that there is in other departments. A casting is generally agreed between the parties.

47,488. (Chairman.) According to the evidence that we have had, third class clerks are responsible for the castings?—There are only two clerks to each taxing master—one first class clerk, necessarily, and a second or a third class clerk. My idea is that the first class clerk could materially assist the taxing master, and the second class clerk could do the first class clerk's duty, so I do not see the opening for a third class clerk at all in the Taxing Office.

47,489. The clerks who are there at present, you think, are suitable for the taxing master's office?—Speaking generally, I do not think you could improve them.

47,490. Have you any observations to offer as regards the Bankruptcy Department?—I do a great deal of Bankruptcy work, and come daily into contact with the officials there, particularly the registrars' clerks. I presume the official receiver's clerks come under a different category—they are under the Board of Trade. I should like to say also that the examiners to the official receivers are most excellent men, and very capable. The judicial clerks in the Bankruptcy

MR. FREDERICK CHARLES GOODCHILD.

Courts, namely, the clerks to the registrars, are equally efficient. We had a series of very old and experienced clerks to registrars until quite recent years, and it was a source of very great anxiety to me, when they gradually died or left for one cause or another, what class of clerks we should have to succeed them, but I am very pleased to say that those clerks have come up to every expectation.

47,491. The Commission has not yet had evidence in regard to the Bankruptcy Department. Can you tell us how those clerks are recruited? Are they promoted from the third class?—I do not know. I do not recognise them as being clerks in the Central Office; in fact it would be impossible that it should be so, because Bankruptcy is a practice of its own.

47,492. I mean promotion from the third class clerks in the Bankruptcy Department?—No; I should think they ought not to be eligible for that.

47,493. (Mr. Boutwood.) You said something about a third class clerk being of the stamp of a junior clerk. I suppose you wanted to indicate a certain type of mind. As the first and second classes now are filled by promotion from the third, that suggests this question: Do you find in the first and second class any indication of the "junior clerk" type of mind owing to the posts being filled up in that way?—My experience with the first class clerks, speaking generally, is that they are very old servants, and I cannot remember when they were in the third class. They have grown up with the practice under the Judicature Act. I cannot associate in my mind any particular first or second class clerk with one who was formerly a third class clerk. The divisions of third, second and first class are not obvious to those who appear on the other side of the table; it is only by long contact with them that one knows them.

47,494. What I had in my mind was this: You were arguing in favour of some direct method of appointment to the first and second classes, and I imagined you would regard that as an improvement on the existing practice?—Provided that the position of those who are in the office at present is saved. I should not put it in opposition to them.

47,495. Then I wondered whether you were merely pressing a theoretical point, or whether you had noticed any obvious defect or disadvantage under the present system which you thought your proposal would rectify?—No, because I come into contact with those in the different departments who are there to exercise their discretion and judgment, and I assume that they are second or first class clerks, and I have known them for very many years. I do not recognise them as promotions from the third class; they may be.

47,496. I had some difficulty in following the reasons you gave against a transference from one department to another. Is this at the bottom of the whole thing, that when you get a boy in a solicitor's office he has not at all specialised; he starts by carrying the bag, as we have been told, and from the very beginning, so to speak, he is more or less in contact with the offices as a whole, grips the thing as a whole, sees it all round, and sees all parts of it, and gradually he becomes specialised with a certain general knowledge behind him. That is one state of things; but then, if you put a man into one of those departments—the Filing Department or any other department—he specialises from the very beginning, and is not in contact with the rest of the office. Is that the contrast you had in mind?—Not quite. Perhaps I do not make myself quite clear when I was speaking of a junior clerk in a solicitor's office. By a junior clerk I meant one who is accustomed to attend chambers, to issue proceedings, to draw up orders, and do various other things connected with the various departments. I do not mean a junior clerk in the office, but one who is out in the Law Courts—in other words, an assistant to the managing clerk. I would not advocate the appointment of a junior clerk whose duties are to sit down in the office all day; he would, of course, be in perhaps a worse category than the third class clerk who is appointed at present. I meant one who comes in contact with and has to do a day's work in the Law Courts by issuing summonses, drawing up orders, signing judgments, issuing executions, and doing the formalities in connection with the taxation of costs. He has a very intimate acquaintance with all the departments, and comes into direct contact with them. That was the kind of clerk I was indicating.

47,497. (Mr. Coward.) You were talking about the lengthening of the hours, and you objected, I think, from the standpoint of a solicitor and a solicitor's managing clerk, that is to say, you thought it would not do to have the chambers open after 4 o'clock. That was the kind of view you had?—That is so.

47,498. Do not you think it would be very desirable that the hours should be extended if it did not interfere with solicitors at all, that is to say, supposing you could reorganise the work of the Central Office so that the masters and their clerks should be able to do a reasonably ordinary day's work, as other people outside have to do?—I do not think extending the hour after 4 would do.

47,499. That would depend upon the organisation. If you could organise it so that they should be there, for instance, until 6 o'clock, one would think that you might do without such an enormous staff as there is to-day?—The difficulty would be this: 6 o'clock is the time limit for serving proceedings on the other side, and if the offices were open up till 6 o'clock—

47,500. No; I am excluding that. I said if you could reorganise the work that is done so that the offices should be closed to the public at 4 o'clock, but that the work should still go on, and the masters' clerks should be at other work until 6 o'clock, you would probably be able to effect great economy, would not you?—As a matter of fact, one department—the Order Department—is open up till 5 o'clock, because an order may be made up to 4 o'clock, and that has to be perfected in the Order Department.

47,501. I did not know that?—I think that is so; whether the hours have been changed recently I do not know.

47,502. My point is, that if you could extend the hours of work of the masters and their staffs beyond 4 o'clock without interfering with the solicitors, your cause of complaint would be removed?—Assuming that there was work to be done. But in the Writ Office the work is entered up each moment, and there are no arrears at 4 o'clock.

47,503. I can understand that there may not be, but the hours are exceedingly short for such work as is done. I should think you would call 10 to 4 absurd hours to work. What are your hours?—Ten o'clock in the morning to half-past 11 o'clock at night, very often.

47,504. I suppose you would say that in a solicitor's office in the City, or anywhere, the hours of 10 to 4 would be laughed at. You would say it is absurd. You never enjoyed it yourself, certainly?—No, I have not. If you extended the hours it would have a reflex action on the office hours of solicitors as well.

47,505. I do not see that at all. Close the office at 4 o'clock to the solicitors. What is the difficulty about that?—Then I do not think there would be sufficient work to keep them beyond 4 o'clock, except in certain departments. In the Bankruptcy Department and in the Chancery Division the clerks do not go at 4 o'clock.

47,506. Wherever they have work to do which requires the perusal of documents it would affect it, because they could do it after hours?—Yes, and they do that, as a matter of fact, now.

47,507. But could not it be done to a greater extent?—The test of that is whether they are up to date the next day.

47,508. But I think you will agree with me that your objection to having the offices open after 4 o'clock, or to having the masters or clerks there after 4 o'clock, is because it would interfere with your business as a solicitor?—That is so.

47,509. Remove that and the objection is gone?—Quite.

47,510. (Lord Mersey.) Can you tell me what work could be done at these offices after 4 o'clock?—In some offices none; in other offices some, such as the perfecting of orders, in the Bankruptcy Registrars Office.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CHARLES GOODCHILD.

47,511. Is the work of perfecting orders done after 4 o'clock?—Yes. In Bankruptcy certainly, and in the Chancery Offices.

47,512. As a rule, as I understand, solicitors who have their business to do at these offices do not want the offices open after 4 o'clock?—That is so.

47,513. Their business takes them back to their own offices, which is much more important?—Yes.

47,514. I want to know what work the Central Office could do in the absence of the solicitors?—Take, for instance, the Bankruptcy Department, at half-past 3 I get a receiving order, and the registrar has done with it when he has made the order. Very many forms then have to be filled up, and they are left with the registrar's clerk to be called for the next morning, and that work may take the registrar's clerk half an hour after 4 o'clock.

47,515. Is that work not done after 4 o'clock?—Frequently; but the solicitor is not necessarily there.

47,516. No; the solicitor is not wanted for that, but the work is done?—The work is done; and in the Taxing Office it is very often the case that they wait after 4 o'clock to complete matters. Sometimes I have been as late even as 5 o'clock before the taxing master.

47,517. The question that arises in my mind is this: supposing there was a rule that the clerks were to remain until 6 o'clock, what do you think they would be doing between 4 and 6 o'clock?—In the majority of cases, nothing.

47,518. They would have nothing to do?—They would have nothing to do, because their work is up to date. Take, for instance, the Writ Department: When an appearance is tendered it is entered immediately, for fear that the solicitors for the other party might come and enter judgment in default of appearance. Those books are kept up instantaneously; and that applies to many of the other departments.

47,519. (Chairman.) Would it be the case that in the Chancery departments there is a great deal of work which is not dependent on the presence of practitioners?—I am afraid my modern experience in Chancery would not be very valuable, because I do not go into Chancery now, and have not done so for 25 years.

47,520. But there is a large amount of perusal of documents and administrative work that is not necessarily dependent on the presence of practitioners?—A great deal.

47,521. So that that work could be done in hours when the office was not open to practitioners?—Quite so.

47,522. (Sir John Kempe.) What sort of length of service would it require to turn out a junior clerk fit for helping a managing clerk at the courts in work such as you described just now?—It is rather difficult to answer that question. As a rule, I should not take an assistant with me who had not had experience in other offices. My present assistant has been with me over 20 years, and therefore he knows exactly what my ideas are, and consequently he is of very great assistance. But in other cases it depends upon their experience entirely. We find a difficulty sometimes in getting a competent clerk, unless we can hit upon one who has had some experience or who is amenable to teaching, but I cannot fix any arbitrary time.

47,523. Would you turn one out in two or three years? Have you ever known a case where a man in two or three years would learn his duties sufficiently?—Yes. I have had clerks—quite virgin soil—and I have turned them out for practical purposes in that time.

47,524. Then it is quite possible for an intelligent man to learn his duties in two or three years?—If he is willing to learn them, and is sufficiently intelligent.

47,525. Quite sufficiently intelligent to be appointed a clerk in the Supreme Court or the Chancery offices?—I should say so.

47,526. (Mr. Shipley.) When you work until half-past 11 at night, does that mean that the offices of Messrs. Trinder, Capron & Co. are open and I could get at you at 10.45 p.m., or do you take work home?—I very seldom take work home. You can certainly find one of our partners there until 9 or half-past, and even later.

47,527. Are you open to the public then?—No, we are preparing for trial and putting matters into shape.

47,528. I believe quite a lot of lawyers in Edinburgh see clients at very late hours?—I am afraid we do not keep such late hours in the city.

47,529. Mr. Tulkinghorn, in "Bleak House," was, at any rate, accessible until very late at night?—I remember the time when solicitors' closing time for their offices was nine o'clock, and judges' chambers sat until eight o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAM JOSIAH DISTURNAL, K.C., called and examined.

47,530. (Chairman.) You are a King's counsel and Recorder of the Borough of Dudley?—I am.

47,531. The evidence you are about to give is on behalf of the General Council of the Bar?—Yes.

47,532. In what division is your practice as a barrister?—Mainly in the King's Bench Division.

47,533. Have you much experience of chamber practice?—Yes. From the time I was called up to the time I took silk, somewhere about 28 years, I had very considerable experience of practice in chambers.

47,534. So that what you are prepared to speak of is the work of the masters in the King's Bench Division?—That is so.

47,535. Particularly on the judicial side of their business?—Yes.

47,536. The Commission have already had evidence as to the method of appointment of the masters and their statutory qualifications. Will you give us your view as to the qualifications, as regards previous experience, which are necessary for masters of the King's Bench Division?—The view I take of it is this: The office of master in the King's Bench Division is apart altogether; it is an office entirely different to any other office of the courts, and, it seems to me, that the best persons to appoint would be barristers, as they are in fact now appointed, who have had some considerable practice in the King's Bench Division. The Act of Parliament only provides for five years' practice. The opinion I have formed—and I think it is shared by my colleagues on the Bar Council—is that that is not enough, and, in point of fact, I understand the present masters had considerably longer experience at the Bar before their appointment, some of them—I think, in fact, most of them—15 years.

47,537. Most of them, I should suppose, more than 15 years?—Yes.

47,538. So that the question of the exact statutory period of qualification is rather theoretical than practical?—No doubt it is. Of course, it is analogous to the case of judges. I believe, under the Judicature Act, a judge must be a barrister of not less than 10 years' standing, but one would be surprised to find that judges were appointed from barristers who had only had 10 years' experience; in point of fact, it is much longer.

47,539. (Lord Mersey.) How long had Lord Chief Justice Thesiger been at the Bar when he was appointed?—I am not quite sure, but he was an exception—one of the well-known exceptions. He was before my day.

47,540. Ten or 12 years, I think?—I understood it was somewhere about that time.

47,541. (Chairman.) Your opinion is, that in any case, it ought to be not less than 10 years?—Not less than 10 years. Really, the great asset in chambers is experience. It is not so much an accurate knowledge of the law; it is experience of the work. A man who has had experience of the practice can do it far more efficiently than a man who has got a great deal more learning and who has had only a little experience. That is what we find.

47,542. In your précis you speak of "10 years' practice," not of "10 years' standing." Is "practice" somewhat difficult to define?—Of course it is. If you define it by statute, I submit you will have to say, "10 years' standing," or some period from the date of call; but, in point of fact, I think that would probably be merely nominal in a great many cases, because

Mr. WILLIAM JOSIAH DISTURNAL, K.C.

men do not begin to practise, as a rule, for the first year or two.

47,543. By whom do you consider the appointment should be made?—It is very necessary that the person who makes the appointment should know something of the men he is appointing or of the candidates for the position, and he should know all about the duties to be performed. Now the Act of Parliament at present puts the appointments into the hands, as you know, of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls, in rotation. Personally I see no reason at all why that should be departed from. It has worked very satisfactorily up to the present, so far as I know. The only possible suggestion that might be made is that men might be nominated by the Rule Committee or something of that kind, but it is a mere suggestion. I do not attach a great deal of importance to it.

47,544. Have those high officers actual personal knowledge of the candidates for such appointments?—I should think the Lord Chief Justice appointing men from the common law bar would always have direct knowledge of them, and I should think the Master of the Rolls, too, must have direct knowledge of them, because the men from time to time are appearing in the Court of Appeal where he habitually sits, doing appellate work, and very often appellate work from King's Bench chambers. As to the Lord Chancellor, of course, he would not have quite the same opportunity of seeing the men who do the work as the other two have; but there are means of inquiry which one knows.

47,545. The suggestion has been made to the Commission that the Lord Chancellor or other high appointing authority should be assisted by something in the nature of a standing committee, on which the officers of the department concerned should be represented, presumably the judges in this case, and possibly some outside authority (the Civil Service Commission was mentioned), and that a committee of that kind should report on the merits of the candidates, leaving the responsibility for the ultimate appointment with the high appointing authority. What do you say to a suggestion of that kind?—It would depend very largely upon the committee. I do not know quite what any person who was not a lawyer could say to the matter, or how he could assist at all. If you had judges who were constantly meeting the counsel who were likely to be appointed, that might do; but I should deprecate having a committee, for instance, on which the Bar were represented or any outsiders were represented. It seems to me that you must have it practically in the hands of the high judicial authorities. The suggestion I made—and it was a mere suggestion, because I had in my mind particularly the case of the Lord Chancellor, who is not so closely in contact with the men as the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls—was that he might have nominations from the judges on the Rule Committee for instance. That is put forward as a suggestion. I do not attach a great deal of importance to it; but I should strongly deprecate having on the committee people who did not know the men and did not know the duties.

47,546. It has also been represented to us in evidence by a gentleman who is a solicitor that the experience of solicitors qualifies them quite as well as barristers for appointment to masterships in the King's Bench, and that those appointments should be open to both branches of the profession. You have already said that you think they should be open to barristers only. Will you give your reasons somewhat more fully?—It is difficult to concentrate the results of experience in a few words, but one knows from experience that the important business that is done before the masters is done by junior counsel; it is not done by solicitors. The best solicitors themselves do not appear in chambers except on the rarest occasions; they have a staff of managing clerks who attend to their particular business, and when they want business of importance done they go to junior counsel. Now the masters are dealing as specialists with all the preliminary matters in a common law action—most important stages in an action, because if the preliminary matters are not properly arranged, you cannot really get a proper trial. All that business is done by junior counsel and not by solicitors, and it seems to me that the men who have made it the business of their lives to do this kind of work would be the best men to appoint to the position. That, speaking generally, is the basis of it. I am not for an instant suggesting that there are not many solicitors who could be found to do the work equally well, but I am speaking of the matter as a rule. It does seem to me, apart from special exceptions, that you would be much more likely to find suitable candidates amongst the ranks of the common law Bar than amongst the ranks of solicitors. I do not think the best solicitors would take the position.

47,547. You have mentioned the preparation of all the preliminary stages of an action. Is not that a matter in which solicitors are concerned quite as much as junior barristers?—No, I do not think it is, in the sense that I mean. Of course, the solicitor comes into contact with a client first of all and receives his instructions. Taking the ordinary course of litigation, probably what is done is, he gets together certain materials which he thinks necessary in the matter, and, if the case is of any importance, he goes to junior counsel and takes his opinion as to the form of proceeding which should be adopted. Upon the opinion of junior counsel the process, writ, or whatever it may be, is issued, and that is prepared by junior counsel if it is a matter of any complication at all. Then an appearance is entered in the action, and there are various summonses and steps in the action which are all carried through—beyond ordinary routine matters—by junior counsel. The junior counsel prepares the statement of claim on the one side and the defence on the other; he prepares the interrogatories, and he advises on the evidence. Of course I am not a solicitor, and have never practised as a solicitor, but it seems to me that a solicitor's duty is the work of his office, seeing that the material that he is advised to get is got, seeing his client on the matter, and dealing generally with his client's affairs as a matter of business, rather than conducting an action in its various technical details. In point of fact, in practice, the people who do that work in the preliminary stages of an action are junior counsel, and the fact that they do it as a rule, as it seems to me, shows that solicitors find it convenient to instruct them. There is no technical rule which prevents a solicitor doing the work himself if he likes, but he usually instructs counsel to do it.

47,548. In simple and straightforward actions, does not the solicitor do it himself?—I should say that in my experience I have known very few actions indeed in which the pleadings on either side have been signed by a solicitor. I have not attempted to get out figures, but the number is infinitesimal. There was one well-known firm in London who, I believe, as a rule, did their own pleadings, but to my knowledge they have abandoned it now, and go to counsel to do the work for them.

47,549. As a rule the work would be done by counsel?—As a rule, in the vast majority of cases, it is done by counsel.

47,550. Your view is that it is that experience of a barrister which is specially valuable for subsequent work as a master?—Yes. Cases may be made or marred in their preliminary stages. If they are not properly presented or properly got up, and the issues not correctly defined in the pleadings, the trial is very likely to go wrong.

47,551. Will you develop the views which you have expressed with regard to some of the particular classes of business which come before masters?—I have, in the précis I have given to the Commission, taken out a few typical instances of a master's duties. Of course it was not possible to take more than a few instances. The first I put is what we know as a summons for directions. A summons for directions is issued after the appearance is entered, and that summons comes before the master, and the master has to make a forecast of the probable and desirable course of the action. He has to decide on the mode of trial, whether it shall be tried before a judge alone or with a jury, or whether it shall be sent to an official referee. He has to decide upon

Mr. WILLIAM JOSIAH DISTURNAL, K.C.

the place of trial. It may happen that the action may possibly be decided on a certain simple issue, whereas to try the whole would involve an enormous expense; and if the master sees that, by picking out certain issues, the matter may be conveniently and inexpensively disposed of, then he will say that that issue shall be tried before the others. He has to decide whether there shall be pleadings or not. When I say that, I should point out that in modern days it has been seen that pleadings are necessary in almost every case, so that the master practically always orders pleadings. But then, when the pleadings are delivered on each side, it may be said by the defendant: "This statement of claim is insufficient; it does not clearly indicate the case the defendant has to meet. I want particulars as to certain paragraphs." On the other hand the plaintiff may complain of the defence in the same way. The master has to decide upon all these matters, whether the pleadings are fair and clear, and whether they sufficiently define the issues which the Court has to try, and enable each party to understand the case he has to meet and so avoid the expense of an adjournment for the purpose of calling other evidence. You may have a very simple case where all that may be a mere matter of routine; but in the vast majority of cases you want a very great deal of knowledge and a very great deal of experience in order to decide these points.

47,552. Are not those matters of which you have been speaking—the forecasting of the probable course of the trial, settling what court it should go to, and whether it should go to a referee, and so forth—matters with which solicitors as well as barristers are continually dealing?—Some of the matters. A solicitor naturally knows, probably better than anybody, where the case should be tried. If it is a circuit case, he would say, "It is more convenient that the case should be tried on circuit than in London;" but I think in the majority of cases the solicitor would come to counsel and say, "Had we better have a jury—a special or a common jury?" and he would take the view of counsel on the matter. With reference to the pleadings the solicitor usually goes to counsel to draw them; the counsel signs the pleadings and the solicitor is not going to make himself responsible for somebody else's pleadings which he has paid to have drawn for his clients, so he takes the view of counsel upon a pleading. If any question arises on the pleadings he takes counsel before the master to support his own pleadings, or attack the other side's pleadings, as the case may be. That is the way it usually works out. Another duty, and a very important duty, which the master has to deal with on the King's Bench side is Order XIV. summonses. You may have an Order XIV. summons which may be a mere process in a debt-collecting business; but on the other hand, in a great many cases, the master has to have a very keen apprehension to see whether a real defence is made out by the affidavit, or whether it is something which is purely specious and merely for the purpose of delay.

47,553. (Mr. Coward.) He has only to decide whether or not there is a case to try?—Certainly.

47,554. If he comes to the conclusion that there is a case to try, there is no judgment under Order XIV.?—That is quite right, but one knows perfectly well that a man may owe a debt and there may be no defence to it whatever, except that he does not want to pay or cannot pay, but he makes an affidavit of some kind which, as a rule, is a very long one. That is a common thing for a defendant, who wants to get out of paying, to do; he makes a very long and elaborate affidavit, but when that affidavit is read there is absolutely nothing in it from beginning to end, and the master has to be able to appreciate the true position. If there is no probable defence shown, he ought to give judgment, or he may be doing the plaintiff a very great injustice by depriving him of his money altogether. Supposing the master decides that leave to defend should be given, he has then to exercise according to his experience very considerable discretion as to the way the matter shall be disposed of. It may go into the general list for a formal trial, which in ordinary times when the courts are pretty full of business may involve months of delay. On the other hand he may say, "This is a perfectly simple matter; it shall go into the short cause list, and be disposed of perhaps next week or within a fortnight;" or he may send it to the County Court, or he may say, as he does very frequently—and parties are very eager to have him do it if he will—"I will try this myself, if you agree," and he gives the parties then and there a day and an hour when he will sit and hear the case just as a judge would do, in the presence of witnesses and counsel (if the parties like to brief counsel). The master will take it perhaps within a week and try the case himself.

47,555. In how many cases have you known that done, in the last five years?—It is very difficult for me to say how many. I have known it frequently done, and have appeared in such cases myself very frequently. Masters do not do it now, I know, because they are otherwise occupied—I mean since the war commenced they have been dealing with abnormal conditions. Before the war and before this emergency legislation, the masters occupied a great deal of their time in taking references of one kind or another.

47,556. It is not my experience?—Well, it is my experience.

47,557. (Chairman.) Your point is, that in dealing with these matters a master has in the first instance to judge of the value of affidavits submitted, and in the second place to decide how the case shall be tried?—Yes.

47,558. And for this purpose is experience as a barrister more valuable than experience as a solicitor?—Yes, I think so. As a barrister he is accustomed to appear in court; a solicitor is not. He knows the course of trial and the methods of trial and the way things can be presented to the judge and to the jury. He has got all that in his mind and all the knowledge and all the skill based upon that experience.

47,559. We need not go through all the different kinds of proceedings which you mention in your précis, but will you turn to "The preservation or sale of property, the subject matter of an action." You point out that a master has to exercise a discretion in such matters and consult the interests of the persons concerned?—Yes.

47,560. Is that a matter with which a barrister would more often have to deal than a solicitor? I mean, is the experience which would enable a man to deal with questions of that kind acquired by a barrister rather than by a solicitor?—Of course, one must be perfectly frank about it. The solicitor probably knows the business side of the thing better than the barrister does, as to how the property should be disposed of, and what is the best way of disposing of it.

47,561. (Lord Mersey.) And the lay client knows it better than anyone?—Certainly, but the barrister will know the effect of any particular order that is made and how that order may operate, probably, better than the solicitor. It is to be remembered that you may be creating positions by these orders which cannot altogether be set right by the judgment. There are many cases where the judgment cannot bring the parties into the same position as they were in before the order was made.

47,562. As a matter of fact, in the King's Bench Division, the appointments to masterships are exclusively made from the Bar?—Yes.

47,563. It is competent for the persons having the patronage to make the appointments, if they choose, from solicitors?—It is.

47,564. But as a matter of fact we know that for a long time they have been taken exclusively from the Bar?—Yes.

47,565. As far as I know the evidence that has been taken by this Commission, it is admitted that that has worked very well?—It has.

47,566. And that the present staff of masters discharge their duty very well?—Yes.

47,567. So far as you know, no real exception is taken to the propriety of these appointments?—I do not know of any.

47,568. Under those circumstances, is it desirable to make any change?—I should have thought not.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM JOSIAH DISTURNAL, K.C.

47,569. It is competent for the Lord Chief Justice or the Master of the Rolls or the Lord Chancellor to appoint a solicitor if he thinks fit?—It is.

47,570. And it has been done at times?—It has. May I say this: at one time, as your lordship knows, taxing was done by the King's Bench masters, and I think any member of the Bar would admit that solicitors would know far more about taxation of costs than any barrister. It was found that that was work which did not go with the ordinary work of the masters. Solicitors were appointed in those days occasionally, and did taxation work, no doubt, very successfully. Then all the taxation was taken away from the King's Bench masters and put into a separate department, and solicitors held those appointments, and since that time the masters of the King's Bench Division have been barristers exclusively and done the work most successfully. In fact, as I have stated in my précis, so far as the present generation of the Bar is concerned, the work has never been done more efficiently than it has been done in the last few years.

47,571. (Chairman.) You have no criticisms to make on the manner in which the work is done, or the punctuality and rapidity with which it is done?—None at all. The masters not only do it efficiently, but, what is perhaps of more importance, exercise great tact and courtesy, and every consideration is given to the parties and counsel, so that the work is done with the least possible friction.

47,572. You are not brought into contact with the officers of the department apart from the masters themselves?—No.

47,573. So far as you see the results of the working of the offices of the court, have you any criticisms to make?—No, none at all.

47,574. As regards the position of the masters, do you consider the present salaries to be suitable?—Salary is a very difficult thing to deal with. The present salaries have attracted good men—that is all I can say.

47,575. They have attracted sufficiently good men?—They have attracted sufficiently good men.

47,576. Have you any observations to put before the Commission on the subject of their pensions?—The only thing one can say about it is this: the subject of pensions is not one of which I have any personal knowledge, but I understand they are based, ordinarily speaking, on years of service. Now it is obvious that if a man is appointed, say, at the age of 45 (which is a very good age at which to appoint a man as master), it might be desirable that he should give it up after 20 years, at the age of 65, and then probably he would not get the full pension unless certain years were added. So if you do not add some years, when you were asking a man at the age of 45 whether he would take the position, he would say, "No, I think not," and in that sort of way you might lose a very good man to the public.

47,577. Your inference is that the system of added years for the purpose of pension is a desirable one to retain?—I think so. I think it should be in the discretion of some body—the Treasury or the appointing person—to be able to deal with it from the point of view of the particular man.

47,578. You would make it a matter for consideration in each individual case, and not make some general rule applicable to the whole class?—I think in each individual case, because, as it seems to me, you have to consider it from the point of view of every individual when you are considering whether or not you will appoint him to that particular position.

47,579. At present there is no fixed age for the retirement of masters?—So I understand.

47,580. Do you consider that it would be desirable to have a fixed age for retirement?—I do not know. Men vary a very great deal. One can remember in times gone by, when the masters were very much older than they are now, or at least they appeared to be much older then, because some of us were younger. Some men are unfit at 70, others are most active at 70, and a great many years after 70. It is very difficult to state a general rule upon a matter of that sort. I think, probably, the head officials, like the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls, might be left to deal with the matter.

47,581. Have you known any cases in which men have remained at work after their powers had begun to diminish?—Yes; but, I think, as a rule, it is soon brought home to them, and they then retire.

47,582. On the other hand, it is less invidious to apply a dispensing power if a limit of age is fixed for retirement than to apply pressure where there is no fixed age?—No doubt; but, on the other hand, you may be losing for the public a very good man, and working some hardship on the individual. It is a balance of advantages and disadvantages.

47,583. Have you known any cases in which there has been disadvantage to the public from too great prolongation of a master's services?—I do not know that I have, in recent years, at any rate.

47,584. (Lord Mersey.) I suppose the diminution of a man's powers by age is sometimes compensated for by his increased experience?—Certainly.

47,585. I am thinking, at the present moment, of one of the registrars in Bankruptcy?—I know the gentleman you mean. Of course he is a man of considerable age now, and yet he is a man of immense experience. I do not often go into the Bankruptcy Department, but I should think he does his work very efficiently. The man I had in mind was a master in the King's Bench Division—I do not mind mentioning his name—Master Wilberforce, who died a little over a year ago. He was quite an old man.

47,586. (Chairman.) What was his age?—I believe he was very nearly 80.

47,587. Was he in office until his death?—Until his death; and he was a most efficient master—a man with an alert mind and very quick, who knew all the work and did it very expeditiously and very well. I think it would have been a great loss to have got rid of a master like Master Wilberforce, say, at the age of 70.

47,588. (Bishop of Southwark.) That is to say, I suppose, that a definite system of retirement would prove more costly than is worth while?—I was not considering it so much from the point of view of the amount of the pension and the monetary burden on the public. I was thinking that, if you fix a definite age like 70, or some age of that sort, for compulsory retirement, in many cases it would operate to get rid of efficient and good men.

47,589. (Chairman.) Turning now to the question of circuit officers, the Commission has not yet taken any evidence on this point; but, as that is a matter on which the Bar Council wish to offer some observations, we are prepared to hear you. Will you tell us first what the officials on each circuit are?—There is first of all an officer who is usually called the Clerk of Assize; he is sometimes called the Clerk of the Crown. Then there are one or more subordinate officers, viz., the Deputy Clerk of Assize, or Clerk of Arraignment, or Clerk of Indictments. Then there is an Associate. All those gentlemen together form the circuit officers, and they, as a rule, have an office in London, where they receive documents, e.g., depositions and the record in a cause, if the cause is entered at the Circuit Office, on behalf of the circuit judge.

47,590. Does that mainly relate to criminal work?—No. The depositions, of course, relate to the criminal work, and the Clerk of Assize is more concerned with the criminal work than with the civil work; but a cause may be entered at the Circuit Office for trial at a circuit town, and when that is done the papers are received by the gentleman who is called the associate.

47,591. Does the Clerk of Assize draw the indictments in criminal cases?—The Clerk of Assize or the Clerk of Indictments, as the case may be. Probably the Clerk of Indictments is the man who takes that upon himself primarily, but no doubt it is shared in practice between them. Of course, all the bills have to be ready for presentment to the grand jury upon the first day of the assizes. The circuit officers receive the depositions from magistrates' clerks in the counties soon after the cases are committed for trial; and, I suppose, proceed with the preparation of the indictments, so as to have them all in order at the time when the judge arrives at the particular circuit town.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM JOSIAH DISTURNAL, K.C.

47,592. What are the duties of the officers at the assizes?—The Clerk of Assize usually sits in the Crown Court, and he arraigns the prisoners and takes their pleas. The Clerk of Indictments probably is sitting in some adjoining room taxing the costs—the amounts to be paid to solicitor and counsel and the various witnesses; and it is upon his order that a charge is made upon the local authority who has to pay the bill. For instance, in a county with a number of county boroughs, the moneys are first of all paid by the treasurer of the administrative county, and then a charge may have to be made upon the county borough by the administrative county; and it is the certificate of the taxing officer which governs the amounts which have to be allowed by a county borough to the administrative county.

47,593. That taxing has to be done immediately and on the spot?—Yes, because of course the witnesses are very often people of the humbler classes; they come to the Assize town without any money, and their expenses have to be paid to them there and then immediately the case is over, so that the taxation must be completed at once. The associate as a rule only attends to the civil business. He acts like the analogous official in London; he sits with the judge in court, swears the juries, and gives the certificate of the result of the trial upon which judgment is entered.

47,594. It is on his certificate that the judgment or order is drawn up?—Yes, in the district registry or in the Central Office, as the case may be, wherever the case may have been proceeding.

47,595. He does not draw up the order himself in any case?—No, but of course the certificate has to be done with great accuracy, or else it is bound to lead to trouble.

47,596. Is the work of the circuit officers continuous all the year round, or is it concentrated at certain periods of the year?—The circuits vary to some extent. The Northern Circuit (of which I am not a member), which is the largest circuit, has four circuits a year, and so they have on the North-Eastern Circuit; but an ordinary circuit has three circuits a year—the winter and summer assizes, at which they take both civil and criminal business, and the autumn assizes, at which they as a rule (with the exception of certain large towns) take criminal work alone. Roughly speaking, on the Oxford Circuit, each assize lasts about six weeks, and that would represent eighteen weeks in a year for the three assizes.

47,597. (Lord Mersey.) But the third criminal assize does not take six weeks?—Probably not quite six weeks. Taking one with the other it may be a little less than eighteen weeks in the total. I have never added it up, but it is somewhere about sixteen to eighteen weeks a year. In the meantime between the circuits somebody has to be in attendance at the office to receive depositions and communications from magistrates' clerks, the entries of causes and any communications from solicitors upon the matters, and also of course to draw the indictments which have to be ready for presentment to the grand jury.

47,598. (Chairman.) Does that work occupy much of the time of a clerk of assize between the assizes?—Except for a week or two immediately before the circuit begins I should think probably not, but I really do not know.

47,599. (Lord Mersey.) And there are three officials to do it?—Yes.

47,600. (Chairman.) How are the clerks of assize appointed?—They are appointed by the senior judge going the winter and summer circuit respectively.

47,601. Is there a statutory qualification?—Yes. No one can be appointed unless he has during a period of not less than three years been either a barrister in actual practice, a special pleader or conveyancer in actual practice, or a solicitor in actual practice. Of course, some of the old officials, who were appointed before the Act of 1869, were neither barristers nor solicitors.

47,602. As a matter of fact, have recent appointments been made from among barristers or solicitors?—There was a recent appointment on the Oxford

Circuit of a member of the Bar. There was an appointment on the Midland Circuit, recently, of one who was not a member of the Bar or a solicitor, but he was appointed not by the judge, but by the then clerk of assize, who had the power of appointing subordinate officers.

47,603. That was one of the subordinate officers?—Yes.

47,604. Are the clerks of assize, themselves, all barristers?—Yes, I think, as a rule, they are now. Up till the time of the recent appointment on the Oxford Circuit, the clerk of assize on that circuit was a solicitor; and the clerk of assize on the Oxford Circuit had been a solicitor for very many years.

47,605. Do you consider that that system of appointment is satisfactory?—Yes, I see no reason to change it. The work is done efficiently.

47,606. Have you had considerable circuit experience?—Yes, I have gone the Oxford Circuit regularly, and also attended the Birmingham Assizes, where the Oxford Circuit meets the Midland Circuit, and where the Midland Circuit officers take the business.

47,607. So you have had the opportunity of judging how the work is done?—Yes, on those two circuits.

47,608. And your opinion is that it is done satisfactorily and efficiently?—Quite. One has to remember this about the circuit work: The work is, no doubt, intermittent. As I have already pointed out, the really active work is during some 16 to 18 weeks in the year, but the salaries of the officers are not large by any manner of means. I think a clerk of assize, who is the head official, gets only some 800*l.* a year.

47,609. With the exception of the Northern Circuit, where he gets 1,000*l.* a year?—Perhaps so, on the Northern Circuit, but, I think, on the majority of circuits it is 800*l.* a year.

47,610. You have no suggestions or criticisms to make on the present position as regards the method of appointment or the way the work is done?—None at all, the work is done well, and I see no reason for changing it.

47,611. (Mr. Coward.) I only desire to say that I am afraid I take a very different view to yourself as to the work that is done by the solicitors in the preparation of cases for trial. From what you say I should assume your view to be that counsel does everything?—No, indeed. I do not think anything of the sort.

47,612. Then I misunderstood you. I do not want to say any more if that is the case. From the time an action is started the preparation of the pleadings is always done by counsel?—Certainly.

47,613. But apart from that, and possibly advice on evidence, the whole of the case, in my experience, is conducted by the solicitor upon his own responsibility and in the way he thinks is most conducive to his client's interests?—I am quite aware of that.

(Mr. Coward.) He never would go near counsel for the purpose of endorsing the writs or anything else. However, I quite agree with what Lord Mersey said, that it is in the power of those who have these appointments to appoint solicitors as masters, and consequently I do not think it necessary that we should go into this question. I did not like the notes to have no qualification upon them with regard to this point, hence I have said what I did. Otherwise I have nothing more to put to you.

47,614. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I understand you to say that in your judgment the existing system of appointing masters in the Central Office works admirably?—Yes.

47,615. And it does so largely because the judges, who appoint, have opportunities of knowing who are the best possible candidates?—I should think that has a great deal to do with it. In point of fact, they have appointed very good men.

47,616. Have you a list before you of the names of the existing masters and assistant masters?—No; but I know them perfectly well without a list. There are only six King's Bench masters.

47,617. I think you will find there are nine altogether—seven masters and two assistant masters?—Yes, there are the masters in the Crown Office. I was

3 March 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM JOSIAH DISTURNAL, K.C.

distinguishing them, and my evidence has related mainly to the King's Bench.

47,618. You mean Sir John Macdonell of the Crown Office?—No, he is senior master of the King's Bench Division.

47,619. If you look at the names in that list, I think you will find that there are seven masters and two assistant masters?—Yes.

47,620. Looking down those names, is it not the case that four of them are sons of judges?—As to the second name on the list, I believe his father was a judge, who died years before he became a master. As to the fourth one, I believe his father had died before he became a master; and as to the last one, his father had retired before he became a master.

47,621. But four are, in fact, sons of judges?—No doubt, but I do not know what inference is to be drawn from that.

47,622. I am not at present drawing any inference: but they are, in fact, sons of judges?—Their fathers were judges, yes.

47,623. The distinction is valuable. There are three others whose relatives are judges?—I do not know.

47,624. If that is the case, do you believe that it is a pure coincidence that the best man happened to be a son or a relation of a judge?—(Lord Mersey.) Heredity I suppose has nothing to do with it?—I leave out of account altogether the question of heredity, but I do not know in any of the cases that you have mentioned that there is the slightest foundation for any suggestion that any improper appointment was made in those cases.

47,625. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Have you before you the names of the clerks of assize?—No.

47,626. I will hand you the list (handing a list to the witness). There are eight names on that list. Are five of those names apparently the sons of judges?—I recognise five names as having been borne by judges, and some I know are the sons of judges.

47,627. Are there any other names you recognise as belonging to legal families, or related to legal families in that sense?—The first name is certainly a legal name. The second name, I should think, was not a legal name. The third name is certainly a legal name, and I believe he is the son of a judge. The fourth name I do not know. The fifth name is certainly a legal name, and I believe the son of a judge, and so is the sixth name on the list.

47,628. (Lord Mersey.) But I will put it much more plainly. Is it not the fact that there has been—I do not say improperly at all—a tendency for judges going circuit to appoint their sons, if they happen to have barrister sons, to the position of clerk of assize?—I really cannot answer that question.

47,629. Cannot you? I think if you tried you could answer it?—I know in one case on the Oxford Circuit a judge did appoint his son to the position.

47,630. I see no harm in it myself?—I was going to say that I do not know that it is any disqualification that a man is the son of a judge.

Mr. JAMES AUSTEN-CARTMELL, called and examined.

47,631. (Chairman.) You are a barrister?—Yes, I am a member of the Junior Bar. I was called to the Bar in 1889, and I have practised ever since at the Chancery Bar. I was appointed in 1908 to be junior counsel to the Inland Revenue on the equity side and to one or two similar posts. In 1913 when Mr. Justice Sargant was raised to the Bench I was appointed to succeed him as junior counsel in equity to the Treasury and Board of Trade, and I hold those appointments now.

47,632. The evidence you are prepared to give relates chiefly to the Chancery masters and registrars, and also to the taxing masters?—Yes; but as to the taxing masters in so far only as they deal with Chancery work.

47,633. The Commission has already had very full evidence from the senior master as regards the nature of the work of the Chancery masters, so we need not trouble you to repeat what the Commission has already before them as regards the nature of that work. Your experience at the Bar has included frequent appearances before the masters?—Yes, I have continually been before them. I do not mean to say that in the last year or two I have been before them quite so often, as counsel for the Crown does not appear before the masters in Crown cases; but in other cases I appear before them, and I may say that I have appeared before them in my time as much as any junior at the Bar.

47,634. Your contact is entirely with them, and not with any of their subordinate officers?—I may say that the reference in my précis to the junior counsel of over 20 years' standing is to myself. I have only once appeared before a master's subordinate—a chief clerk—and that was by consent on a very small application in a rather important case. The master was ill, and the senior clerk was taking his work pro tem.—that is all.

47,635. What do you think is the necessary experience and qualification for appointment as a Chancery master?—I think the most fully qualified man is a solicitor who has been in substantial practice as a principal, or at any rate as a managing clerk with a firm of very high standing indeed. The best man is a man from 35 to 45 years of age who has had a considerable number of years' responsible experience as a principal.

47,636. That, you think, is the training and experience which is most suitable for the work to be done?—I think so—the two sides: the legal training which is quite adequate in every way, and the business experience, which is even more important.

47,637. The Chancery master has a considerable amount of administrative work?—Yes, a great deal.

47,638. He has to exercise business discretion of the kind that a solicitor is in the habit of exercising?—Yes.

47,639. So you would not be in favour of considering the subordinate officers of masters eligible for promotion to the post of masters?—No, I think masters should be appointed straight from the ranks of practising solicitors.

47,640. The appointment at present rests with the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

47,641. Would you suggest any alteration in that?—No, I would not like to suggest any alteration in that.

47,642. Has the Lord Chancellor full opportunities for judging of the merits of the candidates?—So far as I am aware, yes. I have frequently, myself, when friends of mine or clients of mine have been candidates for the office of master, written testimonials and so forth; and I know from personal knowledge that the Lord Chancellor's secretary makes a point of inquiring into the antecedents and capabilities of all the gentlemen who offer themselves for the appointments.

47,643. In your experience, is the work satisfactorily done?—Admirably.

47,644. And without arrears?—Yes.

47,645. Does the organisation of the work appear to you to be satisfactory?—Quite.

47,646. You have no suggestions to make as to any alterations in organisation?—No, I have no suggestions. I may say that at present the time of the masters and of the clerks may not be fully occupied; but that is due to circumstances over which none of us here have any control. The existing state of business is such that there is, if I may say so, a certain slump in legal work.

47,647. Apart from the circumstances of the moment, there has been, say, in the last 25 years, a considerable reduction in the amount of Chancery business?—Yes. There is a tendency for the old long administration actions not to be carried on in the way they used to be. But it is really impossible to say with certainty whether in one year there will not be a great deal more work than there was in the previous year. I think the tendency has been for it to drop. It is possible, though I do not venture to speak with any authority, that some reduction in the number, perhaps, even of the masters themselves, and possibly of the staff, might be advantageously carried out. For instance, there are four masters now to every linked pair of Chancery judges. Again, I do not wish to speak with any authority, but it is a matter for consideration whether three could not do the whole of the work.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. JAMES AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

47,648. Are you satisfied with the arrangements that are made for doing work arising in the vacation?—So far as I know, yes. I have not practised in the vacation myself for some years; but I always find, when I get back, that the work which remained to be done at the end of the previous sittings has been got through, and I have never heard any complaint from counsel or others who have stayed up during the vacation that the work in masters' chambers was not properly attended to.

47,649. At present there is no fixed age for the retirement of masters?—No, there is no fixed time for retirement.

47,650. The suggestion has been made in evidence that it would be desirable to have a fixed age, and I think some previous Committees and Commissions have suggested the age of 70. What is your view as to that suggestion?—I think it depends, if I may say so, upon the man. There have been masters, certainly, of 70 who have been absolutely well qualified to do the work. Experience counts for a very great deal in the efficiency of a master. On the other hand, when a man gets towards the age of 70, he naturally has not got the same physical powers as he had at an earlier age. I should, myself, have thought that a man's best work as master would be between 45 and 60 to 70; that is my view.

47,651. At any rate, you see no objection to fixing an age limit for retirement?—No, provided that it were fixed at a sufficiently late age to enable a man to earn a sufficient pension. Supposing a man is not appointed until he is 40 to 45, he must have a sufficient period of possible office during which he may earn an adequate pension; otherwise you would not get the best men to take the post.

47,652. (Lord Mersey.) But you would not have an incompetent man kept on for the mere purpose of earning a pension?—Certainly not. That case is always provided for. It is always in the power of the Lord Chancellor to compulsorily retire an incompetent man. What I mean is this: It has been put to me that 70 would be the right age, and I accept that, if I may say so, because I think the bulk of the masters are appointed from the age of 35 to 40 or 45, and that age would give them practically sufficient length of service to earn the full pension.

47,653. (Chairman.) Your suggestion in fact is this, that if a fixed age for retirement is laid down it becomes more important to arrange the pension system so as to secure an adequate pension to a man retiring at that age?—Yes, that is the point.

47,654. That has in the past been, to some extent, arranged by means of a system of added years at the time of appointment?—Yes.

47,655. Would you be in favour of the application of that system to appointments to masterships?—Yes, I think so. So that if a man is retired at 70, or whatever is the age chosen, it should be clear that he would receive a pension which it would be worth while for him to accept.

47,656. Do you think that any devolution of work at present performed by the masters themselves is possible?—I doubt it. I do not think that any devolution which is merely designed to save the masters from doing the formal work could be substituted. There is a great deal of preliminary work that the principal clerks in fact do for the masters, but the responsible work must be done by the master himself.

47,657. The first class clerks do hear some simple kinds of motions in Chancery chambers?—Yes, I think so. They hear solicitors upon applications for particulars.

47,658. And applications for time, and things of that sort?—Yes.

47,659. Do you think that any extension of that system is desirable?—I think that is really more a matter for the masters themselves. I think the principal clerks can deal with formal applications quite well; but where there is a case which involves any judicial experience, it is desirable that the master should deal with it. As you are aware, masters' orders are judges' orders.

47,660. Do the Chancery masters attend in court at all?—They do not attend in court. They attend in chambers. The judge takes chamber summonses on Mondays, and the master in whose compartment the case is sits with the judge, either next him or just below him. Some judges sit on the bench, and the master sits where the registrar sits when the Court is sitting. Otherwise the judge sits below the bench and the master sits beside him. If, as sometimes happens, a question arises to which a reference to the master is needed, while a case is being heard in court, the judge sends for the master and speaks to him, but, except for that, the masters do not attend in court at all.

47,661. Do you think their attendance in court ought to be extended at all?—I doubt it. I do not think it is really requisite. They might with advantage be present on some summonses, but I should not press for it, and I think they have really quite enough to do in chambers. It is more a matter of procedure than anything else. The case is so rare in which the master would be wanted to sit in court, that I should not think it was really worth while to make any alteration in the practice. I only thought it desirable to call attention to the fact that there might be a few cases.

47,662. As regards the staff of the office, do you think the present system produces the right type of officers?—That is my view.

47,663. Do you consider that any previous legal experience is desirable in appointments to the subordinate staff?—I think it is an advantage. The best men for the clerkships in the Law Courts are, to my mind, men who have been clerks in solicitors' offices.

47,664. Do you think that a system of competition would be an improvement on the present method?—No, I do not think anything would be gained by it. I do not think it would ensure your getting a better man. One man might get more marks than another who would not be so qualified to do the work.

47,665. Does the present system ensure your getting the best men?—I think so; because the men who apply for these posts have their testimonials, and so forth, and the appointments are in the hands of the Lord Chancellor or in the hands of the Master of the Rolls or the Lord Chief Justice, and I think whoever appoints takes sufficient care to see that the applicants are qualified.

47,666. Do you find in practice that testimonials are a satisfactory way of ascertaining a man's qualifications?—Personally, if I give a man a testimonial, I try to satisfy myself that he is qualified for the post for which he is applying. It is difficult to say, as a general proposition, whether testimonials are satisfactory. My point rather is, that I do not think a competitive examination would be any true criterion.

47,667. One suggestion which has been made is that the clerks might be selected by a competitive examination among persons who have had a certain experience in a solicitor's office, say, five years?—I should see no objection to that at all.

47,668. Would that be less open to objection in your view than an open competition?—It would be certainly open to much less objection than open competition.

47,669. I think you have already told us that you are not in favour of making the clerks in the office eligible for promotion to masterships?—No.

47,670. Have you any observations to offer as regards the organisation of the office of the masters?—No, I do not think I am competent to do that. I can only judge by results, and, as far as I am aware, the machine seems to work quite well.

47,671. Turning now to the Chancery registrars, has your experience brought you much in contact with the registrars?—Continually. I do not want to speak too much of my experience, but I think I have, as counsel, drawn as many minutes of orders as anybody, and in that way I am continually coming across the registrar.

47,672. That is in cases where the judge directs that minutes should be signed by counsel?—Yes.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. JAMES AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

47,673. In those cases do the minutes practically amount to the order itself?—Yes, if they are properly drawn.

47,674. If they are properly drawn, the order is based upon them with very little modification?—Yes; it is for the registrars to see that the minutes are in accordance with what is right. The reason why minutes are directed to be signed by counsel is that they may depart to a certain extent from stereotyped forms, and they have to be adapted to the circumstances of the particular case. In such a case the registrar is not always in a position to take a full note of all the details of the case which have to be mastered, in order that the minutes may be properly drawn, and the judge directs counsel to sign the minutes. Then the minutes go to the registrar, and he has to see that, when they are drawn, an order in accordance with them would be a right and proper order from the point of view of procedure and practice. If he finds that something has been put in that ought not to be put in, he communicates with the counsel who draw the minutes.

47,675. And do counsel then meet the registrar?—No, you hardly ever meet. You usually write a note, or you can go and talk with the registrar privately in court or in his office. I do not think I have ever personally been before the registrar.

47,676. There is no formal appointment to settle the minutes in such cases?—No formal appointment at which I, as counsel, should attend. If any question does arise, I either write to the registrar or speak to him personally.

47,677. In your experience, is the registrars' work well done?—Yes, I think the registrars do their work extremely well, and they are a great safeguard of the practice and the procedure of the court.

47,678. The system of appointment of registrars differs, I think, from that of the masters, in that they are always appointed from among the principal clerks?—Yes.

47,679. In fact, up till now, there has been a statutory right of succession of the principal clerks?—Yes.

47,680. Does that seem to you to be a satisfactory system?—Taking it altogether, it does. It may be desirable possibly that there should be some economies effected, but that is hardly a subject for me to deal with. On the question of principle, it seems to me that the present system is quite satisfactory, and I doubt if it could be altered with any certainty of better results.

47,681. You have said that, in the case of the masters, you think it desirable to maintain the present absolute bar between the clerkships and the master-ships?—Yes.

47,682. In the case of the registrars you think it desirable to maintain not merely the possibility of promotion but the obligation of promotion. What is the exact difference between the work of the two offices which makes an exactly opposite system desirable in the two cases?—The registrar who is moved up from the man who has been going up the ladder reaches the post to which the whole of his training has been directed. I may start by saying that, to my mind, it would be a great pity if registrars were appointed otherwise than from what may be called the "College of Registrars," that is to say, the body of registrars in embryo. It would be a mistake, in my mind, to appoint a registrar direct from the Bar; it would also be a mistake to appoint him direct from the class of solicitors in practice. He must have the special training which can only be had in the office. I think, as a general rule, promotion by seniority works well, and certainly avoids friction, discontent, and so forth. A man goes into the office, learns his work as he goes along, and steps in in fulness of time into the post for which he has been trained.

47,683. Why do those considerations not apply to the masters?—Because the functions of the master qua his subordinates are really different. The master is in a limited sense a judge, he is brought in to deal with matters of administration and so forth, and is in his own chambers the man in command. The training that the clerkships give does not culminate in the master-ship. The whole training and work of what I call the "College of Registrars" culminate in the registrarship.

47,684. But is there any such complete difference. Take the case of an inquiry ordered by the Court. The inquiry is, to a great extent, conducted by the clerk in the master's office?—He has the evidence.

47,685. The ultimate approval of the certificate that is drawn no doubt depends upon the master, but the certificate is drawn by a first class clerk?—He does the drafting.

47,686. Is not the relation of principal clerk to the master in that case very similar to the relation of principal clerk to the registrar in the case of a complicated order?—I do not think so, because a certificate is certainly a very different matter from an order. An order is a very difficult and technical thing. A certificate merely answers the inquiries or gives the results of accounts that the judge directs.

47,687. An inquiry, say, in a pedigree case may be a complicated, difficult, and technical matter?—Yes. No doubt in the first instance the evidence is looked into and analysed by a master's clerk, but then the master in the end has to find the result himself.

47,688. The registrar has finally to settle the order?—That is perfectly true, but the man who has got to draft the order must know how to draft it to start with, otherwise it is useless.

47,689. Is the point this, that the work of drawing orders is so much more technical and difficult that a training in that particular work is necessary before a man is competent to succeed to the office of registrar?—That is my view, and that was the view I intended to bring out in my memorandum, and am endeavouring to bring out now—that you do want undoubtedly a special training in a special place for the office of registrar.

47,690. The work of the master is less technical than the work of the registrar?—Yes, less technical. The master must be a lawyer and a man of experience. The registrar ought to be a lawyer with a special kind of highly technical training.

47,691. The registrar has none of the business discretion that a master has to exercise?—No.

47,692. Would your observations about the age for retirement apply similarly to registrars?—Yes.

47,693. And as regards pension also?—Yes. May I say one thing about the primary qualification of gentlemen who enter the Registrars office. A question has been put to me whether the appointment was suitable for barristers, and I think I have already said that in my opinion it would be undesirable to appoint gentlemen straight from the Bar, or indeed straight from the solicitor's profession, to be registrars; but the men who are put on the ladder for registrarships ought, I think, to have some legal training, or some legal qualification before they enter the office. It is difficult to say really whether the best qualification is afforded by the Bar examination or by the solicitor's examination. I think both afford a good qualification, and a man who is able to pass either the Bar examination or the solicitor's examination has had that legal reading which makes him fit ground for the special training which is given in the Registrars Office. Which of the two examinations is the better it is rather difficult for me to say, but if I may say so in the presence of Mr. Coward, I am inclined to think that the solicitor's examination is the better, because it is wider and really a more difficult examination than the examination for the Bar.

47,694. (Mr. Coward.) And he has had a more practical training?—A man who passes his solicitor's examination and has been in a solicitor's office has actually seen orders in draft continually.

47,695. (Chairman.) Turning now to the taxing masters, a taxing master may be either a barrister or a solicitor?—Yes.

47,696. In practice they are all solicitors, except one, I think?—Yes.

47,697. What is your opinion on the point as to whether it is desirable that they should be barristers or solicitors?—I feel absolutely no doubt that they ought to be solicitors.

47,698. The solicitor's experience having better qualified him to deal with the question of costs?—Infinitely better. I do not think there is any comparison between the two.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. JAMES AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

47,699. As regards the staff of the Taxing Office, do your observations in regard to the staff of the Chancery masters apply equally there?—Yes.

47,700. You would not be in favour of making the staff in that office eligible for promotion to masterships?—No.

47,701. Have you in your practice at the Bar had contact with taxing masters?—Yes, I have been before them on several occasions.

47,702. I suppose in all ordinary cases the taxation is attended by the solicitors themselves?—Yes, the solicitors or their clerks appear.

47,703. Would a barrister appear in specially difficult or contested cases?—Yes. I do not think they appear quite so often, proportionately, before the taxing masters as they appear before the Chancery masters, but they do appear. I was thinking of my own experience. Where I have appeared once before a taxing master I have appeared four or five times before a master in Chancery, but that may be only my own personal experience. I have no doubt that on most days in the week counsel appear before one or other of the taxing masters.

47,704. As regards the age for retirement and pension, would the observations you have already made apply in the case of taxing masters?—Yes.

47,705. There is one question on which the Commission has had some evidence and on which I should like to ask your opinion, and that is whether it is desirable to keep the Chancery Masters Office and the Chancery Registrars Office entirely distinct and separate as they are at present, or whether it is desirable to bring about an amalgamation of those two offices? You may be aware that various commissions and committees have considered these offices in the past, and some have recommended such an amalgamation but others have not recommended it?—Yes.

47,706. Do you consider that it would be desirable to amalgamate those two offices?—No, I am quite against amalgamation. I think the departments ought to be kept separate, if only for physical reasons. The whole of the accommodation of the Law Courts is based upon the footing that they should be separate. But apart altogether from that, I think as a matter of procedure they ought to be kept distinct. I may say that I have seen the report of the Committee over which Mr. Justice Kekewich presided, and I agree upon that point with what Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Christopher James said, but I am not in favour of allocating registrars to particular judges for a limited time; I should keep the system as it is.

47,707. You are aware that the minority of that Committee recommended both the allocation of registrars to particular groups of judges, and also, ultimately, the amalgamation of the offices of masters and registrars?—Yes.

47,708. But you are in favour of the majority report and for keeping them separate?—I should be in favour of keeping them separate, and I should be against allocating registrars to particular judges. As I understand, the majority reported in favour of keeping the departments separate, but of allocating particular registrars to particular groups of judges. I should agree with the first, but disagree with the second recommendation.

47,709. In fact, you would keep it exactly as it is?—I would keep it exactly as it is, subject to effecting such economies as may be desirable in view of the work that is actually done.

47,710. Is that on the ground of the extremely technical character of the registrar's work?—Yes, I do not think you could get a master—in fact, I do not think a master is a right and proper person—to draw up orders or to be responsible for really difficult and complicated orders. He has not had the special training for it, and he has other things to do.

47,711. In fact, you think it is so technical that it is enough to occupy one man's whole mind?—I think so.

47,712. A man who has to give his mind to other things would not be capable of mastering its technicalities?—I would not say he would not be capable of doing it; but I do not think, as a practical matter, you could fairly ask a man, who had a sufficient number of orders to deal with, to deal with anything else.

47,713. You have also some experience of the Lunacy Department?—Yes.

47,714. That is a department on which the Commission has not yet taken evidence, and therefore, we are not prepared to go into it in great detail; but are there any general observations which you would wish to put before the Commission as regards the Lunacy Department?—So far as my experience goes, the work is done there very satisfactorily. No doubt it has been felt, and views have been expressed, that it would be or might be desirable to amalgamate the Lunacy work with the Chancery work; that is to say, practically to put an end to the Lunacy Office and bring it over to the Chancery Division. But that really goes to a very far-reaching reform, and I should prefer not to express any definite opinion about it, unless you really desire it.

47,715. That involves, of course, questions of purely judicial procedure which the Commission has considered to be outside its terms of reference?—Yes, it is a very special office with a very special staff.

47,716. In your experience, is the work there done in a satisfactory manner?—Quite well.

47,717. And expeditiously and efficiently?—Yes.

47,718. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) In speaking of the Chancery Registrars Office, you say, in the note you have given us of your evidence: "A system of promotion on any other footing than that of seniority would tend to dislocate the office, to cause discontent, and engender a general feeling of uncertainty and insecurity in the minds of the men who are on the 'ladder.'" Would you apply that wide statement to Government offices generally?—I am not sure that I am quite prepared to answer that question. Perhaps I may put it in this way, that except in exceptional cases promotion by seniority works satisfactorily.

47,719. Would you apply that to a service like the railway service?—I have had very little experience of railway service. I should not like to have the man who was in charge of my train to be an imbecile and to have been promoted there merely because he was a senior man. I quite appreciate what you are putting to me—that merit should be rewarded, and so on.

47,720. May I take it that, speaking broadly, you, appearing on behalf of the Bar Council, have no important change to suggest in the existing scheme of organisation of the legal departments, or the methods of appointments?—Yes, that is quite true.

47,721. Would you agree that since, say, 1850, important changes have taken place in the legal departments?—That is so. No doubt certain abuses have been done away with, and economies have been effected. If I may say so, I am not suggesting that economies might not be effected even to-day, but I do not think there are any abuses to-day which require rectification. I think that the organisation works well, and that you certainly could not predicate that any change in the organisation would lead to better results.

47,722. As a matter of historical fact, since Dickens wrote "Bleak House," important and large changes have taken place?—In the days of "Bleak House" the procedure itself was a matter rather of oppression to the people.

47,723. Would you agree, again, as a matter of historical fact, that the driving force which brought those changes about was rather lay opinion than professional opinion?—I am afraid I do not remember.

47,724. (Mr. Coward.) Do you mind my recalling your recollection to a point. I do not know whether you have heard this before. "There is not a single man now who is familiar with the business of the Chancery Division who would not regret deeply any change which destroyed or impaired the working of that which has, I think I may say, transformed the Chancery Division from a by-word into a branch of judicature in which there is least delay and in which there are practically no complaints." That had reference to the grouping of the judges?—Yes.

47,725. I suppose you would agree that it has transformed the Chancery Division from a by-word to a branch of our judicature in which there is least delay and in which there are practically no complaints?—Yes. You mean the system of linked judges.

3 March 1915.]

Mr. JAMES AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

47,726. Yes?—That has worked admirably.

47,727. The only suggestion I desire to make to you is this: Do you think there is a possibility in any way of making some other reform which would have an equally beneficial effect in other respects? I cannot tell you what it is, but is there not some means of getting at some reform which will act beneficially with regard to the other branches of procedure in the courts?—The introduction of the system of linked judges was intended to remedy the delay, and it has done so. There are no delays now, so there is no abuse from that point of view to be remedied. If it is suggested that there might be economies I am inclined to agree. I think economies might be effected, but I do not think you would effect those economies by any change of the organisation, but by considering whether there were not in certain departments too many people employed to do the work.

47,728. That is what I wanted to get at?—I think I said in answer to the question put to me that I am not by any means prepared to say that there might not be fewer masters.

47,729. May I make one suggestion. At present the registrars all sit in court?—Yes, but not always.

47,730. That is to say, unless they are represented by their clerks?—That is it.

47,731. But they are always there if they can be?—No, they do not like being there in witness actions. In an ordinary witness action the clerk can do perfectly well. He does very little more than what an associate does—swears witnesses, marks exhibits, and so forth; but it is very essential that the registrar should be in court on petition days, because the work on petitions is most important, as of course you know. Enormous sums are paid out of court on petitions, and it is absolutely essential that the order on a petition should be correct, and that the evidence on the petition should be properly checked and so forth.

47,732. That linking of the judges I think the Master of the Rolls said was his suggestion?—The present Master of the Rolls, yes.

47,733. It is rather a curious thing, but he said that up to that time nobody had thought of it, and it came upon him as an inspiration. It was adopted, and it has worked in this extraordinary way, as he said in his evidence, which I have just read. It has occurred to me whether there might not be some similar sort of rearrangement which would work to the advantage of everybody connected with the courts?—There might be. I have thought it over, but I cannot think of one. I should rather like to deal with a point which you were putting, and that is this: If you will remember, the difficulty or the trouble that was got over by the linking of the judges was originally due to the fact that there had been appointed first one and then two of what we used to call "journeyman" judges. Up to the appointment of the first journeyman judge, the system was very much the same as it is now. Every judge had his own set of chambers. There were four judges with two sets of chambers. Then they found that the four judges could not cope with all the work, and the office of the fifth judge was created. He was, you will remember, what we used to call a "journeyman," and cases used to be transferred over to him backwards and forwards. It was the existence of the "journeyman" judge and the system in which the cases were dealt with, he being a sort of amphibious judge who was not one thing or the other, and who had no set of chambers under him, that led to great delay; and matters were made still worse when they appointed a sixth judge.

47,734. There were other reasons, too, I think?—Yes. Then it occurred to the Master of the Rolls that it would be a most happy idea if you linked the judges together in pairs, so that one would do the witness work and the other the non-witness work, and do it continuously. That has worked admirably. But I think the trouble was caused by the fact that two extra judges had been appointed, and the machine as a whole was not modified so as to meet the requirements of the case.

47,735. I think there are 450 clerks and people in the Central and other offices—the Chancery offices, and so on. That is a large number?—It is indeed.

47,736. Things want really to be done upon a business plan to keep that machine going properly?—Yes.

47,737. It ought to be managed in the same way that I should hope some of our offices were managed where the things are, I think, well done?—Yes.

47,738. (Sir John Kempe.) Turning to the clerks for a moment, in your précis of evidence you say: "It is at least doubtful whether the supply of suitable candidates (which appears under the present system to be quite adequate) would be increased," and before that you say, "some legal qualifications are no doubt required; but these are qualifications of the practical rather than the theoretical side." Can you tell me what you mean by "suitable candidates"?—I think a suitable man is a man who has had practical experience as a clerk in a solicitor's office in fact.

47,739. As a matter of fact, are the appointments pretty nearly confined to clerks who have been in solicitors' offices?—So far as I am aware, in the Masters Chambers certainly, and in the Taxing Masters Office.

47,740. And they suit?—They do, admirably.

47,741. You ensure legal qualifications there?—Yes.

47,742. That qualification is required in the Chancery Office, but not necessarily required in all the offices. For instance, it is not required in the Probate Office?—I cannot speak at all with regard to the Probate Office.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 4th March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.

Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.

Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. RICHARD DURNING HOLT, M.P.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX, called and examined.

47,743. (Chairman.) You are a master of the Supreme Court in the Chancery Division?—Yes.

47,744. How long have you held that office?—23 years.

47,745. Before that you were in practice as a solicitor?—Yes, for 11 years before that, and before that I was a managing Chancery clerk.

47,746. Will you give the Commission your views

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

as to the qualifications necessary for Chancery masters?—Master Romer, of course, has given his evidence, and I am authorised to say that the rest of my colleagues approve of my written statement, which I have already sent to the Commission, and I think I may say also that in substance my statement agrees with Master Romer's evidence.

47,747. With regard to the evidence that you give to-day, if any matters arise outside the précis that you have submitted, will your evidence on those points be your personal views or those of your colleagues?—They will be my personal views. I will say, if I can, when my colleagues agree. At present they have only seen my statement in which I say: A solicitor is the person best qualified for the post of master in the Chancery Division, because he is familiar with the details of administrative work and practice. Difficult questions of law are in most cases referred to the judge. But no solicitor should be appointed who has not had experience of Chancery practice. The qualification of 10 years' practice as a solicitor should be retained. It is just the training required for the work of a Chancery master. I believe that London solicitors have always been appointed, because few country solicitors are acquainted with the details of Chancery practice; other posts are open to them.

47,748. Are you of opinion that that is the only kind of experience which qualifies for the work of a master?—I think so; it best qualifies.

47,749. Would you say that in no case should a clerk in the Chancery chambers be promoted to a mastership?—I think he should not, unless he happens to have had 10 years' practice as a solicitor, which is of course not a very likely thing. That is certainly my view.

47,750. That is not a very likely thing, and in any case it would probably have been 30 years back, before he entered the office?—Yes.

47,751. If a man had been 30 years a clerk in the office, would it make very much difference to his qualities whether he had had before that 10 years' experience as a solicitor or not?—I think it would help him.

47,752. You would, therefore, maintain the present bar unless a clerk had had the 10 years' experience before entering the office?—Yes.

47,753. Then, as regards clerkships, do you consider that clerks should be appointed direct to this office and not transferred from other offices?—Yes, I feel that very strongly.

47,754. Are you of opinion that the present system of promotion from the bottom should continue, or that the mechanical work should be assigned to a separate class of clerks?—I think the mechanical work—that is, the present work of the third class clerks—should be assigned to a separate class, and that there should be no promotion in the ordinary course from the third class.

47,755. You would recruit normally the first and second classes direct, and only in very exceptional cases by promotion from the third class?—Yes, but I think I would limit it to the second class; otherwise it would be hardly fair. If you recruited the first class from the outside, you would be stopping promotion in the second class. My idea would be to have solicitors' clerks, whether admitted or not, appointed to the second class, and then they would go up by seniority and on a certificate of fitness to the first class.

47,756. So that the third class would be entirely apart, and would be recruited with no expectation, except in very exceptional circumstances, of going beyond the maximum salary of 200*l.* a year?—Yes.

47,757. Under those conditions, do you think you could get sufficiently good men for the work of the third class?—I think so, quite, from my recollection of the work in a solicitor's office.

47,758. Would you get men who would be content to remain for the greater part of their service at a salary of 200*l.* a year?—I think so.

47,759. You think you would not get discontent?—I think not at all, if the men knew that that was so when they were coming in. As I think I make clear in my statement, this should not apply to existing holders.

I do not think it would be fair to the existing third class clerks to deprive them of the chance of going up.

47,760. No; but you propose it for future appointments?—Yes.

47,761. Would you explain a little more fully your reasons for suggesting that system?—My principal object in suggesting it is to get in solicitors' clerks, because I think they are best fitted to do the work of the second and first class clerks. The men who come before us and who do the work are, some of them, most useful and excellent men, who really know their work thoroughly. Those are the men I should like to see doing the work altogether. Of course, they may be admitted men. There is nothing to prevent an admitted man applying for a second class clerkship with the chance of getting up to the first class and there stopping; but my principal object would be to get the men who are best qualified, that is, I think, the solicitors' managing clerks.

47,762. At what age would you suggest that they should be appointed?—I have rather suggested that a man might qualify himself at 25. He might really qualify at 20 if he went into a solicitor's office at 15, but probably he should not be appointed before 25; you want a man of that age, I think.

47,763. You suggest that five years' experience as Chancery clerk in a solicitor's office is the necessary experience?—I think so.

47,764. A boy entering at 15 might not at once become a Chancery clerk?—He might be put on to Chancery work at once, but it would be rather elementary.

47,765. Would he not be, as we heard yesterday, a "bag carrier"?—Not at 15, I think. I think the small boys who go into solicitors' offices, perhaps at the age of 12 or so, are the ones who do that kind of work. (Mr. Coward.) I do not think they go into offices now at 12. I do not think any of them go before 14.

47,766. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) It would be illegal?—I was article'd at 16, and so, judging by my own experience, I should have been qualified at 21; but I think 25 would be a good useful limit—say not under 25.

47,767. (Chairman.) You think that five years' experience, from 20 to 25, would be sufficiently responsible and wide to qualify a man for the more important work of the second class clerks?—I think so. Of course, he might have had more than five years' experience at 25.

47,768. You suggest five years as a minimum?—Yes.

47,769. Do you suggest a maximum of age for appointment to the second class?—I really have no means of judging about that. I understand there is a limit of 30, but I do not know whether I am correct in that.

47,770. At present the limit is 30 for appointment to the third class. In the case of the second class I believe there is a limit, but the appointments to the second class are so rare nowadays that it practically is not operative?—A man has to serve 40 years to earn a full pension, and it is hardly fair to make him retire at an age when he cannot have earned a full pension. I should think certainly not over 35.

47,771. Twenty-five to 35 you suggest as the extreme limits?—Yes.

47,772. For the third class clerks do you suggest that any experience in a solicitor's office is necessary?—I think it would be useful for them to have five years' experience generally in a solicitor's office.

47,773. But if a man is going to do the purely mechanical duties that would be assigned to the third class, is that experience essential?—I think it is very useful. I think you will get the best man after five years' experience in a solicitor's office. He gets general notions of business.

47,774. (Mr. Coward.) "Method," would not you say?—Yes, "method," I should say.

47,775. (Chairman.) If a man is not going beyond the third class, and you have not to think of the qualities necessary for the higher work of the second and the first class, would not an intelligent youth of sufficiently good intellectual quality be able to learn the work of the third class very rapidly?—I do not think he would, because a third class man must know a little about all legal matters; for instance, he must know a summons

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

when he sees it, and know what is a plaintiff and a defendant.

47,776. How many days will it take him to learn that?—Not very long, but there are a good many details of that kind which, I think, a man would take some time to learn. He must know the contents of a summons and the meaning of it. It would be quite Greek to a man going in and knowing nothing of legal matters at all. He would not know what a summons meant. I think the training in a solicitor's office is certainly an advantage.

47,777. Is it not the case with every entrant to the Civil Service in every public office that he has, after he enters, to learn the work with which he has to deal?—Yes, I suppose so. I am only speaking of my experience.

47,778. Is there anything so peculiar about the work of a third class clerk in this office that makes it necessary for him to learn it before entrance, whereas it is not found necessary in other offices?—I think there is a good deal that is peculiar in the practice of the Chancery Division which he would have to get hold of, and, therefore, I would still say that five years' experience in a solicitor's office would be a great advantage.

47,779. What age would you suggest for the entrance of a third class clerk?—A man might come in at 20, I think.

47,780. From 20 to 25?—From 20 to 25.

47,781. Do you think the present system of appointment of clerks is the best?—Yes; I do not think that that can be improved upon. The Lord Chancellor appoints, and he sends a request to the senior master to make some sort of examination of the man to see whether he is fitted or not. The senior master does not recommend the appointment.

47,782. He simply reports on the qualifications as judged by personal interview?—Yes. I am saying this subject to my former remark, that I think a solicitor's clerk would be the best man. I would not appoint a man who has not been a solicitor's clerk.

47,783. You would retain the present system of appointment, but would make service in a solicitor's office an essential qualification?—Yes.

47,784. It has been suggested that competition might be applied to the selection of clerks for these offices, as it is for the public offices in general. What is your view as to that?—I do not see any advantage in competition. If you get the particular class of man, as you would here—solicitors' clerks—who are fitted for the work, then I think selection is best, because you select not only from the qualifications needed for passing examinations, but also from what you judge of the man after talking with him. You get a good notion of whether he is the sort of man who would be fitted to occupy the post. I am rather against competition.

47,785. It would be possible, of course, if the qualification of service in a solicitor's office were considered essential, to have a competition among persons possessing that qualification?—Yes, but I should feel the same objection to that. I think selection would be better than competition.

47,786. You think the quarter of an hour's interview is a more effectual means of selection than a competitive examination?—Yes, I think so.

47,787. Turning to the question of the appointment of masters, do you consider that the present system is the best?—I think the judge should certainly have a voice in the appointment—at any rate in the selection of the man to be appointed. I think that was the old practice. I do not think the judge formally appointed; I think he selected and then submitted the name to the Lord Chancellor. I certainly think it would be better if the judge still had a voice in the selection.

47,788. You suggest appointment by the judge subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor?—Yes. That is subject to any suggestion for a committee, which personally I am rather in favour of.

47,789. The suggestion has been made that a standing committee should assist the Lord Chancellor in his selections by reporting to him on the qualifications of the candidates?—Personally, I think that would be a good plan.

47,790. You think that would be useful?—I do.

47,791. The system which the present Commission has recommended for professional appointments in other parts of the public service is a committee partly representing the higher officers of the departments concerned and partly some independent authority such as the Civil Service Commissioners. Would a committee of that kind commend itself to your judgment?—It would.

47,792. We have had from Master Romer a very full statement of the work of a Chancery master. Do you consider that it is essential that the whole of that work should be performed by the master personally, or do you think that any of it could be devolved upon the clerks?—I do not think any of it could be devolved upon the clerks. I think all the work that the master does now ought to be done by him, and I do not think any part of it is proper to be dealt with by a first class clerk.

47,793. In the past there has been a gradual process of devolution, I suppose?—Yes.

47,794. Practically the whole of the work done now by the master was formerly done by the judges?—Except the accounts and inquiries and making certificates—that is peculiar to the masters.

47,795. But the whole of the judicial work?—Yes.

47,796. And some of the work now done by first class clerks?—Yes, that was first sanctioned in 1875 by Sir George Jessel, in his chambers.

47,797. That was the making by the first class clerks of orders for time, and matters of that kind?—Yes, and "discovery" and "stop" orders.

47,798. But you think that that process of devolution has been carried as far as it is possible to carry it?—I think so. I do not know whether the Commissioners have seen it, but Mr. Toye, one of the first class clerks, prepared a list of things which he thought they might be able to do, and I have looked through it carefully.

47,799. Mr. Toye's statement is before the Commission, but we have not yet had Mr. Toye as a witness. Do you consider that any of the matters he mentions could be transferred to the first class clerks?—He mentions some matters which I do delegate to my clerks.

47,800. Does that indicate some difference of practice in the different chambers?—I think possibly there may be some slight differences of practice. I have simply followed the practice of my predecessor. Under No. 4, "Summonses to proceed on judgments and orders," he speaks of that work as if it were not delegated. I always thought it was. I delegate summonses to proceed, because what has to be done on the return of a summons to proceed is simply to fix the time for filing evidence; but if it involves directing advertisements for creditors or fixing a receiver's security, I have it brought before myself.

47,801. Does that long list of things coming under No. 4 mean a large amount of work in substance?—It would mean a very large amount if it were all included, certainly, because Mr. Toye says under No. 4: "Summonses to proceed on judgments and orders, and "proceeding on the accounts and inquiries under some "of them." That is very wide indeed. That is entirely our work. All that goes before my first class clerk is a summons to proceed on the first attendance, and then he fixes a time for the parties to file the evidence. When they have brought the evidence in, they come to me and I go into it. There is one exception under 4 (d), "Order for foreclosure nisi." The clerk there fixes a time and an affidavit is brought to him—merely an affidavit proving how much principal, interest, and costs are due to the mortgagee. It is a very simple matter, and he deals with it and prepares the certificate for me. Under 4 (e), "Order to carry on proceedings," I think the clerk might deal with that quite well. Under (g) the work is limited to fixing the times for filing evidence. With regard to No. 10, "Summonses for foreclosure absolute," my first class clerk does that where it is a simple case, and I think it is quite fit to be done by him, but not where there is a receiver or mortgagee in possession. No. 12, "Vouching pedigrees," my clerk does, and then the pedigree comes to me afterwards. He enters the certificates of births, marriages, and deaths on the pedigree and refers to the affidavit, and it comes to me afterwards and I go through it. I would also agree with regard to "Settling advertisements." Subject to that, I think none of the things that Mr. Toye mentions ought to be dealt with by the first class clerks. It should be remembered that the master is responsible for the whole of the work, and his signature is required to every order and certificate that is made in chambers.

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,802. Are any steps taken to secure uniformity of practice in the different chambers as regards the work passed down to the clerks?—Yes. We meet always once a sittings, sometimes more, to consider points of practice, and, so far as we can be, we are uniform.

47,803. Would that be one of the points considered—how far work is delegated to the first class clerks?—It might very well be one. I do not know that it has been. I dare say we have discussed points of that kind occasionally, but I do not think we have ever discussed the matter as a whole. We might discuss it, and we might come to a conclusion so as to be uniform about it. There is one thing Mr. Toye says in his statement, which I saw, and that is, if the solicitors were dissatisfied with the decision of a first class clerk they might adjourn it to the master. That is simply duplicating the work, which I think would be a great mistake.

47,804. Is not that assuming that the solicitors would be dissatisfied in a large proportion of cases?—Quite so, and then they would be at liberty to adjourn it from us to the judge.

47,805. But if that was only one case in 10, 20, or 30, it would not mean much; the relief would be greater than the addition?—It might not mean much to the suitors as a whole, but it might mean much to a particular suitor in the case so adjourned, who would have to pay two sets of costs on that summons instead of one. There might be several solicitors attending, who would get 13s. 4d. each on a summons before the first class clerk; and, if anyone were dissatisfied, they might adjourn it to the master and get another 13s. 4d. each; and anyone still dissatisfied might adjourn it to the judge, when they would get a guinea each.

47,806. That is the case at present as between the master and the judge?—That is so.

47,807. Are the cases that are adjourned to the judge numerous?—No; I think they come to about 10 per cent. of the summonses that come before us.

47,808. There is no particular reason to think that there would be a greater proportion in the case of summonses before the first class clerks?—Of course, we have not had any experience of it, and it would be rather difficult to say how that would work. I think, perhaps, speaking as a master, I should have more confidence in my own decision not being adjourned to the judge than I should in the decision on one of these points of a first class clerk not being adjourned to me.

47,809. As between the different classes of clerks, do you consider that the distribution of the work is satisfactory, or is there any work done by a higher class which could be devolved upon a lower class?—I think, as a whole, the arrangement is satisfactory, but I believe there is a difference of practice in some chambers. I expect some men are rather better fitted than others for particular work, and they have, perhaps, gradually got some of the work of a higher grade.

47,810. When we were visiting the Chancery chambers I noticed that one of the duties of a first class clerk was, in a debenture case, personally to examine every one of, perhaps, many thousands of debentures, in order to see that they are in order and there are no charges at the back, or anything of that sort. Surely that is work which does not require men of the calibre of first class clerks to perform?—It is very important work. The certificate binds the world, and it is very important to see that it is correct. I should not myself like to see that work delegated.

47,811. It is work that requires accuracy and care, but no judgment?—Yes.

47,812. It is purely mechanical work which requires accurate performance?—That is so. I think, in such a case, if I were a first class clerk I should, if I could, call in the assistance of one of my juniors to help me in it, and I should say, "You can turn over this and save me a certain amount of time and trouble"; but I would exercise some general supervision over it, and tell the man exactly what he was to do. I should not like to see that work generally devolved on a second class clerk.

47,813. Far the greater number of cases must merely be the inspection of a printed debenture?—Yes.

47,814. The number of cases in which there is anything upon the debentures must be very small?—Yes.

47,815. Surely the inspection could be done by a clerk of lower grade, and, if necessary, in any case of doubt it could be referred to a first class clerk?—Yes.

47,816. (Lord Mersey.) These debentures are transferable from hand to hand?—Some of them are bearer debentures, but most of them are registered.

47,817. Some are transferable like banknotes?—Yes. I think the first class clerk might get assistance from his junior.

47,818. (Chairman.) That was merely an incident which I observed, which struck me as a specimen of work that might be devolved. Do you consider that the present number of masters is necessary for the performance of the work?—Yes, I think so.

47,819. The suggestion has been made that three masters attached to each linked pair of judges might perform the work instead of four. What is your opinion as to that suggestion?—If I may, I will take my answer from my written statement. The suggestion was made in 1911, when Lord Justice Swinfen Eady was our judge, and he asked me to make a report to him, and what I said was this: "Whether the work of a master is of an arduous nature, your Lordship is able to judge. One thing is absolutely clear to me, and to some of my colleagues to whom I have mentioned the matter; it is that no part of the work can be delegated to the clerks, and, therefore, no addition to the staff of clerks will diminish the work of the master. The work of the clerks (some of it of an important nature, and extremely well done in my division) is shown in the accompanying paper. I will now deal with the suggestion that, as the winding-up of companies was removed from the Chancery chambers in 1892, we have been thereby relieved of a substantial amount of work, and to that extent should be able to undertake additional work. I was appointed a chief clerk in 1891, and had, before that year, in practice as a solicitor some experience of the compulsory winding-up of companies under the Act of 1862. By the year 1892 the practice established by the Companies Act, 1890, had materially diminished the work of the Chancery chambers in winding up, and Mr. Lionel Clarke (the present senior master) informs me that he made a careful calculation of the proportion of winding-up business to the other chamber work in 1892, and that the winding-up business amounted to one-thirteenth or 7·7 per cent. of the whole. If three masters are to do the work of four, we should have to undertake 33·3 per cent. of additional work. The further observation is material, that since 1892 the number of debenture holders' actions has so greatly increased, that the excess would more than balance the winding-up work, from which we have been relieved. I now refer to the evidence of Master Walker and Master Burney, given before the Royal Commission on the Care and Control of the Feeble-minded in December 1906 (see Minutes of Evidence, Vol. IV., pp. 300 and 313). In answer to Question 33,148 Master Walker says, quite correctly, that if the authorities thought proper to transfer part of the work of the masters in Lunacy to us, we could perfectly well do it, and that we were perfectly willing to do it. According to Master Burney (Question 33,126) our work would thereby have been increased by the addition of 150 summonses per annum to each of the Chancery masters, or 600 to the four masters of these chambers. The total number of summonses (including applications under summons for directions) issued in these chambers in the year 1906 was 6,497, say, 6,500, and that represents a great deal less than the whole work of the masters, because it leaves out of account the “ work they do in taking accounts, answering inquiries, and adjudicating on creditors' claims. But, taking the summonses only, the addition of 600 Lunacy summonses to the 6,500 Chancery summonses would have meant an increase of 9·2 per cent. in that class of work. The Chancery masters were willing to undertake, in addition to their existing work, not 9·2 per cent. of the whole, but 9·2 per cent. of the summons part of it. This is a very different matter from undertaking an addition of 33·3 per cent. of their whole work. The fact that the work of the Chancery chambers is now done satisfactorily, as I hope I am justified in assuming, may be put forward in support of the argument that more can be done because there are no arrears. But I am perfectly certain that if the attempt is made to put the work of four masters upon three, delays will occur, and arrears will accumulate, as they have done in times past, to the great detriment of the public.” They did not send us the Lunacy summonses, but they did transfer to us the work of appointing trustees and making vesting orders.

47,820. And that has made an appreciable addition to the masters' work?—Yes. The orders are made by the judge, but the summonses come before the master in the first instance. He must satisfy himself that the application is in proper form and that the evidence is sufficient, and then he adjourns the summons to the judge, prepares a note for the judge, attends the judge when the order is made, and gives directions as to drawing it up. Again, there are the poor persons' rules, which throw a good deal of additional work on us, and I happen to be the prescribed officer for the Chancery Division, which means that I get a large share of it, and, in fact, I spent the whole of my last Long Vacation in doing the prescribed officer's work.

47,821. What do you consider the best measure of the work in chambers statistically—the number of summonses or the number of orders, or both?—I suppose you must look at all of it, but I should imagine the number of summonses would be a very good guide.

47,822. The number of summonses, the number of orders made in chambers, and the number of accounts passed would be a fair measure?—Rather the number of certificates made, because every account is certified, and you may have some certificates that deal with inquiries, so every certificate would include accounts and inquiries.

47,823. Has not there been a very considerable reduction in the work in Chancery chambers in the last 20 years or so?—I think there has been certainly a reduction of one kind of work—the heavy work of accounts, and that kind of thing. There are not so many general orders for administration as there used to be; but, at the same time, I think the importance of the work we do has been increased.

47,824. Would you mind referring to the table of judicial statistics of the Chancery Division. Taking summonses first, the annual average from 1888 to 1892 was 20,601, and the average from 1908 to 1912 was 13,286, a reduction of about 35 per cent.?—Yes, that is a very large reduction.

47,825. Apparently it is still going down, because in 1911–12 the number was 12,654, which is lower than the average of the five years ending in 1912?—Yes.

47,826. Taking the orders made in chambers, in the earlier period, the annual average was 9,532, and in the later period 7,634?—I think there you have taken only the orders drawn up in chambers, but you really might include all the orders made in chambers, including those drawn up by the registrars, which are 19,000.

47,827. 19,867 in the earlier period and 13,014 in the later period?—That is so.

47,828. That being a reduction of one-third?—Yes.

47,829. Taking the number of accounts passed, that has been reduced from 2,510 in the earlier period to 1,326 in the later period?—Yes.

47,830. That is adding together both kinds of accounts?—Yes.

47,831. That is a reduction of about 45 per cent.?—No doubt.

47,832. So there has been a very large reduction in the work as judged by the number of operations?—No doubt.

47,833. Has that been set off, if at all, by any increase in the importance or length of the individual operations?—I should say not in length; in importance, yes. I think the work grows more important every year. Beginning in 1883 a great deal of the work that a judge before that year did in court the rules of 1883 provided should be done in chambers, and that work comes to us. Beyond a certain limit it must be dealt with in court, but a very great addition to our work came in that way, such as summonses for payment of money out of court. We have to deal with cases up to any amount—it may be 100,000*l.*—if there has been an order declaring the rights of the parties. That kind of work is very important. In regard to summonses for payment out, we have to see that we pay out to the right person and prevent any possibility of fraud. The 1883 rules provided that a great many cases might be dealt with by originating summons instead of by petition as formerly, such as payment out of court of large funds and the appointment of trustees, under the Trustee Act, and therefore those come to us.

47,834. Is not that a simpler procedure?—Yes, I think it is a very good thing. Petitions we have nothing to do with in chambers, but those originating summonses come to us, and we make the orders. Even where the judge makes the orders we have to go thoroughly into them, see that the evidence is all in order, consider the form of the order, and make a note for the judge, and attend him when he makes the order. So that in many ways a great deal of additional work has been thrown upon us. I have brought with me a list of the cases that I had yesterday morning. May I tell you, shortly, the sort of things I deal with. There were 10 cases altogether. As a rule, on Wednesdays, I reserve the afternoon for preparing notes for the judge, but it so happened that the judge on Monday wanted me to hold an auction yesterday afternoon, so I put in a case at 2 o'clock. I need not mention the names of the cases. The first case was for leave to issue execution under the Courts Emergency Act, a case where judgment had been recovered for 84*l.* costs, and they came for leave to issue execution. They were not satisfied with the debtor's statement as to his being affected by the war, and they cross-examined him. The result was that costs ran up to the amount of 38*l.* to enforce this judgment of 84*l.* It seemed out of all proportion that that should be so, and I had to look at the rules to see what I could do, though I was satisfied that the solicitors were not to blame. I finally came to the conclusion that I would fix the costs, and I did fix them at five guineas, and they were satisfied with that; it was not taken further. That was a matter of some importance and required a good deal of consideration. The next case was an administration action. They had sold some property, and the mortgagee had concurred in the sale, and he came in and he wanted his costs provided for. He was not a party to the action, but I said, “If you come in and bring your costs and choose to submit, I will settle them for you.” The costs were agreed; there was no difficulty about them, but there was a dispute about auctioneer's charges, and they are going to submit that matter to the Court; instead of having an order for taxation, they will submit it to me, and I shall decide it. That was a matter that required some discussion, too. The next was the case of a bank seeking to exercise rights as mortgagees, and asking for leave under the Court Emergency Act. There I found that it was a proper case in which to grant the leave, and the respondent did not appear, and I gave leave.

47,835. If the defendant does not appear, I suppose leave is given as a matter of course?—I think there is some difference of opinion amongst the judges about that. I have heard different views expressed. I always try to find out from the applicant something about the circumstances of the defendant, because one of the judges said to me, “You might find that the respondent had gone to the war after the summons was served, or something of that kind.” So we always try to get at the facts. We should not do it blindly, even if he did not appear. The next was a case of the sale of heirlooms, which, by the rules, must go to the judge. The affidavits were left with me to read, and as it was a small case, I said I would mention it to the judge instead of adjourning it to him, so I shall have to mention it next Monday. The next was the case of a creditor who had proved his debt in an administration action, but had ceased to carry on business in his own name, and had formed a company. There was some difficulty about it because he had never actually assigned the debt to the company, and so they took out a summons and asked for an order for payment to the company. I had to read the evidence, and I came to the conclusion that they had made out their case, and I made the order. The next was the case of a next of kin of a deceased person who went to Australia in 1896 and had not been heard of, and the Court directed an inquiry as to whether he was living or dead. Advertisements were issued; they went out to Australia, and finally the man, or somebody who says he is the man, has come forward. That is a matter of very great importance, as he has to prove his identity. That was adjourned for an afternoon appointment, because the evidence was lengthy, and would take a longer time than I could give in the morning. The next was a case in which I made an order to tax costs and gave some directions to trustees in an administration action. The next was a case of claims against the estate of a testator, and I had to disallow some of the claims. Another was a case of queries on a pedigree, and they produced further evidence, and I disposed of various questions I had raised. The afternoon appointment was a case where I held an auction for the sale of certain patent rights in a debenture holder's action.

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,836. Do you hold auctions personally?—Yes.

47,837. Why is that done by a master and not by an auctioneer?—It arises in this way: The party had been before the judge on Monday last, on an application to confirm a conditional contract to sell the rights for a certain sum, I think 150*l*. Somebody else came before the judge and said "I will give 250*l*," on which the first man said "I will give 250*l*." So the judge said "I will send it to the master, and he shall hold an auction on Wednesday, at 2 o'clock, and you shall come in and bid." And the two people came in and bid.

47,838. (Mr. Coward.) Is not the answer to the Chairman's question that it costs nothing and no commission is paid?—That is one great advantage.

47,839. If you had to sell by an auctioneer you would have to pay commission?—Yes.

47,840. (Chairman.) Was it an open auction?—No. It was between those two. We do not, as a rule, hold an open auction. Finally one of them gave 500*l*., and it was knocked down to him.

47,841. (Lord Mersey.) There were no advertisements?—No advertisements.

47,842. (Mr. Holt.) The auction was held in your own office?—Yes; in the room in which I sit in the Law Courts. I know Mr. Coward is very doubtful about the importance of our work, judging from some questions he asked Master Romer.

47,843. (Mr. Coward.) Quite the contrary. I was going to suggest that when you know how to do these things they are readily done, but if they did not know how to do them, the people who had to do them would get into a very great mess. I am quite with you to that extent?—Yes. Might I refer to the evidence that Lord Justice Swinfen Eady gave before the Royal Commission on Delay in the King's Bench Division with regard to the work in the Chancery Division; it is in the Minutes of Evidence, volume I., page 77.

47,844. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Is there any reason why you should not advertise these auctions?—Not at all.

47,845. Because you might have had more bids, and the price might have gone up to 5,000*l*. instead of 500*l*.?—Quite true. In that case there had been no order for sale at all. They had actually come before judgment, and therefore it had to go to the judge in person for leave to sell, according to a particular contract they had entered into; and they brought evidence to show that if they did not sell in that way nobody would buy at all.

47,846. (Lord Mersey.) What was the property?—It was patent rights; and the company was formed for working certain patents. These rights were the principal assets of the company.

47,847. (Chairman.) What do you wish to read from the evidence of Lord Justice Swinfen Eady?—It is at the bottom of page 77, the last five lines. My point is that the judge here shows how very important the kind of work we do is, because he says—"One judge takes continuously throughout a sittings witness actions; his colleague takes continuously throughout the sittings the non-witness work; and the judge who does the non-witness work has a very hard time indeed to get through the business in the course of the sittings in the way the business should be conducted." On page 78 he says—"Then the next business is the chamber business on the Monday; that is work that is very trying indeed, and by far the most arduous part of a Chancery judge's work." Then on page 79, in the second column about a third of the way down the page, he says—"I am sure I state it within the mark when I say it takes from eight to ten hours to read the papers,"—those are the notes that we prepare for the judge every Monday, with the papers—"and it means working on Saturday and sometimes the whole of Sunday, and I should be accurate in saying that since the 11th January, speaking for myself, I have not had a Sunday free from work. Perusal of the papers is essential, because it enables one to dispose of the work on Monday, generally speaking, by about half-past two." That was Lord Justice Swinfen Eady's view of the judge's work in chambers.

47,848. That is speaking of the judge's work in chambers?—Yes.

47,849. The judge concentrates the work of four masters?—That is perfectly true.

47,850. (Mr. Coward.) That would include the affidavits and the papers. It is more than your notes?—Certainly. We read the papers too. I wish to point out that this work which the judge finds the most arduous part of his duties is the kind of work the master is doing every day. He has a number of cases in the list, and he must concentrate his mind upon each case in turn, hear arguments, give a decision, and then pass to the next case. It must be remembered, too, that the judge has some advantages which are denied to the master. He has a note of the case prepared for him, and he has the assistance of counsel, which the master generally has not. While admitting the ability and knowledge of practice of many of the managing clerks and solicitors who appear in chambers, it only too frequently happens that some one comes before a master who is really ignorant of what is wanted and the form which his application should take. The master then has practically to conduct the case himself, and that involves additional labour and loss of time. Then the master spends a great deal of time out of office hours in reading papers left for his perusal, and preparing notes for the judge is very laborious, especially without the assistance of a shorthand writer. The work of a master is full of difficulty, full of responsibility, and full of pitfalls.

47,851. Is there any reason why he should not have the assistance of a shorthand writer?—I think he ought to have it. I think every third class clerk ought to be a shorthand writer.

47,852. Are many of them shorthand writers at present?—Very few. I think there is one in the chambers next to me.

47,853. You have not one in your chambers?—No, I have not.

47,854. Going back to the statistics of the work, we find that on those figures there had been a reduction of something like one third of the work since 1890. During the same period the number of masters has not varied?—No.

47,855. And the number of first class clerks has not varied?—Certainly not.

47,856. There has been a certain reduction in the number of second and third class clerks?—Yes, because some of the chambers had five, I think.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,857. On the figures I have before me the number of second class clerks has been reduced from 18 to 12, and the number of third class clerk from 13 to 12?—I should think something of that kind. I have never had more than four in my chambers.

47,858. So, taking the offices as a whole, including the masters, there have been no reductions of staff corresponding to the reduction of work if those figures may be taken as a fair estimate?—No.

47,859. (Lord Mersey.) I should like to know whether, in your opinion, there has been a corresponding reduction in the bulk of the work to be done. I mean a reduction corresponding to the reduction in the statistics that we have heard of?—I think not.

47,860. Then you would not take the statistics as a guide?—I suppose you must take statistics as some guide, but I do not think they are by any means an infallible guide, judging by the work we have to do now.

47,861. I want to know from you whether the volume of work that you have to do now is less or more than the work in 1890?—Certainly it is less, there is no doubt.

47,862. Is it less in proportion to the decrease in the figures?—I think certainly not.

47,863. Could you form any opinion as to the real decrease?—I think the only way I can answer that is this: When I made my report to Lord Justice Swinfen Eady, I came to the conclusion—and my colleagues had done so previously—that we could do about 9.2 per cent. as I put it, or call it one-tenth of additional work, if it were put upon us. I have suggested in my statement that we might do additional work in the way of drawing up orders, which are now drawn up by the registrars. I do not mean that we should draw up all our orders; I do not think we could; but I think we could extend the drawing up of orders, and more orders could be drawn up in chambers than are now. The actual drafting of the orders would be done by a first class clerk and doubtful points would be referred to the master.

47,864. There has been a reduction I see in the number of clerks?—Yes.

47,865. That must mean, I should think, that there had been a reduction in the work?—That no doubt bears upon it. In the old days, in the Master of the Rolls' chambers, I think there was a good deal more work than in some of the other chambers, because the solicitors had a right to choose their judge, and I think in the Master of the Rolls' chambers there were five clerks, but in our chambers never more than four, and I think the reduction which has taken place must have been the reduction of the fifth clerk all the way round.

47,866. (Chairman.) I see the reduction has been entirely in the lower class of clerk?—Yes.

47,867. As present there are as many first class clerks as there are second and third class clerks put together?—Yes.

47,868. In the other offices of the court, especially in the Central Office, the proportion is the other way—a considerably larger number of third and second class clerks than first class clerks?—Yes.

47,869. Can that difference be justified?—I think it can. If I may refer again to my statement, I say: With regard to the number of first class clerks, viz., two to each master, the fact is accounted for by the nature of the work. If the work of the King's Bench judges and masters is compared with that of the judges and masters of the Chancery Division, it will be found that the work of the former is almost entirely judicial, and is performed by a large number of judges and a small number of masters. In the Chancery Division there is a very considerable amount of administrative work; the number of judges is much smaller, and the number of masters far greater in proportion. The most important work of the first class clerks is administrative viz.: (1) Vouching accounts of executors, trustees, receivers, and guardians of infants; (2) preparing and settling the master's certificates, including the checking of pedigrees; (3) preparing for the master's signature notes of orders made by him. In my opinion none of the first class clerks in the Chancery Division can be spared.

47,870. You think that none of the work done by them could be done by second class clerks?—No, I think not.

47,871. Do you consider the present organisation satisfactory?—Yes. I do not know that I could suggest any improvement in the organisation.

47,872. There is practically no delay at present?—There is no delay.

47,873. Is there any delay with regard to the longer appointments?—No delay, except what is absolutely necessary. I mean there is no delay on the part of the court; the delay is on the part of the people who come and have to go away for further evidence.

47,874. In the case of a long appointment which has to be adjourned, in your chambers at present, how soon can a further appointment be obtained?—Within a week. I do not think it is ever much longer than that or ever any longer.

47,875. Would that be the usual period for an adjournment?—Yes; if the solicitors wanted an appointment for an hour, I am perfectly sure that they could always get one within seven days.

47,876. On the question of the limit of age for retirement, dealing with the masters themselves in the first place, it has been recommended by, I think, more than one committee or commission that a limit of age should be imposed. What is your view upon that point?—Having regard to the fact that the qualification for a Chancery mastership is ten years' practice as a solicitor, and that, by the Superannuation Act 1914, the ten years added for professional knowledge in calculating pension is abolished, practically no master appointed after that Act can earn a full pension. I was appointed at the age of 36, and, if subject to the present law, I should have to serve to the age of 76 to earn a full pension. But the average age of appointment is between 40 and 50. I am entirely against the abolition or reduction of the ten years' practice as a qualification, and I consider that, as long as a man is in sound health, age is no disqualification for the duties of a master, but rather an advantage, from the greater experience acquired. I think, therefore, that no age limit is desirable. A clerk is on a different footing. He might enter a solicitor's office at 15, and if my suggestion of the qualification of five years' service as a Chancery clerk were adopted, he might be eligible for a second class clerkship at the age of 20. If he obtained the post at 25, he would have earned a full pension at 65, but his experience at that age would in ordinary cases be much too valuable to lose, and if an age limit were fixed I would suggest 75.

47,877. In the case of the masters, do you think 40 to 50 is the right age for appointment?—I think so. I think 40 is quite soon enough.

47,878. Would your opinion on the question of an age limit be modified if the system of added years for pension were still continued?—I think it would make a considerable difference.

47,879. (Lord Mersey.) The question is, would your opinion be modified. I do not see how it ought to affect your opinion?—We have an Act of Parliament just passed in 1914, which says that there are to be no added years, so that the question can hardly arise.

47,880. Does the Act of 1914 apply to the officers of the Supreme Court?—I may be wrong, but my former remark was based on the supposition that it did.

47,881. (Chairman.) If that Act does not apply, or if it were repealed and the added years still applied to masters, would that modify your opinion as to a fixed age for retirement?—I think it would modify it. I should then say that I should prefer not to have an age limit, but if there was an age limit I should suggest that 75 would be early enough.

47,882. The age which has been suggested by, at any rate, one of the previous Commissions, was 70?—I think 70 is too early.

47,883. Do you think that, as a rule, after 70 a man retains his full vigour and activity?—I think so, judging from my own colleagues. One, I remember, was quite fit up to the age of 80, and, I think, he retired at the age of 82, or something of that kind.

47,884. Leaving aside present holders of the office, have you ever in the past known a case of a master retaining office after his powers had begun to diminish?—I remember one very remarkable case, but that was from ill-health; it was not age. One man I have in view was fit for the work in one way, but he was deaf, and, I think, that was his disqualification. I do not remember any other case in which a man has held on after he was unfit.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,885. I take it that there is no lack of perfectly suitable candidates for the office of master?—I imagine not. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie would know what applicants there are.

47,886. Judging from the result, you would say there is no lack of suitable candidates?—There is certainly no difficulty in finding a candidate when a post is vacant.

47,887. So even if under a fixed age limit a master retired while he was still capable of rendering valuable service, the public interests would not suffer if he was replaced by a perfectly competent new appointment?—Does that suggest that he would be liable to be called on to perform service?

47,888. No. I suggest that if perfectly competent candidates are available for any vacancy, the public service will not suffer by the retirement of a master at 70 and his replacement by a perfectly competent new appointment?—But I think the man of 70 would be necessarily much more competent than a man only just appointed, and there must be some loss to the public in that way.

47,889. But at some time the man of 70 must be replaced by a new appointment?—Yes.

47,890. Does the public interest suffer materially by that replacement taking place a few years earlier?—I think the additional services of a man from 70 to 75 would be a distinct loss to the public if he were retired while fit for the work.

47,891. Even if there is a perfectly competent person who could be appointed to replace him?—Yes, because I should not look upon a man newly appointed as perfectly competent compared with a man who has had the experience. I do not think any man is competent, really, until he has had 20 years of it.

47,892. You put the period as long as 20 years?—At any rate he is more competent after 20 years.

47,893. (Lord Mersey.) Then they always start incompetent?—I am afraid so. I speak from experience in my own case.

47,894. (Chairman.) In the case of clerks you suggest that if an age limit is fixed it should be 75?—Yes.

47,895. That is a much higher limit than obtains in the Civil Service generally?—I believe so.

47,896. In the Civil Service generally a clerk is entitled to retire on pension at 60, and is required to retire not later than 65, with power of special prolongation in certain cases?—Yes.

47,897. Is there anything in the work of the clerks in the Chancery offices which makes it desirable to put the limit 10 years later?—I think there must be, but I am only judging from my own experience of the clerks in chambers. There are men who are perfectly fit up to 75. I will not say many, but I have known cases.

47,898. In the majority of cases would a man be as fit at 74 as he is at 64?—I should say so, for that kind of work.

47,899. (Lord Mersey.) Would the same observation, applying to a man of 74, apply to another of 84?—No.

47,900. Then there is a point at which he changes?—There must be, no doubt, but I would not put that at much earlier than 75 for this kind of work in chambers.

47,901. Before passing on, I wish you would tell me again what "linked judges" are?—There are six judges of the Chancery Division, and there are three divisions of them each of two judges, who are linked. The linking means that during one sittings, one judge tries the witness actions, and the other judge does all the interlocutory and non-witness actions and chamber work. Then during the next sittings they change about. That is the linked system.

47,902. (Chairman.) And a case which has been originally assigned to that pair of judges remains with that pair of judges, but it may be transferred from one to the other of those judges?—Yes, it may be tried by either.

47,903. (Mr. Coward.) The point is that the witness actions go on continuously before the same judge through a term?—Yes. That is the great advantage of the system.

47,904. (Lord Mersey.) I thought the judges took the witness actions in turn?—Yes, in turn of sittings.

47,905. During one sittings one judge takes them, and during the next sittings the other judge takes them?—Yes.

47,906. Therefore they are not continued before one judge?—No, only during the sittings.

47,907. (Mr. Coward.) During the sittings you do not have any change in the judge?—No.

47,908. (Lord Mersey.) Before this arrangement was made was there a general list?—Before this arrangement each judge had his own cases in his own chambers, and then he tried witness actions on certain days in the week, and on the other days he disposed of interlocutory matters and non-witness actions.

47,909. (Chairman.) The whole organisation of the masters and officers in chambers is based on the system of linked judges?—Yes.

47,910. That is to say, certain masters and the clerks belonging to those masters are assigned to one pair of linked judges?—That is so.

47,911. And the whole of the matters arising out of the cases assigned to that pair of linked judges go to one or other of the masters attached to that pair of linked judges?—That is so.

47,912. The distribution between the four masters attached to that pair of judges being alphabetical?—Yes.

47,913. Are you of opinion that that system has worked satisfactorily?—Most satisfactorily.

47,914. Are there any observations that you wish to make to the Commission with regard to it?—No, I think not, except to say that it has worked most satisfactorily. I say in my précis how important it is that the masters should be attached to judges, and should not be a separate body as they are on the King's Bench side.

47,915. You think it would not work so well if the masters were a general body, and not attached to a particular group of judges?—No, I think not. I have found no difficulty in serving under two judges, but I should feel anxious at the prospect of having to serve under six. I think it would be most unfortunate in the public interest if the present relations between judge and master were disturbed.

47,916. Passing to another point, the question has been raised of consolidating or amalgamating the Chancery Registrars' Office with the Judges' Chambers. As you are aware, that was recommended by the Committee of 1886, and was approved, I believe, by the Council of Judges in 1892. The more recent Committee, presided over by Mr. Justice Kekewich, in 1907, did not recommend it; but there was a minority report of that Committee, which recommended it. Will you give us your opinion on that question?—The work of the registrar in court is extremely important, and, in my opinion, should not be delegated. One of the principal duties of the registrar is to assist the Court with information on points of practice, and the ability to do this rests on experience. A clerk would not be qualified to perform this duty. This was the view of Mr. Justice Pearson (Report of 1886, page 12). Perhaps it applies less to the trial of witness actions where points of practice are not so likely to arise. Experience and skill are required for the drawing up of Chancery Orders, some of them, and especially those to be acted on by the Paymaster-General, being of a complicated nature.

47,917. We have had some difficulty in discovering exactly in what cases the orders made in chambers are sent to the registrar to be drawn up, and in what cases they are drawn up in chambers. You say orders to be acted on by the paymaster shall, unless the judge otherwise directs, be drawn up by the registrar, and every other order made in chambers, unless the judge otherwise directs, shall be drawn up by the master?—Yes.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,918. Is that the line practically followed, or has the judge directed that any class of orders made in chambers, other than those to be acted on by the Paymaster-General, shall go to the registrar?—I think directions must have been given by the judge in my division, but it is long ago; it must have been before my appointment. Ever since I was appointed we have drawn up all procedure orders—that is, orders for interrogatories, for discovery of documents, and for time—but all other orders, except in a few instances, we send to the registrar. The only exceptions I can think of are orders extending the time for a receiver to act as manager. The powers of management are limited to three months by the Court. Then they come to us in chambers, and we extend the time if a proper case is made out. We draw up these orders. The orders under the Courts Emergency Act, recently passed, we draw up in chambers; it is a saving of expense to the parties. Of course, at any time, for any special reason, we can have an order drawn up in chambers, but, as a rule, we do not do it.

47,919. So that, practically, the line is drawn mainly between procedure orders and other orders?—Yes, in my chambers.

47,920. That is apparently not contemplated by Order 55, Rule 74, in regard to “orders to be acted on by the Paymaster-General” and “other orders”?—That is so. I am speaking of my chambers; the other chambers may differ.

47,921. Does the practice differ materially?—I think it may. I think some of the masters have more orders drawn up in chambers than others.

47,922. Do you consider there is any reason why the line contemplated by the order should not be followed?—No; I think it might be.

47,923. That would mean the drawing up of a considerable number of orders in chambers?—Yes, it would. We might want more help.

47,924. What is your opinion about the consolidation to which I have referred?—If consolidation is decided upon, the only practicable method will be to allow the present registrars to continue to sit in court and draw up orders, altering their title to “master” if preferred, and attaching two to each of the three branches of the Chancery Division. Upon retirement, the present holders of the office might be replaced by gentlemen holding the qualifications now required of masters, and thenceforward the whole work of the combined departments could be distributed amongst the masters. But the next step would inevitably be to abolish the present relations between judge and master, which I should much regret. Under Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie’s scheme there would be six masters to each branch of the Chancery Division, and this would be an inconveniently large number to be under the direction of a single judge. I do not think that the registrars would be fitted, from the nature of their experience, to undertake the work of the masters, as suggested by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie. I say this without intending the slightest disrespect to them, and I believe that they would agree with me. To hand over to them a share of the master’s work would be like appointing a military officer, however distinguished, to join a naval captain in the command of a ship. I do not know which of them would have the greater cause to complain, but I am sure that the captain would lose a great deal of valuable time in teaching the new officer his duties. My colleagues agree with me, that it would be impossible for a master to perform his duties in chambers properly if he were required to take his turn of sitting in court. That I have consulted my colleagues about, and they have authorised me to say that. I wish to say that, before I heard Master Romer’s evidence, I was not aware that any cause of friction existed. Differences of opinion will necessarily arise from time to time, but I do not remember any which have not been easily adjusted. It is the registrar’s duty to point out what he considers a defect before drawing up an order. I am authorised to say that the rest of my colleagues take the same view as I do. Master Romer stated that this part of his evidence was given without opportunity of previously consulting his colleagues, and he has since given me authority to say that it was not any personal friction between the registrars and masters that was in his mind. His suggestion was that some better arrangement should be made for easier means of communication between the two departments.

47,925. (Lord Mersey.) Do you use the word “consolidation” here in the same sense in which the word “amalgamation” has been used?—I think it is exactly the same thing. I think the word “consolidation” I received from the secretary, and followed that expression, but it means amalgamation as I understand it.

47,926. (Chairman.) The scheme which you mentioned as the only practical one is, substantially, the scheme suggested in the memorandum prepared by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie for the Committee of 1907, which the Commission have before them?—I think it is, but it is subject to what I said just now about the impossibility of the masters sitting in court and doing their chamber work as well, because it breaks in upon the chamber work. I do not think Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie contemplated any distinction of that kind.

47,927. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie’s scheme contemplated, I think, that for a time, at any rate, the two registrars who would be added to the chamber offices of each group of judges, would continue to perform their duties very much as at present?—Yes.

47,928. And that, presumably, would include the sitting in court, in so far as it was considered necessary to continue the sitting in court?—Yes.

47,929. Suggestions have been made that it is not necessary that a registrar should sit in court, at any rate, to the extent he does at present?—I believe that is so.

47,930. But your difficulty as regards the masters sitting in court would be removed, so far as the present masters are concerned, if that duty attached to the registrars who were transferred to the chambers of each group?—Yes, but I do not think that in the future masters who have to do the chamber work could fit it in with the court work. Their chamber work ought to be continuous. I suppose if there were six masters, two of them might have to sit in court for a whole sittings. That would disorganise their work in chambers terribly. Or they might have to sit for a whole week, and again their colleagues would have to do their work for them, which would be extremely awkward.

47,931. (Mr. Coward.) Need they sit in court except on motion days, do you think?—There are other days on which interlocutory business is taken—petitions, short causes, and things of that kind. I think it would upset the work in chambers very much if we had to sit in court. The solicitor who comes for an appointment may say: “I want an appointment for such a day; it is very important that I should have that day, because I have to send a ward of court abroad” and he wants to start on Saturday.” If we say, “I am sitting in court that day,” then somebody else must take the work. Our practice is for work, as far as possible, to remain in the same hands.

47,932. I am suggesting that you need not sit in court?—That would get rid of my difficulty.

47,933. (Chairman.) I will read to you the statement of the Committee of 1907 on that point: “Some members of the Committee were disposed to think that the attendance of a clerk on the judges taking non-witness business would also suffice”—that is a clerk, not a registrar—“but the judges consider the attendance of a registrar as regards this class of business essential, and the Committee came to the conclusion that the number of the staff should be fixed on this basis, which will necessitate three registrars being in court daily, except on Mondays.” Assuming that that is essential, it could be met if certain of the future six masters attached to each group were temporarily assigned during any sittings to the order and court work, while other masters were left to do the chamber work?—Yes, but that would interfere with the continuous chamber work of the masters.

47,934. Not if the four masters were doing the chamber work, as at present?—Do you mean that two masters might be attached specially for doing work which the registrars now do?

47,935. That is the suggestion, to begin with at any rate; and I suggest that if the sitting in court is essential, and is an interruption to the chamber work, even when the amalgamation is complete, a special assignment of two officers for the present registrar's work might continue, perhaps, in rotation?—That would meet the difficulty.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,936. Apart from the question of any difficulty in the actual carrying of it out, do you consider that there would be an advantage or the reverse in amalgamation?—I fail to see any disadvantage, except a certain amount of disorganisation, which must always take place. I suppose one important element is whether there would be any saving in money, and, if there would be, of course, that is a thing that we must all assent to.

47,937. That is one important element. Another element would be the saving of time and energy that there might be through the matter having to pass through one office only, instead of two different offices before the order is complete?—Yes.

47,938. That means, does it not, that an entirely fresh officer has to bring his mind to bear on the matter and study it before he can draw up the order?—Yes. Of course, there is an advantage in that, more particularly in dealing with orders to be acted upon by the Postmaster-General for payment out of court. There is always a possibility of fraud and of money getting into the wrong hands. If it goes through two officials, there is a useful check.

47,939. But is not the master who has been dealing with the matter in all its aspects, with the aid of his clerks who have also been dealing with it, quite sufficient check on any fraud?—I should think the registrar is the more valuable check perhaps. It goes into a fresh department, and he looks it up from the beginning and goes over it again.

47,940. (Mr. Boutwood.) The last few questions have put me into a little difficulty. Apparently the suggestion is to amalgamate the registrars and the Chancery masters. The Chancery masters, I believe, are appointed from outside solicitors, and the registrars at present are trained up in another department, and are appointed from the clerks in that department?—Yes.

47,941. Certainly some one—I forget who—regarded that as almost essential, and said that the registrar was something made by a long process of experience. If you amalgamated them, what would you do? The men who would do the registrars' work after amalgamation, if they were just ordinary Chancery masters appointed as the present Chancery masters are, would not have that preliminary training?—That is perfectly true.

47,942. Would that be a difficulty?—I do not think it would be much of a difficulty.

47,943. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) As a general rule, the first class clerks and the second class clerks hitherto have been promoted from the third class?—Yes.

47,944. The number of outsiders who are brought in is only a small proportion of the whole number?—I am speaking rather without book, because I have only general knowledge, but I should say that that is so.

47,945. You do occasionally introduce an outsider direct into the second class?—Yes.

47,946. Are the second class clerks and the first class clerks efficient. Is their work being done well?—I should say certainly, as a whole, very well.

47,947. Then what reason is there why that practice should not be continued, if it has proved satisfactory hitherto—that you should continue to recruit your third class with prospects of promotion to the second and first class?—Of course, one can only judge by experience of particular men. What you feel is, that a man comes in without any knowledge of the particular work, which he would have if he had been a solicitor's clerk; it is true that he may get on in time and fit himself for the work, but he would be much better fitted for the work if he started with that additional training.

47,948. But the work of the third class clerk, I understood you to say, is not of a very important character?—Not very important.

47,949. I believe it was described as routine work?—Yes, I think you may say it is.

47,950. Would not the experience he would gain of the work of the department, in which he was serving as third class clerk, be as good as the experience that he would get in a solicitor's office as a very young junior?

—I think not, because I would have the second class clerk to be a solicitor's Chancery clerk for five years, so that he would be fitting himself for the work; whereas the work of the third class clerk, it seems to me, has very little to do with the work of the second and the first class.

47,951. But you told me just now that the work of the first and second class clerks has been done quite efficiently, and has been quite satisfactory?—Yes, I said that, generally; of course, there are exceptions. I do not want to call attention to any particular cases, but there have been exceptions. Generally, it is very well done.

47,952. Do you think, then, that if you were to hold out the prospect to young men who have served five years in a solicitor's office of a permanent post, never carrying a salary of more than 200*l.* a year, with all chances of promotion, whatever the ability of the third class clerk might be, blocked, that would be sufficient to induce young men of any capacity or ambition to take up such a post?—I think it would. I am rather judging the solicitor's clerk. There is many a solicitor's clerk who goes on to the end of his days not getting more than 200*l.* a year, and I suppose there are many who go on getting much less.

47,953. But if he be a young man of fair ability, he would not be condemned all his lifetime to a subordinate position like that. There would, at any rate, be some chance of promotion if his merits deserved it?—Yes.

47,954. Do you think it a desirable thing that there should be in any department of the public service a stone wall facing a man which he knows he never can surmount, however good his abilities may be. Do you think that that is likely to induce a young man to put forward his best efforts?—Of course, in this case, you have not the special knowledge required. It would be still open to any young man who wanted to get on to look out for a post as Chancery clerk, and to fit himself for a second class clerkship; but I do think, if a man starts as an ordinary clerk and fits himself for a third class clerkship, it would certainly be to the interest of the public that his promotion should stop—of course, if he took it with notice that it would be so.

47,955. But is not that rather inconsistent with the condition you lay down, that a second class clerk should have experience as a solicitor's managing clerk. The third class clerk would not be able to get that experience?—According to my plan he would have had some experience of a solicitor's office.

47,956. Not as a managing clerk?—Not as a Chancery clerk; but it is always open to a man knowing that there is a post open to Chancery clerks, to say, "I want a post as Chancery clerk," and if he can get it he would then be qualifying himself for the second class. There are plenty of men in solicitors' offices who would be very glad to get a post which brought them in 200*l.* a year with a pension at the end, and they would be quite as well off as if they stopped on in a solicitor's office.

47,957. That may be the case, but it hardly meets my point as to the opportunity of advancement for young men of exceptional ability. Do not you think some way ought always to be open for such a man as that?—I have provided for that by saying that, in exceptional cases, a man shall be promoted from a third class clerkship.

47,958. (Lord Mersey.) I notice you qualify what you say by these words, "Reserving a power to promote in cases of exceptional merit"?—Yes.

47,959. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Is not what happens at present before a man can be promoted from the third class to the second class, that although the general rule is seniority, the recommendation must be accompanied by a certificate of efficiency?—That is perfectly true, but when a third class man comes in he knows he has a chance of becoming a first class clerk, whereas, under the system I suggest, he would be told that he would not have that chance.

47,960. (Chairman.) What is the meaning of the words, "reserving a power to promote in cases of exceptional merit." He would know that?—Certainly he would know that.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

(Mr. Matheson.) Surely not. In the one case a man comes in with a prospect of going to the first division in the normal course; in the other case he comes in with a prospect of going to the first division only if he shows very exceptional capacity.

47,961. (Mr. Holt.) How can a man have no expectation of promotion if he is able to get it in exceptional cases? Any man has a prospect if it is done in exceptional cases?—But there is all the difference if you tell a man to begin with, "You are to have no right of promotion. It is true there is power to appoint a man of exceptional merit, but you are not to count on that."

47,962. Do you think, from your experience of the public service, that telling a man he has no expectation of promotion would prevent him having an expectation of promotion? It would not really affect his expectation if anybody ever got promotion?—I think it would make all the difference if you told a man that, which is quite different from telling him, as you do now, that if he goes into a third class post he has a good prospect of rising. You tell him, instead, that he has very little prospect, and he knows it, and he comes in notwithstanding.

47,963. But are not his real expectations what he sees happen, and not what you tell him?—If his expectations are fulfilled and he does show exceptional merit, of course he would get on.

47,964. (Chairman.) Is not the difference this: that in the one case you say the normal method of recruiting to the second class is by direct appointment, and in the other case, as at present, you say the normal method is by promotion?—Yes, and he would be told that.

(Mr. Holt.) Does that affect his expectations?

47,965. (Lord Mersey.) I do not know how you propose that the promotion should be made in cases of exceptional merit. Who is to do it?—No doubt that would have to be settled. I suppose the person who knows the man best would be the master in whose chambers he was, and who would probably be asked to recommend.

47,966. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The organisation of your office is, so to speak, in compartments; each master has certain clerks assigned to him?—Yes; as a matter of actual fact they are assigned to the judge; we are all officers of the two judges.

47,967. But between the clerks and the judgestands the master?—Yes.

47,968. Is the discipline of the office also in compartments?—Yes, certainly. Each master is responsible for the discipline in his own department.

47,969. Does each master keep a time-book in his own chambers?—Not each master. We have for the attendances in the morning one book for three masters in our case, because three of our body are on one side of the building and the fourth is on the other side, so it is more convenient to have a book for the three; and that book is taken in to the junior master every morning by the messenger.

47,970. But you have no means of knowing what the custom with regard to time-books may be in the chambers of any other master except those three?—No, I do not know.

47,971. Is it the custom, for instance, that if a clerk is there at 10.15 he may enter himself as being punctual in your time-book?—I should think it is. I am going back now to the time I was junior master, because I have not seen the book for some years. I think he is allowed something like 20 minutes' grace.

47,972. He is punctual if he is there 20 minutes late, even if regularly there every morning at that time?—I suppose there would be no means of checking that.

47,973. But if there was a difference in the management of the different time-books, the junior master concerned would not know anything about it?—No; he would only know about his own time-book.

47,974. Do you think that some measure of uniformity in the office in that respect might be desirable?—I think very desirable.

47,975. When I was given, the other day, a statement with regard to the ages of clerks in the Chancery chambers, two clerks were returned as ill. Do you know whether they are still ill?—They are both ill, I know.

47,976. If their illness continued there would ultimately come a question of office organisation and discipline, as to whether some official notice of their incapability should be taken?—Yes.

47,977. Is that, again, a matter which would be settled entirely in particular chambers or in a group of chambers?—The master responsible would communicate with Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie.

47,978. There, again, as far as I know, no measures whatever are taken to secure any uniformity of practice in that respect in the office?—No. I think really the practice there is governed by the Lord Chancellor's secretary. We probably all do the same thing. If we have a clerk who is away ill, and is likely to be away ill, we write to him and report it.

47,979. The number of days' absence which may go on before that machinery comes into action would naturally differ in different chambers?—Very likely it would. There is a rule that no man may be absent for more than three days without sending a doctor's certificate.

47,980. But the question, which is the all-important question, of the period at which further action shall be taken, differs according to the discretion of the different masters?—I think that it would.

47,981. Do you think there again some measure of uniformity might be desirable?—Very desirable.

47,982. Do you think it might be desirable to appoint an official who in other Government departments is called a chief clerk, who is responsible for the details and discipline throughout the whole office. Might that be possible in your case?—You mean throughout the Chancery chambers? Yes, I should think it would be a very good plan indeed.

47,983. With regard to the office of senior master, in what real sense is the senior master responsible for the organisation in the office?—He is not in any way responsible for anything but his own chambers, except that, as senior master, he has necessarily to deal with a good deal of correspondence which is addressed to the senior master. If there are any communications from the Lord Chancellor affecting the whole body of masters they would come to him. He also presides at our meetings and calls the meetings.

47,984. At present he has certain administrative duties in dealing with the whole office?—Yes.

47,985. And if an attempt were made to introduce a larger measure of uniformity in the discipline of the office, those duties would probably increase?—Yes. I should think the duties of the senior master would increase if the chief clerk were put under him.

47,986. That is what I am supposing. You have been a master for 23 years?—Yes.

47,987. Putting aside all present questions, and looking back into the past, do you think it might be an advantage if the custom in other offices were followed by which the chief administrative officer was selected rather than appointed by pure seniority?—Are you speaking of some such officer as a chief clerk?

47,988. No; I am speaking of the senior master?—I think it would not be a bad idea if he were appointed by election, but I do not quite see how it is to be done.

47,989. The Lord Chancellor, for instance, might do it?—He might. I suppose it must be either that or by seniority. It has never been anything but seniority before.

47,990. I am not asking you what it was, but what it ought to be?—I think it would not be a bad plan, and I express this opinion with the less hesitation because in the ordinary course I shall be the first person liable to be displaced if such a regulation is made.

47,991. You can recall in the past occasions on which the master who happened to be the oldest was not necessarily the best administrative chief of the office?—I do not think I can. There have been about four or five different senior masters since I was first appointed, and I think the senior master was always very fit for his post.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

47,992. But was he always the most fit?—I should think so.

47,993. (Lord Mersey.) I suppose experience counts for a good deal?—Yes, it does.

47,994. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You know that the third class clerks at present have to pass an examination?—Yes.

47,995. Do you know anything about that examination?—I do not.

47,996. Your scheme for future appointment to the second class contemplates that those solicitors' clerks who are appointed to the second class shall have gone into a solicitor's office at the minimum legal age of 14?—Not necessarily, because, as was pointed out, the limit I finally proposed was 25 for appointment, so they might go in as late as 20. The case I put was of a boy going in at 15 having five years' experience, and at 20 being qualified for the office, but not getting the appointment until 25.

47,997. The calculation I followed in your words was that he went in at 15?—Yes, he would be all the better for that first five years.

47,998. You know that a growing proportion of the more promising lads in London take an education beyond the minimum legal age including some form of secondary education?—Yes.

47,999. If that scheme of yours were followed out, none of those lads would come in?—Of course, they might go on with that form of education instead of going to a solicitor's office at 15, and would still be available at 20 to go into a solicitor's office.

48,000. Do you think it desirable that, if you are distinguishing between those who go into the second class and those who go into the third class, those who go into the second class should normally have an education beyond the legal minimum?—I really do not know enough about the qualifying examination. It is desirable that a clerk should have some general knowledge, and therefore should pass some form of qualifying examination; but whether he would have to work after the age of 15 for that I am not sure. I think at the age of 15 I passed the preliminary examination for the law.

48,001. You have in the Chancery Department a Scrivenery Department where scriveners are employed?—Yes.

48,002. Are you familiar with the conditions of their employment?—Not at all. If documents have to be copied, they are sent down and come back again.

48,003. You said that in the old days the individual judges, in fact, used to choose the masters?—I think they selected them and submitted them to the Lord Chancellor.

48,004. And you said you thought there was a good deal to be said for the revival of that practice?—Yes, for giving the judges a voice. Then the Chairman suggested a committee, which, I think, might also be desirable as an assistance to the judge.

48,005. Do you remember the old system?—Yes.

48,006. Was it the case that the judges were in their nominations very largely guided by family connection?—I never heard that it was so. That is the first I have heard of it.

48,007. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) But did it sometimes happen that relatives of judges were appointed?—Master Romer was a cousin of a gentleman who was afterwards a judge, but I do not recollect any other case to my knowledge.

48,008. (Mr. Holt.) You are not a relative of a judge?—I am not.

48,009. You said, perhaps not very seriously, or I understood you to say to Lord Mersey, that all the masters were incompetent when they were first appointed?—I should not put it quite so strongly as that. What I said was, I think, that they were not nearly so competent when appointed as when they had had 20 years' experience.

48,010. And you went on almost to say that the length of experience alone would make one master more competent than another?—Certainly. Assuming their intellects were alike, the man of 20 years' experience would be much more competent than the man just appointed. I do not mean that anyone of my junior colleagues is less fit for his post than I am, but only that after 20 years a master should have acquired a stock of experience which enables him to deal more readily with any difficulty that arises in his work.

48,011. I think you went so far as to say that the man of 25 years' experience would be better than the man of 23 years' experience, no matter what their original intellect may have been?—I certainly never intended to say that.

48,012. What I suggest is, that if that theory of the great value of experience is correct, it cannot be very important what the experience of an officer was before his appointment as master?—Yes, because he is training himself.

48,013. But his previous training cannot be a matter of very great importance if experience in the office is the one thing?—I will not say it is the one thing. Previous training is very valuable, no doubt; it is like the training for everything else, and even the boy's education is a training.

48,014. In most professions or occupations, an able man who is properly qualified when he comes in can very soon be as good a man as a less able man who has been there for some time?—But every man is trained for a profession.

48,015. But you have told us that when a person has once become a master, all his previous training and experience counts for very little—the one thing that makes him better than his fellows being his experience as master?—I did not mean to convey that. Just as I should say of a doctor who has to go through a training to fit himself, that training is all-important. When he becomes a doctor he has very little experience, and he is much more competent as a doctor when he has been a doctor 20 years than he is when he is first made one.

48,016. Do not you think there are some doctors straight out of a hospital, who have only just got permission to practise, whom you would rather trust yourself to than some doctors of 70?—I should think there are very few.

48,017. With regard to the third class clerks, are you acquainted with the general Civil Service of the country?—Very little.

48,018. Would you be surprised to hear that one of the principal causes of discontent among Civil servants is the exact proceeding that you suggest with regard to the third class clerks, that is, holding out to them prospects of promotion to a higher rank under exceptional circumstances which they always allege are not fulfilled to anything like the same extent as they were led to believe would be the case?—I did not know that that was so.

48,019. Can you imagine that it would be so?—Yes; it may be a ground for leaving that provision out.

48,020. Is it possible to hold out to anybody expectation of promotion in cases of exceptional merit, without inducing the particular person to believe that he has a good expectation of promotion?—It seems to me that there is a difference between telling a man, "You are going into a third class clerkship, and if you behave yourself and get a certificate of fitness, you will go on to the second and first class," and telling him, "You are going to a clerkship where promotion stops when you get to your full salary, though, with exceptional merit it may be, if the authorities think fit, you will be appointed to the second class."

48,021. Do you think the man himself ever has any doubt as to his possessing exceptional merit?—I think he ought to look at both sides.

48,022. Why cannot your own department, by taking in by competition young men who have had a good education, beginning as third class clerks, train your own second and first class clerk in the same way as other departments do?—I think the reason is that our third class work is quite distinct from the second and first. There is very little legal knowledge required for the third class, though it is better that a man should know the difference between a writ and a summons. When you go to the second or the first class you have, for instance, the drawing up of certificates, which no third class clerk has any experience of whatever, and yet it is an extremely important matter that the certificate should be drawn correctly.

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

48,023. Will not the third class clerk in your office learn anything?—I do not think he would learn anything of second class work or of the work in the class above.

48,024. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Then what use is he as a second class clerk when he is promoted into that grade, if his work is so entirely different, and he has had no previous experience?—Then he has to begin and learn it; and that is a disadvantage, I think.

48,025. (Mr. Holt.) Does a second class clerk learn anything that would fit him to become a first class clerk?—I think he does.

48,026. Does a third class clerk learn anything which would fit him to become anything subsequently. Is it a kind of blind alley?—I can hardly say that he does not learn anything. He learns the ways of the office, which is some use to him; but he does not do some of the difficult work which solicitors' clerks who practise before us are acquainted with; and therefore he is not so fit as they are. That is the way I should put it.

48,027. Was not the number of Chancery judges increased from five to six comparatively recently?—It was.

48,028. When?—I am afraid I cannot give you the year.

48,029. Approximately?—I think it was the beginning of the century, 1901, which is when the system of linked judges began.

48,030. When that increase in the number of judges took place, was there an increase in the number of masters?—No. Before that time there were four Chancery judges who were doing chamber work. The fifth judge did nothing but try witness actions always. Then there were four judges with three masters each. When the linked system came into existence and there were six judges, they were divided into three divisions, each with four masters; so there was a reorganisation of the office.

48,031. I only wanted to make quite certain that there was no alteration in the number of masters?—There was no addition to the number of masters.

48,032. You do not know anything as to the necessity of the registrar sitting in court?—I can only say what I have already said, that it has always been supposed that the registrar did very important work in advising the judge on points of practice, and therefore it was important that he should be there.

48,033. How does a new registrar get his experience as to points of practice?—He has learnt it by degrees in rising from the bottom of the office and mixing with the registrars.

48,034. You do not know really from your own knowledge whether it is necessary to have a registrar in court, or not?—No, I could not express any further opinion about it.

48,035. (Mr. Coward.) I should like you to contrast the fitness for the appointment to the second or first class: first, by promotion from the third class, and secondly, by the appointment of outsiders from the solicitors' profession, that is to say, solicitors' clerks. Could there be any possible doubt that the latter would be the preferable plan?—I think, not the slightest.

48,036. You must in all offices dealing with the law have people who do work that is of the lowest grade. For instance, you have boys to take out letters, and do that kind of thing, and they might learn nothing. If you have that sort of work in the third class here you cannot raise them up with advantage. You would do much better by getting them from outside, where they have learnt a real amount of the work which they will have to do?—I think so.

48,037. I suppose you would agree that the work in a solicitor's office, where the work is well done, is a very fine tuition?—Very.

48,038. Because they not only learn discipline, but how to work hard; they keep regular hours; they are under control, and they get great business experience. Is that right?—Quite right.

48,039. They learn the elementary procedure in a way which I have heard described as taking it in by the pores; it is done so that they do not really appreciate that they are doing it?—Yes.

48,040. If you appointed a fellow like that who has had many years' experience in a solicitor's office, if he gets into your office as a first or second class clerk, he would be far fitter for the position than one who has never had that experience?—Far fitter, certainly.

48,041. Can you suggest any reorganisation, or means of reorganisation other than those which we have been discussing, which would improve matters? Is there anything else in the office that would be advantageous, which would lead to improvement of the character of the men, and of the work, and generally the way the work is done?—I do not think I can suggest anything. Are you speaking of the clerks only?

48,042. I am speaking of the clerks?—No. I think if we could get the best solicitors' clerks into our office as second class clerks, we should certainly be doing the very best thing for the public that could be done.

48,043. There is no doubt that it would be of very great advantage, would it not?—I think so.

48,044. Is there any one amongst the masters, or in the office generally under the master's control, who takes control of the workers; that is to say, is there anybody there who knows, for instance, what A B or C D is really doing, and whether he is doing good work in the office?—Each master has his own little staff of four clerks, and they work apart. They may mix in one way, and go and consult one another, but they are quite distinct from the clerks of another master. They have different rooms. Two of my clerks, the second and third class, sit in an outer room next to my room; and the two others sit in rooms on the floor above. There is no actual control of one clerk over another, though they constantly come together; and no doubt my first class clerks would know perfectly well if there was any incompetence in the second or third class clerks.

48,045. Would they report to you?—Yes.

48,046. I suppose you never do have such a complaint?—I have never had such a complaint. My men are extremely good, and I have never had any trouble at all.

48,047. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Who is responsible for the apportionment of the work amongst the various clerks?—I suppose the master is. As a matter of fact, when I first came I saw that a certain arrangement had been made, and I have never altered it. If I were to start again I should make a difference. In regard to my two first class clerks, one takes certain kinds of work and the other takes another kind of work, both work of importance. If I had to start again, or if there was a vacancy, possibly now I should divide my part of the alphabet between the two in equal shares, which would be far better, and you would have a man then doing every kind of work of a first class clerk.

48,048. (Chairman.) Each taking a half of all kinds?—Yes.

48,049. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Surely there must be somebody, when certain work requires to be done, to say: "This must be given to A or B, or F or G," and to see that A or B or F or G does it?—That is clearly settled. We have a statement of the work that each clerk does, so that each clerk knows what is his own work and he does it.

48,050. To whom is that statement given?—The statement is in the office and I expect each of the clerks has a copy of it; but there is never any difficulty about that.

48,051. Is it something like this, then—that the work that has to be done in the office is thrown into a lump and each clerk, when he wants something to do, goes and takes a piece of work from that lump?—No, that might become the case if we were so overworked as to have arrears; but we have no arrears. What happens is this: I deal with a summons in the morning, I have a sheet of paper on which I make my notes and signify the result; I say, "Order so and so," putting in the terms of it. That is taken out by a third class clerk and noted in the return of orders made as one more, and then it is taken up to the first class clerk, who endorses the summons. He enters all the evidence on the back of the summons and endorses it with the order made. The next morning he brings that to me to sign. With regard to certificates, accounts and inquiries are directed by the judge, a summons to proceed comes into chambers, and when the evidence is filed I read it in the presence of the parties, and I say: "Certify so and so in answer to inquiry 1, and so and so in answer to account 2," and so on all through. At the bottom I say, "Ad-journed for Certificate." Those notes in the same way are taken out, noted for the return, and taken to the clerk who prepares the certificates, and he looks at my notes and at all the affidavits which are left with him, and he draws the certificate. That is done by one of my first class clerks. The one who does the endorsing of the summons is the other first class clerk; each knows his own work.

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

48,052. That is not what I wanted to get at. Is there no second or first class clerk who is responsible for the supervision of the third class clerks. (Mr. Matheson.) The staff is very small in each set of chambers; there are only four clerks in each set of chambers?—That is so. I think I could say that no one is responsible.

48,053. (Lord Mersey.) And they do not sit together, and they take different work?—Yes, but the first class clerks are coming down from upstairs all day long to look at notes or papers or things in the outer office, and have some knowledge of what is going on there. If there was anything wrong going on there I should certainly hear of it from the first class clerks.

48,054. If there was any sky-larking going on would you hear of it?—I should hear of it, and, of course, if the men were neglecting their duty and going out all day long, I should hear of it.

48,055. (Miss Haldane.) Would you say that the class of men at present in the third class were better than necessary? We have had evidence that a good many were university men?—Yes, most decidedly.

48,056. Better than necessary, if there was no good prospect of promotion?—Yes.

48,057. You say that only under exceptional circumstances ought they to be promoted; but, if it is all mechanical work that they do, how could you determine whether they were or were not capable of doing exceptionally good work?—I am in constant communication with the clerks, so that I should see the work that the clerk was doing, and I should have an opportunity of judging whether he was sharp and specially fit for the work. I think I should know pretty well, and I do not think it would very often happen that I should recommend one.

48,058. You think that there would be an opportunity for him to show that he could do better work than another?—I think so.

48,059. (Sir John Kempe.) Would you say that the Chancery work is the most highly technical and complicated of all the different divisions?—Yes, I should say so.

48,060. For that reason it is essential for you to have trained men to begin with?—Yes.

48,061. The same claim is made by all the other divisions. They all say that they want to have solicitors' clerks as a recruiting ground to deal with their work. I dare say you are aware of that?—No; I do not know that I have heard of that before.

48,062. Well, it is so. From the point of view of the present policy of the Civil Service, does not that involve a rather serious question. It means that you propose to exclude the public from any chance of a large number of Civil appointments and confine them to a certain privileged class who have had the opportunity of going through a solicitor's office. A large section of the public is excluded?—Yes; I should say you are confining it to a trained class—to men who, by their training, are more fitted for it.

48,063. Would you accept people who have been trained in other ways, by going through a secondary education course and things of that kind?—I do not think a man who had done that, without going into a solicitor's office, would be qualified in the same degree at all.

48,064. Then, in fact, you would confine it to that particular class of people?—I think so.

48,065. Excluding all the rest of the world?—Yes.

48,066. That is on the assumption that the training cannot be acquired within your own office?—I think so. We have no means of training.

48,067. How many vacancies do you have in a year?—My office staff only consists of four clerks.

48,068. But supposing they were all interchangeable? In the Chancery Division how many new clerks are there in a year?—It is very difficult to say. I suppose there are returns which would show that. It is not knowledge which comes to me direct; the senior master knows more about it. I generally hear if there is a vacancy. There may be one, or perhaps two, appointed in a year.

48,069. (Chairman.) Is not the number much less than that? It would appear from the dates that there have been three appointments since 1903?—That is so, according to the returns. I included vacancies owing to promotion.

48,070. (Sir John Kempe.) The argument I have heard used by witnesses rather seems to suggest that you would have to be constantly training new men for the work, but if it is not more than one man a year, there should be no difficulty in training one man a year in the office without drawing them from solicitors' clerks. If you have an intelligent man to deal with, should there be any great difficulty in training him in a year to learn the work of the office?—It is not a case of training a man in one great department, but training a man in a particular department of four clerks.

48,071. That might be obviated by making it interchangeable more or less?—But I think it would be very undesirable to change the clerks from one division to another, because they get to know their own cases. For instance, the clerks have thousands of bundles of notes. I make a note in every case, and there might be three or four thousand in a cupboard, and the clerk goes to that cupboard and he picks out the notes when the case comes before me, and puts them before me in the morning when the case is in the list. In that and other ways he gets to know the particular cases, and I think it would be very undesirable to change from one office to another. I also think that a solicitor's office would be the better training ground.

48,072. The better training ground; but the other would not be impossible?—It would not be impossible. He would only have one man with him, and would sit in the outer office, as it is called, and that one man would have to train him.

48,073. There must be some very good reasons for departing from the rule of the Civil Service, you admit?—Yes.

48,074. And it is only because the case is so strong that you wish it departed from?—Yes.

48,075. Do you know anything about the Estate Duty Department of the Inland Revenue?—No, I do not know anything about it.

48,076. I may say that there you have a case, judging from what little I have seen of the Chancery work, where the work is quite as difficult and complicated as in a Chancery office. That office is partly legal and partly financial, and recruited from the outside, and there has never been any difficulty at all in the men learning their work, which is admirably done. It is a larger office than the Chancery, and probably more than one man comes in in a year, but they are trained up, and know their legal and financial work. Is there anything in the training in one office which makes that possible where it is not possible in the other?—Have not the gentlemen who go into that department a legal training?

48,077. No, it is open competition for intermediate class clerks; they have gone in chiefly from public schools?—I have no experience, and I cannot judge. I must take it that it does answer in that department; but I cannot think for a moment that it would be a good thing in our department. It might be done as I said, but the other plan where you get a man with a training is so much better. It is a question of taking a man with training or a man without. If you have got him already trained, you do not want to train him in the office.

4 March 1915.]

Master JOHN CHARLES FOX.

48,078. On the same principle you would say that the Local Government Board ought to be recruited from the staff of municipal bodies, and, I suppose, the Custom House from shipping clerks, and, perhaps, the Treasury from accountants, and so on for other departments. I do not think you want to bring technical people in when you have a large field for training. You do not want to bring in none but technical people from outside?—I should only say that you want to get the best men you can, and I think the best men you can get are the men who have been trained in that particular branch.

48,079. (Mr. Shipley.) On an ordinary day can a master finish his work in his office hours, or does he take work home with him?—I should say, as a rule, he takes work home with him. I constantly take work home with me, and I do it in the early morning.

48,080. (Mr. Matheson.) Your contention really with regard to the first and second class clerks is that their work is technical. Is not that what it comes to?—Yes.

48,081. And therefore you are not appointing to an ordinary clerical class?—That is so.

48,082. Is it really necessary for the third class, if their work is so elementary, to require that they should have been in a solicitor's office. Could not they have been drawn from what you may call the ordinary lower clerical class?—I think the training in a solicitor's office would help them in their duties, decidedly.

48,083. No doubt it would, but to require that means that you must take them later?—Yes, they must have, according to my plan, five years in a solicitor's office before they come to us. I think they would be all the better for it.

48,084. Have you had experience of third class clerks who have not been in a solicitor's office?—Yes.

48,085. Would your experience show that there is a real difference between them in usefulness—between the man who has been in a solicitor's office and one who has not?—Yes.

48,086. (Chairman.) Is not your difficulty in training men in the third class for the higher classes this: that the third class is the lowest class you have, and there is a certain amount of work of a purely mechanical nature—keeping lists and so forth. Having a small number of third class clerks they are entirely and exclusively employed on that work, and therefore have no opportunity of learning any better work?—Yes, that expresses it exactly.

48,087. If you had a larger number of third class clerks and could give them, as they gain experience, some better work as well as the merely mechanical work, could they not in that case gradually get the training for the better work?—I do not know how we could give them the better work. That would be the difficulty.

48,088. I am assuming that you have a smaller number of higher class clerks and a larger number of third class clerks. In that case, would it not be possible to give the third class clerks gradually, as they gain experience, better work to do?—Those two third class clerks would sit in the outer office together, and would have no opportunity of learning the work of the men upstairs.

48,089. I see that a difficulty arises from the extreme sub-division of the staff into twelve watertight compartments. Presumably, a change of numbers would have to be made. Do you see any insuperable obstacle to that? That would mean giving to the present second class clerks work done by the first class, and to the two third class clerks between them some of the work done by the second class clerks?—My two first class clerks both do most important work, and they have plenty of it to occupy them, and I should be sorry to give any of their work to a second class clerk.

48,090. Is promotion at present by seniority or by selection?—By seniority, subject to a certificate. Of course, it is a matter for the Lord Chancellor, so I can only imagine what is the rule. If there is a vacancy the Lord Chancellor refers to us, and we have a committee that looks into the antecedents of the man, and, if he is fit, recommends him; but, subject to that, as a rule, seniority governs it.

48,091. It is seniority, subject to fitness?—I think so.

48,092. Are the cases numerous in which a man is not promoted?—No, not numerous—quite the exception.

48,093. As a rule they go up by seniority?—Yes.

48,094. I see the Committee of 1907 recommended that appointments and promotions should be made by selection and not by seniority. Are you in favour of that?—I think selection is certainly better. It is a very difficult thing to decide—at least, for the head of the department. I mean it would be difficult for us to say, from so many candidates, that we think A B is best for the post, passing over a number of seniors.

48,095. The difficulty there again arises from the sub-division into twelve different offices?—I cannot quite say that; but the difficulty you would feel is that it is such a hardship on the other men who are looking for promotion; you want some outside power.

48,096. But in the public interest promotion by selection is to be preferred?—I think so.

48,097. (Sir John Kempe.) Would it be possible to pool a certain amount of the third class work. If you had a long room with a number of third class clerks working in it, filling up forms and so on, would it be possible that they could work for the whole office, and if one is busy, some of his work could go to another and so on?—The inconvenience would be this: I have a diary which the third class clerk keeps, and if I want the diary I just ring to the next room, and he brings it in at once. If you had other people dealing with that diary you would not know where it might be at the time you wanted it.

48,098. Each clerk might be responsible for keeping the diary of a particular master, but there is other work which is not of that character?—Much of the work of the third class clerk is closely connected with the work of the master. I have not thought much about it, but I do not think myself that it would do to have one long room in which the work was pooled.

Mr. ROBERT FREDERIC BAYFORD, called and examined.

48,099. (Chairman.) You are a barrister?—I am.

48,100. And your practice has been in the Probate and Divorce Division?—Yes.

48,101. You appear here on behalf of the Bar Council?—Yes.

48,102. May we take it that your evidence is endorsed by the Bar Council, or does it represent your personal opinions only?—It represents my personal opinions. I sent my précis in to the Bar Council, but I have received no further communication with regard to it from them.

48,103. You are prepared to speak mainly as regards the work of the Principal Probate Registry?—Yes. That involves, of course, the Probate Registry and the Divorce Registry, which are amalgamated under the term "Principal Probate Registry."

48,104. You have not had much contact, I suppose, with the district registries?—Practically nothing.

48,105. As regards the district registries, you have no special observation to offer?—No. All I can say is that any serious difficulty that arose there would probably involve an application to one of the judges of our division, and such applications are practically unknown. I have known one myself on one occasion—and so far it appears from that that it is done reasonably well.

48,106. As regards the principal registry, in your experience, is the work done satisfactorily?—On the whole, I think, yes.

48,107. Do you consider that the system of appointment of the registrars has been satisfactory as judged by the results?—Yes; I think that both as regards the class of man you get and the way the work is done as a result of it, on the whole it is good. I think possibly there might be some limitation as to the term of appointment.

4 March 1915.]

MR. ROBERT FREDERIC BAYFORD.

48,108. As to the age to which the appointment should be held?—Yes.

48,109. I see you also suggest a limitation of the period for which the appointment should be held?—Yes, I thought it would be better in all probability to make some period for an appointment with an age limit.

48,110. In most cases an age limit would act practically as a limitation of the period, because I suppose registrars are not appointed as a rule until, say, the age of 40?—That would be so; but it depends upon what length of time you put. Supposing you appointed a man of 40 with a 15 years' appointment, that would only bring him to 55, and I certainly think that most registrars would be well capable of conducting their duties for many years after that.

48,111. Would not an age limit meet the object that you had in view in making that suggestion, without having a limitation of the period of tenure?—Yes, I think perhaps it would.

48,112. Do you think it would be advisable to fix an age limit?—I think it would be advisable to fix an age limit, with the proviso that there should be power in the President in any particular case to extend the time if he thought right.

48,113. A power similar to that which exists in the Civil Service generally at present?—Yes.

48,114. Turning now to the clerks, do you consider that the system of their appointment has worked satisfactorily?—Yes, my principal knowledge with regard to them comes from observation of the work of those clerks who are more immediately attached to the registrars and working in the Contentious Department. Of course, I see a little of some of the work of the other clerks, but not a great deal.

48,115. You see a good deal of the results of the work in certain branches?—Certainly.

48,116. And your impression is generally favourable?—Highly satisfactory. I think the clerks' work throughout is extremely well done.

48,117. Are legal qualifications necessary before appointment in the case of the principal registry?—I should say not.

48,118. Do you think if you get a well educated, intelligent man of a suitable age, he can perfectly well learn the work in the registry itself?—I think so. So far as the legal part of the knowledge that he requires goes, he has ample opportunity of getting what he wants to know in the registry itself and in the work there, and more particularly anybody who is attached to either of the registrars as is his personal clerk, because he is present at all contentious matters which are decided by the registrars, such as summonses, alimony inquiries, and that class of work, and that gives the clerk a very practical knowledge of what is required from the legal point of view.

48,119. The suggestion has been made that open competition might be the preferable method of selection for these appointments. What is your opinion as to that?—I should be very loth to interfere with the present system. I think you get a very good class of man there at the present time under the present system.

48,120. In respect of what qualities do you think the present system works more satisfactorily than open competition?—The President has some information with regard to the persons who are appointed. No doubt he has to rely, to a certain extent, upon the persons bringing forward the particular candidate. The result at the present time is undoubtedly that a very good class of man is appointed. I think you might quite well get persons who could pass an examination who would not possibly have, apart from the mere book learning and an ability to pass the examination, certain qualifications which you can judge of from personal observation of a man.

48,121. You mean that the more personal qualities are not tested so well by examination as by the present system?—Yes, I think that is so.

48,122. On the other hand, is it not probable that education and intellectual qualifications might be better tested by examination?—I do not think you would get any substantial advantage there. The emoluments resulting from an appointment are not particularly large.

48,123. But is there any reason why those emoluments, such as they are, should attract less satisfactory candidates if the door of entrance were examination then are attracted under the present system?—No, possibly not.

48,124. If I understand your view it is that the personal qualities which are tested by personal selection are more important in this case than the qualities which are tested by examination?—I think it is a very important matter in that particular office.

48,125. Why in that particular office?—You have got what is really a school in a sense for persons who are qualifying eventually to be appointed to the higher offices in the principal registry and in the district registries, and I think you want a man who is not only qualified from the point of view of being able to pass an examination, but who is a man who is fit to take a responsible position apart from what he can show by examination. I think you get a much greater insight into that under the present system than you would by open competition where any body could go in, and if they could merely pass an examination you would have to appoint them.

48,126. Do you think the present salaries are suitable?—Yes, taking it all round, except that I do not think the salaries of the clerks, who are the immediate clerks to the registrars, are sufficient. They are persons in a very responsible position; they are in a position which enables them, probably better than any other person in the registry, to qualify for the higher offices, and the amount of work that the registrar is able to get through in the course of a year depends largely upon the way in which his own personal clerk looks after his appointments. That may appear to be a perfectly simple thing, but it is not, because the registrars have a good deal to do and some applications take a long time and some a short time. Unless a man has a certain amount of knowledge of what is capable of being done on a particular application, he is not able to judge what is the right time to give for a particular appointment. Unless you get somebody who has a great deal of knowledge and is capable of learning with regard to what can be done on particular applications, you get either a very great waste of time of the registrar or a waste of time of the litigants who are waiting one after another for their cases to be got on with.

48,127. There are four clerks to registrars?—There are four registrars and four registrars' clerks, but I think there is an additional one, that is the post of principal registrar's clerk, who is in addition to the other four.

48,128. The question of the remuneration of these individuals does not affect the question of the pay of the class as a whole?—No.

48,129. And it might be met either by particular treatment for these posts or by selecting the men for these posts out of a higher class?—Yes. I think they are very important posts.

48,130. On the question of the method of promotion, do you know by what method clerks are selected for promotion at present?—Yes; the promotion from the third class to the second class is principally governed by seniority, secondly by suitability to fill the particular post, and thirdly any special reason with regard to the particular post. The principal thing that governs appointments from the third class to the second class is seniority.

48,131. Does that apply also as regards promotion from the second class to the first class?—No, it does not. The principal thing that applies to any promotion from the second to the first class is the suitability of the man to fill the post vacant. Then seniority, I should say, comes second. Of course there are a great many departments in the registry, and when a vacancy occurs in one of the higher posts in a particular branch the senior second class clerk, who has a knowledge of that particular business, is appointed if he is fit for it.

48,132. Do you consider that system satisfactory, or do you think that selection should be employed to a greater extent?—The result is satisfactory so far as the public is concerned, or rather so far as that portion of the public that I have any knowledge of is concerned, and it is satisfactory so far as the clerks themselves in

Mr. ROBERT FREDERIC BAYFORD.

Somerset House are concerned. I know a good many of them, and I have never heard any real complaints with regard to the question of promotion. The only thing is they say they are not promoted quick enough.

48,133. I suppose it is important that the best men should go to the most important posts?—Yes.

48,134. Does a system which mainly proceeds by seniority secure that result?—I think it does in this case. The men who are chosen to fill the senior posts—a first class clerk or a clerk of a Seat—are men who have special knowledge of the particular branch of the registry in which that particular vacancy is.

48,135. They are chosen by function?—Yes, by function, and by ability to fill the post.

48,136. But as between two or more men who have experience qualifying them to perform the particular function required it goes by seniority and not by merit?—Yes.

48,137. But you are of opinion, nevertheless, that that method gets the best men for the important posts?—I think so.

48,138. Is there not a considerable difference between the value and quality of different men?—No doubt.

48,139. Does a system which sends them up by seniority secure that, as between two men, the better goes to the top?—It is not an inelastic system.

48,140. You mean, if a man is obviously unfitted for promotion, he is not promoted?—That is so.

48,141. Two men may be above that line, and both fitted for promotion, but one may be a much better man than the other?—He might be.

48,142. And if he happens to be the junior, it is the other man who goes up?—That would be so. There might be a case of that sort, but I think you are dealing with very special circumstances, because persons who get to that position have had an equal opportunity of learning the business they have to do there, and it would be a rare thing to find that there was very much difference between the two men. If a man who was a junior was very much more fitted for the post he would be appointed.

48,143. In your own profession, do you find there is very little difference between barristers of 20 years' standing?—I do not think you ought to ask me that.

48,144. Besides promotion in the office itself, clerks from the principal registry are not infrequently appointed to district registries?—Yes.

48,145. Is that a desirable arrangement, do you think?—Admirable. Whenever a vacancy in a district registry occurs, very serious consideration should be given to any application made by anybody who has had substantial experience as a clerk in the principal registry.

48,146. You think that that experience would be the best qualification for the district registrarship?—I think it is a very great qualification for it.

48,147. Besides being given to clerks from the principal registry, those appointments are also given to local practitioners in some cases?—Yes.

48,148. As between the local practitioner and the clerk from the principal registry, which do you consider would normally have the better qualification?—I think the clerk in the principal registry, because he has had intimate knowledge, for a certain number of years, of the actual working of the principal registry, which is on similar lines, of course, to district registries, and he knows, under those circumstances, what to do with regard to anything in the district registry which requires an order or communication from the principal registry.

48,149. In two cases at present the registrars have themselves been district registrars before appointment to the principal registry?—Yes.

48,150. Is that experience a suitable preparation for the office of registrar at the principal registry?—It is no disqualification, certainly; but whether it is of any particular value, I am a little doubtful.

48,151. Questions have been raised as to whether there should be any transfer of work from the principal registry as it exists at present. One suggestion which has been made, is that the taxing work should be transferred to the central taxing office. What is your opinion as to that suggestion?—I think the whole thing is a special branch, and it would be a pity to take any small portion of it out and try to fit it into some other office.

48,152. You think the taxing work is better kept where it is?—Yes. The reason is partly that taxations arise with regard to wives' costs in any matrimonial proceedings up to the time of setting down the case for trial. The taxing officer who is dealing with that bill at the same time has to fix the security to be given by the husband for the future costs of the wife, and the fixing of that amount requires a certain amount of special knowledge with regard to divorce work. That is only one instance where, I think, it would be much more desirable to have these matters left in the hands of registrars who are always dealing with divorce matters from start to finish, rather than send that little piece of the work out to somebody else to deal with, who perhaps has never had any knowledge of divorce work at all.

48,153. There is the further consideration that the work is done in different buildings?—Yes.

48,154. Are there any other points upon which you think any rearrangement or transfer of the work would be advisable?—No, I do not know that there really is I think, as a whole, the work goes on satisfactorily from the point of view of the litigants.

48,155. And, judging from the results as you see them, do you consider that the organisation of the office is satisfactory and does not require change?—I think so, taking it as a whole. I do not mean to say that there are not some small matters that might not be considered, but the registrars would be much more able to give you information with regard to that than I.

48,156. Have you any suggestions to make as regards the drawing up of orders?—I think the practice which exists at the present time of sometimes referring the minutes of an order to either the solicitors or the counsel engaged in the case before it actually is issued might be extended with advantage.

48,157. Is it the practice in this division for the orders to be drawn up entirely in the office?—Yes.

48,158. We have heard that in the King's Bench Division the orders, as a rule, are drawn up by the solicitors and then brought to the office; whereas in the Chancery Division they are entirely drawn in the office. Would it be possible or advisable to adopt the King's Bench procedure in this division?—I do not think it would be an advantage to do it in every case, because I think that would mean delay.

48,159. The object of adopting it in the King's Bench Division was to save time?—I am rather doubtful whether it would save time.

48,160. Are the orders of a simple or complicated nature as a rule?—A great many of them are simple, but there are a substantial number of orders which are not simple orders—questions as to dealing with variations of marriage settlements, and questions of securing maintenance; and that class of question sometimes involve substantially difficult orders, and it is difficult for anybody to draw the order up who has not an intimate knowledge of the particular facts of the case.

48,161. By whom are they drawn up at present?—Those are drawn up by the registrar or the registrar's clerk.

48,162. By the registrar who has been in court while the case was being heard?—Yes.

48,163. So that he is acquainted with the facts?—Yes; but he has not actually got the papers before him while the case is being discussed, and has to pick it all up from listening, and it is not always easy to draw up an order under those circumstances.

48,164. Then your suggestion is that the system of having the minutes drawn by the parties should be extended?—Yes. I should not like to say that it should be extended to every order, because I think that is quite unnecessary.

48,165. Where the order is simple it is unnecessary?—Yes.

48,166. In simple cases, do you find any delay in getting the order?—No, I do not think so. I have never found any difficulty about getting orders. Several times matters have come up where it has been of great importance to the litigants that the order should be got through at once, and I have never found the least difficulty in an important case of getting it done at once. In fact, on one occasion, I think, it was done within three quarters of an hour of the order being made.

4 March 1915.]

Mr. ROBERT FREDERIC BAYFORD.

48,167. (Mr. Matheson.) I gather from what you say that you think the present third class clerks are of good quality, and that you get the right sort of people?—You get a very good class of men under the present system.

48,168. Apparently, from a study of this list, promotion from that class is very slow. I see that the average time in which third class clerks have been at their present duties is something like eight years. Have you come across any dissatisfaction with that state of things?—That is the only dissatisfaction I have heard—that promotion is not fast enough. It is not a complaint about a particular man being promoted, but that the general class does not move fast enough.

48,169. I notice that the average duration of the third class clerks in the Central Office, in their class at present, is something like four years, while the average in the Probate Registry is something like eight years. Can you explain that at all?—No, I cannot. The two things are quite distinct.

48,170. Do you think, for the work done by the third class clerks, it is necessary to have men of as good a quality as those who are there at present?—Yes.

48,171. Do you think that they are using too good men for that particular work?—That question is a little difficult to answer, and I do not think I can give you any satisfactory answer in regard to it. So far as I can see, the class of man is not too good for the work.

48,172. So far as you have come across them, they seem to be very suitable?—So far as I have come across them, I think the man who is wanted there is there.

48,173. (Mr. Shipley.) I want to ask an historical question, if it is in order. I want to find out why Divorce, Probate, and Admiralty all come into one court. There does not seem to be much in common between them?—The Principal Probate Registry was created by the Court of Probate Act of 1857. The Divorce Registry was created by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, and under a special section of that Act the two registries, Divorce and Probate, were amalgamated; that is not the word used in the Act of Parliament, but that is the effect of it. The district registries were also created by the Act of 1857. Subsequently the three Courts, the Probate Court, the Divorce Court and the Admiralty Court, were made into one division of the High Court of Justice under the Judicature Act.

48,174. I suppose barristers in pleading before those courts specialise; you would not get the same man in an Admiralty case as in a Divorce case?—That is so. I think it necessarily is so, because, apart from the work itself, the two judges are always sitting at the same time, and you cannot be in both places at the same time.

48,175. I thought barristers could sometimes?—When you are practising in a special branch you are expected to be there.

48,176. (Sir John Kempe.) You represent the Bar Council?—Yes.

48,177. You seem to know all about the Probate Court. Is there any function exercised by the Bar Council that gives them an opportunity of knowing more about the Probate Court than about other courts?—No, I do not think so.

48,178. It is merely knowledge picked up?—I think they could only get it from members of the Bar who practice in the particular division.

48,179. I see the prospects of the clerks in the Probate Registry are much better than in any of the other legal offices; that is to say, they are the only office in which there is a prospect of promotion to the end. They can rise to be registrars?—Yes.

48,180. And yet the scales of salary are the same in all the different offices. Is that quite fair? Does not it point to a rather unnecessarily large expenditure on salaries if the same salaries are given where the prospects are good as where they are bad. In one case they stop at 400*l.* or 500*l.* a year, and in the other they can go on to become registrars?—I suppose everybody goes into the particular branch knowing what they can rise to, and that may be possibly one of the reasons why it attracts the class of man that is now obtained for the Probate Registry.

48,181. That rather points towards treating the offices separately, so far as pay goes?—Yes.

48,182. There is one point I ought to have asked Mr. Austen Cartmell. I see he says in the précis of his evidence that there does not appear to the Bar Council to be any particular reason for imposing any age limit for retirement, "except the one reason, if it be a "reason, that after a certain age increasing years "make themselves felt." The whole reason why you make a man retire is because increasing age makes itself felt?—Yes.

48,183. And that is a reason for imposing an age limit and not against it?—Yes.

48,184. The Bar Council deliberately put that forward as their considered opinion?—I have not any knowledge of that particular matter.

48,185. (Miss Haldane.) I gather that you are quite satisfied with the first class clerk who has risen from the third class?—Yes. One of the registrars at the present time was originally a clerk in the Probate Registry.

48,186. He began as a third class clerk?—He began as a third class clerk, and he became registrar after having been senior registrar's clerk.

48,187. You think you get a sufficiently good class of man coming into the third class to rise to the higher posts?—By means of the present system of selection in the registry, the principal registrar practically has the promotion in his hands, although nominally it is in the hands of the President of the division. The President of the division gets the principal registrar to make suggestions to him with regard to promotion, and the principal registrar, with the other registrars, has every opportunity of judging who is the right man to move up. I think the present system of selection, or the result of it, is that you get the best men put in the places most suited to them.

48,188. As a matter of fact, does promotion go mainly by seniority or otherwise?—From the third to the second class it is mainly by seniority. From the second to the first class it is mainly by the fitness of the man to fill the particular post.

48,189. On the whole, you consider the system of gradation a satisfactory one?—Yes.

48,190. (Mr. Coward.) Amongst the clerks of the lower classes you say promotion by seniority always produces the best men. I understood you to say that. Is that what you say?—When I am talking about who are the best men I mean the gradual system of sifting.

48,191. But you do not get the gradual system of sifting?—You have promotion from the third to the second class, and from the second to the first.

48,192. From the third to the second it is a pure question of seniority?—Not absolutely, but principally. If a man is unfitted to be moved up he would not be.

48,193. Did you ever know a case in which a man was unfitted and was not promoted?—I think, if you will ask the senior registrar, you will find there are men who have not been promoted.

48,194. (Chairman.) Are not they men who, by the terms of their appointment, are ineligible for promotion?—I am not sure that that applies to all.

48,195. (Mr. Coward.) There are over 100 clerks in this department?—Yes.

48,196. You practise at the Probate and Divorce Bar, I think?—Yes.

48,197. May I not take it that your experience results from your attending in court and in your own chambers?—Yes, to a great extent.

48,198. Do you really see many of those 100 clerks who are employed there, to form an opinion as to their merits, and the advantage of their promotion by seniority?—I know a good many of them personally.

48,199. You would know those men who sit in court, I suppose?—And others too.

4 March 1915.]

Mr. ROBERT FREDERIC BAYFORD.

48,200. Do you mind telling us how?—They are men I have known for many years. I happened to be at one time in command of a company in the Inns of Court Volunteers, and I had a great many of them in that, so I had a certain amount of intimate knowledge with regard to some of them then.

48,201. Do you judge their qualifications for promotion from what you saw of them in the Inns of Court Volunteers?—I think it gave me a good opportunity of finding out what a man was worth.

48,202. And you think that promotion by seniority is the real test. It is the only place where it is done. At the Bar you do not take seniority as the qualification of genius?—To my mind, the best test of whether it works well is whether the men themselves are satisfied with it there.

48,203. I have nothing more to say if you say that?—Let me add this, if I may, and qualify it to this extent: provided that the work of the particular place is, in fact, done to the satisfaction of the public.

48,204. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) With regard to the original appointment of people to the principal probate registry, do you think that the principle of nomination works much better than the principle of open competition would?—Yes. When I say much better, I mean, I think it works very well now, and I do not think you would improve it by examination.

48,205. Have you any intimate acquaintance with the personnel of any Government office to which men are appointed by competitive examination?—No, I do not think so.

48,206. Then your opinion, in that respect, is necessarily a priori?—Yes.

48,207. At present, one of the registrars holds the office of senior registrar.—Yes.

48,208. With an extra salary for certain administrative duties with regard to the whole office?—I am not sure about the extra salary.

48,209. It is so, according to the statement we have before us. In other departments the man who is the administrative chief of the department is selected, and not appointed purely by seniority. Do you think any harm would result in the department if that principle were adopted here?—No, I do not think so.

48,210. Do you think it would be a good thing if the chief of the office, instead of being merely the oldest registrar, were the registrar selected because of his capabilities?—I do not think you would get any advantage out of that. Of course, there might be a particular case where it would be desirable to have a particular man as senior registrar, but I cannot call to mind any particular quality which would qualify one registrar more than another for the position of senior registrar.

48,211. Then, as far as your experience goes, the man who has occupied the post of senior registrar has been always the man best fitted to hold it? (Lord Mersey.) I do not know how on earth that question can be answered. It seems to me an impossible question. Do you know the qualifications for the post of senior registrar, of all the people in the office? If you do not, I do not see how you can make the comparison. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do you know enough about the organisation of the office to give us any opinion as to whether the office is economically organised from the point of view of there not being too many people for the work?—No, I do not.

48,212. A certain number of persons interested in wills pay personal visits to the office?—Yes, to the Personal Application Department.

48,213. And, of course, of their fortunes you would know nothing?—A very little.

48,214. You do not know, for instance, whether they are habitually kept waiting for a long time?—No, I cannot answer that. I have known one or two people who have gone to the Personal Application Department for the purpose of proving a will and have done so, and so far as they are concerned, in my experience there has been no difficulty.

48,215. The system of nomination works by some particular candidate being recommended to the post?—Yes.

48,216. There is no general notification of such a vacancy—no public notification?—No.

48,217. So that the first thing that happens is that either the future candidate, or somebody else, must have private knowledge of the existence of a vacancy?—Yes, he must obtain the knowledge privately.

48,218. Then he must get somebody to recommend him who is likely to have influence with the person appointing?—Yes.

48,219. Have you ever been concerned in recommending anybody to one of those posts?—Never.

48,220. You therefore do not know what steps have to be taken?—No, I cannot say I do know.

(Lord Mersey.) But you can guess, I suppose.

48,221. (Mr. Boutwood.) When you were answering the Chairman's question as to whether the work of the Probate Registry was done efficiently you said yes, but you put in front of it "on the whole." Was that "on the whole" a reservation?—No, I did not intend it as a reservation, but I intended it to apply as an observation with regard to the whole of the work. I do not mean to say there are not particular things, possibly little minor matters, that cannot every now and then be done, perhaps, a little better than they are. It is not absolutely perfect in everything. I do not wish to say that, but taking it on the whole I think the work is extremely well done.

48,222. Going back to this question of seniority I am not quite certain that I followed your presentation of the case, and perhaps you will tell me if I have got hold of the wrong end of the story. This is the impression it gave me: Where you have the higher sort of administrative and legal work, somewhat exceptional intellectual and moral qualities are of first importance, and anything approaching to a rigid rule of seniority would be absurd, and you have what is called promotion by merit, quite normally. But, on the other hand, in a place like the Probate Registry—and here again I may be wrong, and you will correct me—you have not anything of that kind, and the work does not require qualities of that sort; a man has to deal with forms and practice and precedents?—That is certainly so with regard to the lower branches, but not when you get to the higher branches.

48,223. I am speaking of the lower branches; I am not thinking of the registrars. A man has to deal with forms and practice and precedents, and has to know them very accurately, and use them accurately; but it requires what you may call the average sort of intelligence and character, and beyond that average nothing makes very much difference. In the sense in which merit may be shewn in the higher kind of work, there is not much opportunity for merit, and so, in that rather narrow kind of specialisation seniority is as natural as it should be exceptional in the other. Was that your point of view?—Yes.

Mr. THOMAS JAMES WORLEY, called and examined.

48,224. (Chairman.) You are president of the Solicitors' Managing Clerks Association?—I am.

48,225. That association was formed to protect and advance the interests of solicitors' managing clerks?—It was.

48,226. The members of that association are either managing clerks, or clerks who have been continuously employed in solicitors' offices for a certain period?—They are all managing clerks, and they are mostly unadmitted men.

48,227. Can you tell me exactly what a managing clerk is?—A managing clerk is a man who has the conduct of the business in a solicitor's office, subject to some supervision on the part of his principal, chiefly in matters of policy and expediency, as distinct from details.

48,228. Is there a clear line drawn between managing clerks and the other clerks in a solicitor's office. I mean, at a certain point of his career, is a man appointed definitely to be a managing clerk?—If he has remained in the same office, as I have, for many years, it might be difficult to put one's finger on the precise period when he did become a managing clerk. But if a man obtains employment in a solicitor's office as managing clerk, then his position, as such, is well defined.

4 March 1915.]

MR. THOMAS JAMES WORLEY.

48,229. (Lord Mersey.) Would not you say that there is a managing clerk in every solicitor's office?—No, not in small offices.

48,230. There are some solicitors who do not employ more than a couple of clerks, or perhaps not even two?—Yes.

48,231. Has that solicitor a managing clerk?—Not unless he employs a man who is capable of conducting his business.

48,232. (Chairman.) In a big solicitor's office, is there one managing clerk in each branch?—Yes.

48,233. Is there ever more than one managing clerk in a branch?—My experience of large offices is not very great, but I should say there might easily be more than one managing clerk in each branch.

48,234. If the business in a branch was very large, a solicitor might employ two managing clerks in each branch?—I think so.

48,235. (Lord Mersey.) Take Messrs. Ashurst, Morris and Co., have not they several managing clerks?—They have.

48,236. They have one in their bankruptcy department, for instance?—I should say they have. (Mr. Coward.) Certainly they would have a managing clerk in each one of the departments, but I do not think you would ever see more than one managing clerk in each department.

48,237. (Lord Mersey.) But if there are many departments, then there are several managing clerks?—Yes.

48,238. (Chairman.) How many members have you in your association?—About 140.

48,239. Is that a large proportion of the whole body of solicitors' managing clerks?—No.

48,240-245. Can you estimate what the total number would be?—I cannot.

48,246. Your association cannot be said to be a representative one?—It is not representative in regard to numbers, but I submit it is representative in regard to the character of the men who are members of it.

48,247-251. What exactly do you mean by that?—I mean that our members are representative of solicitors' managing clerks as a whole in regard to their capabilities, their terms of service and general experience in a solicitor's office.

48,252. The council of your association consists of managing clerks who have had large experience in one branch or another of the Supreme Court?—That is so.

48,253. What has been your own experience?—My experience has been, that I have been managing clerk to Messrs. Minchin, Garrett and Co., solicitors, or their predecessors, for about 15 years, and I have been in their service since the year 1886.

48,254. In which branches has your own work lain?—My work has been the general work in a solicitor's office without making a speciality of any branch, except, perhaps, that I may lay claim to having done more conveyancing and Chancery work than any other.

48,255. Then you have had experience in the King's Bench offices as well as in the Chancery offices?—Some experience, but not very great.

48,256. You have had more experience in Chancery?—Yes.

48,257. You wish to make some representations to the Commission on the subject of the method of appointment of clerks in the legal offices? Will you explain, generally, what your views are on that point?—The subject of appointments in the various legal offices has from time to time been considered by the council of the association, and in the years 1900, 1906, and 1909 petitions were presented to the Lord Chancellor on that subject. The last petition pointed out in effect that the efficient transaction of the business in the chambers and offices of the Supreme Court, the Land Registry, and other legal offices depends to a large extent upon the ability of the clerks in such chambers and offices and their technical knowledge of law and practice, and that, unless such knowledge has been acquired before their appointment or promotion, difficulty, delay, and inconvenience is caused to practitioners, as well as delay and expense to the public. On the 10th June 1909 Mr. A. Crane, the then president of the association, gave evidence before the Royal Commission on the Land Transfer Acts in support of the contention, which has been unanimously and continuously advanced by the association, that appointments to the legal offices should be thrown open to qualified and experienced solicitors' managing clerks. A great deal of the practical work which is attended to in chambers and legal offices cannot be learned from text books, but must be acquired by actual experience and practice.

48,258. Then your suggestion is, that for the clerkships in the legal departments previous experience as a solicitors' managing clerk is necessary?—I do submit that.

48,259. Does that suggestion apply to all the offices equally?—Yes, speaking broadly, it does.

48,260. Would you apply it to the King's Bench Offices—to the Central Office—as well as to the Chancery Office?—I would.

48,261. Would you apply it also to the Principal Probate Registry?—Yes, I would.

48,262. We have had it in evidence from a witness this afternoon, who was acquainted with the work in the Probate Registry, that previous legal experience and knowledge was not in his opinion necessary for the clerks appointed to the Probate Registry, and that they could learn their work perfectly well in the registry. What do you say to that?—I would say that in any legal office a man who comes to the office with a practical knowledge of law and practice is likely to fulfil the duties of that office to the greater satisfaction of his immediate principals and the public than a man who has not had practical experience of those matters in a solicitor's office.

48,263. Are you familiar with the work done in the Principal Probate Registry?—I cannot profess to be closely acquainted with that work. I would prefer some one who is a specialist in that work to express an opinion.

48,264. But you are familiar with the work of the Central Office of the Supreme Court?—I think I may claim to be, but as I have already pointed out, I have not the same experience of the Central Office work as I have of the Chancery work.

48,265. Do you consider that the work of a third class clerk in the Central Office is work that is difficult to learn?—Not difficult to learn, I would say, but much more easily learnt if one had knowledge of law and practice.

48,266. Taking the Filing Department, you are acquainted with the work which is done there?—Yes.

48,267. It chiefly consists of the reception and filing of affidavits?—Yes.

48,268. How long would it take an intelligent man with no previous legal experience to learn the work that a third class clerk has to do in that department?—I should think in six months he would have acquired practical knowledge.

48,269. Do not you think he could learn it in a week?—I should not think so.

48,270. What is the difficulty that he could not master in a week?—There must be a great number of documents filed which are separately filed, or which require to be specially dealt with, which he could only know of by practical experience.

48,271. He has no concern, has he, with the substance of the affidavit or the matter which it contains?—Subject to knowing which was Common Law or which was Chancery—that is the only distinction for the moment which occurs to me.

48,272. That would be apparent from the heading of the document?—Yes.

48,273. It would not take very long to learn that?—No, not as regards the class of affidavit.

48,274. Would five minutes be enough in which to learn that?—Yes, it would.

48,275. Would it not be true to say, generally, that the work of the Central Office consists to a large extent of work which is simple in character, and which does not require any legal experience or knowledge to perform it satisfactorily?—That is so.*

48,276. There is also, no doubt, some of the more important work which does require some knowledge?—Yes, and it is with regard to that work that I wish to make representations to the Commission.

48,277. Is it your suggestion that the higher classes should be open to the direct appointment of solicitors' managing clerks?—It is. I should like to say here that the association, of which I have the honour to be president, contends that the duties of the clerks in the chambers and the offices of the courts, the Land Registry, Public Trustee, etc. (and particularly of the first and second class clerks in the Chancery Division), are such as to necessitate a general knowledge of law and an intimate acquaintance with practice and procedure, which can only be acquired by those who have had practical experience in the management and conduct of proceedings and legal business in solicitors' offices, who are cognisant with the many questions which arise from day to day, and that therefore the applicants for these clerkships should, as a condition of their appointment, be able to prove their practical training and experience in the particular business which they will have to attend to if appointed.

48,278. You speak there particularly of the Chancery Division. In that division the work is of a more technical and difficult character than in the Common Law Offices?—Yes, but I also include the Land Registry, and, if I may, the Public Trustee—I am not quite certain if I am in order in referring to the Public Trustee—and the Taxing Office.

48,279. Your suggestions apply more particularly to those offices where the work is of a more complicated, technical, and difficult character?—Yes.

48,280. At present the practice is to make appointments almost exclusively to the third class and to fill the higher classes from the third class?—I understand that that is so, and my source of knowledge is a memorandum which is headed, "Clerkships, Royal Courts of Justice. For the information of persons 'applying to the Lord Chancellor.'" May I hand it in (handing in the same). I would call attention, if I may, to the fact that, although that is dated January 1902, I was informed at the House of Lords on the 25th February that the conditions stated in such memorandum still hold good.

48,281. This memorandum contains the statement that, except in certain cases, all appointments are made in the first instance to the third class?—Yes. It also states among other things that the clerks in the Chancery Division are appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and clerks in the Central Office are appointed by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls in rotation. It is also stated in the memorandum that, "any person desiring to 'apply to the Lord Chancellor for a clerkship in his 'Lordship's gift should address his Lordship's private 'Secretary'; that, 'should the Lord Chancellor 'approve the name of an applicant it is noted,' and that 'no promise of a nomination can be made as the 'number of well accredited applicants is very large.'" I would like to point out in connection with my representation of solicitors' managing clerks that the salary of a third class clerk, according to that memorandum, commences at 100*l.* and rises to 200*l.*

48,282. Then your suggestion is that that practice or rule of appointing always to the third class in the first instance should not be maintained, but that appointments should be made direct to the second or first class, and that solicitors' managing clerks should be specially considered for such appointments?—That is my submission.

48,283. At what age do you suggest that those appointments would most suitably be made?—I had intended to suggest, if given the opportunity, a maximum age limit of 45 years; but, on consideration, I would suggest 50 years, considering that the length of experience of a managing clerk renders his service additionally valuable. If it should be considered that such a high age limit as 50 years would work unfairly in regard to the pension system, then perhaps it could be arranged that all men appointed over a certain age should agree, on their appointment, either to reduce their claim to a pension or, perhaps, not to claim pension. I do not know the working of the pension system, and therefore I merely offer that as a tentative suggestion in case it was felt that by suggesting a high age limit unfairness would result with regard to the pension system.

48,284. Without going into the details of the pension system, you are, no doubt, aware that the grant of the pension depends on the number of years' service?—I understand that that is the case.

48,285. So if a man is appointed at a rather advanced age, the number of years he can serve would be comparatively few, and the pension he could earn would be small?—I understand so.

48,286. From that point of view, the pension system would not work satisfactorily with a system of appointments at a rather advanced age?—No.

48,287. But you think that the experience that a solicitor's clerk acquires would be so much more valuable at the age of 50 than, say, at the age of 35, that it is desirable to have men at the higher age?—I do most strongly submit that. It is between the ages of 35 and 50 that a solicitor's managing clerk enters upon the more responsible duties. He has by that time wider experience, and his principals rely upon him more.

48,288. Do you consider that the salary of the second class would be attractive to men of that standing as managing clerks? The salary is 250*l.* rising by 15*l.* a year to 400*l.*, with a prospect of promotion to the first class, the salary of which is from 500*l.* to 600*l.*?—Speaking for myself, I do consider that that would be, to a certain extent, attractive. The fixity of tenure, subject to good conduct and ability, would be such as to induce a man to take a somewhat smaller salary than he might be disposed to take in private employment.

48,289. (Lord Mersey.) And the prospect of a pension?—And the prospect of a pension, if that could be arranged.

48,290. (Chairman.) Do managing clerks in private solicitors' employment generally receive pensions when they retire?—I have heard of cases. I should not think that that is usual.

48,291. In your experience, it would be rather the exception than the rule?—It would.

48,292. Is there any voluntary pension system or society amongst solicitors' clerks?—There is a society called The United Law Clerks' Society, which has a superannuation fund.

48,293. Do you belong to that fund?—I do not. You cannot join that society when you are more than 40 years of age.

48,294. It did not occur to you to join it before you were 40 years of age?—No.

48,295. Do many solicitors' clerks belong to it?—I believe a great number, but I do not know the details.

48,296. (Mr. Holt.) Your suggestion is, that in the legal offices, and particularly in the Chancery offices, solicitors' managing clerks who have had experience in that branch of the law should be considered eligible, and should be appointed to the second class, and possibly even to the first class, of clerks. Do you suggest that that should be the exclusive source of recruitment for the higher classes, or would you have concurrent promotion from the third class?—That is a difficult question for me to answer. I would say that solicitors' managing clerks, as a class, by reason of their training and their experience in conducting matters which are dealt with in chambers and offices of the Supreme Court, Land Registry, Public Trustee, Taxing Office, etc., are peculiarly fitted to fill the posts of clerks in such chambers and offices, and that those posts would be more adequately filled by solicitors' managing clerks. If it were considered desirable that third class clerks should have the opportunity of promotion to the second class, then I would respectfully submit that, as a condition of such promotion, the candidate should be able to satisfy the judge or chief official that he is fully qualified to perform the duties of a second class clerk. I refer to the judge or other official, because I understand that in past years it was the custom of judges to appoint their clerks from among solicitors' managing clerks, but that that custom has not been followed lately and the claims of solicitors' managing clerks have been ignored. I do submit that a solicitor's managing clerk, in nine cases out of ten, would be more fitted to fill the duties of a first or second class clerk than a man promoted from the third class, because he would have had that previous practical knowledge of which I have spoken. In making that statement I wish it to be quite clearly understood that I do not make any reflection at all on the gentlemen who at present hold the appointments. I am rather addressing myself to the upholding of the principle that the men best fitted to fill these posts are those whose business it is to appear in them and conduct the matters there dealt with, and those men are solicitors' managing clerks.

48,297. Have you in practice found any want of efficiency on the part of the first and second class clerks appointed under the present system?—I cannot say I personally have. All I say is, that I personally believe that solicitors' managing clerks would be able to fulfil these duties even more adequately than the gentlemen appointed under the present system.

48,298. In fact the present men are efficient, but if they had been solicitors' managing clerks they would have been still more efficient. That is what it comes to?—If I may so put it.

48,299. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You say that solicitors' managing clerks should not be compelled to obtain a Civil Service certificate if they satisfy a master, registrar, or other chief official that they possess the necessary technical knowledge. You know the existing conditions under which certificates are granted to clerks in Government offices?—I do not know the conditions, but I understand that a Civil Service test is imposed.

48,300. There is a very elementary examination. Do you desire that that should be done away with?—Yes, I do; not because of the difficulty or simplicity of the examination, but because I say that that is not a test of the capability of a man to fulfil the duties for which he is appointed.

48,301. There is a medical examination. Do you desire to retain that?—It is a matter I have not thought about, but I cannot see any reason why the medical examination should be retained.

48,302. There is an inquiry into character. Would you retain that?—Certainly. May I add this: I would, on behalf of the solicitors' managing clerks, respectfully submit that as it has become a recognised custom for barristers to be appointed judges and for solicitors to be appointed masters, solicitors' clerks should receive specially favourable consideration in the appointment of clerks to masters, including taxing masters, more especially as they are, it is submitted, more competent than others to fill such clerkships and also the various other clerkships which from time to time fall vacant in the Supreme Court, the Land Registry, Public Trustee, and other departments. At present solicitors' clerks after a period of intelligent and arduous service find themselves without any prospect of bettering their position, though possessed of the necessary qualifications.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETEENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 10th March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Senior Master in Lunacy), called and examined.

Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL PRICHARD, chief clerk, was in attendance.

48,303. (Chairman.) Mr. Theobald, you are Senior Master in Lunacy?—I am.

48,304. How long have you held that post?—Since 1907.

48,305. And before that you were a barrister?—Yes, I was at the Bar—the Chancery Bar.

48,306. You have been good enough to give us a précis of your evidence, in which you deal first with the history of the Lunacy Office?—Yes.

48,307. I think it will be convenient if the first part of your statement is put upon the notes as it stands, as giving a history of the Lunacy Department in the past?—If you please.

BRIEF HISTORY OF LUNACY OFFICE.

History up to 1845.

The care and custody of the persons and estates of lunatics is a prerogative of the Crown. After the abolition of the Court of Wards in the reign of Charles II. the prerogative was exercised through the Lord Chancellor. This he did, not by virtue of his office, but the care and commitment of the persons and estates of lunatics was entrusted to him by Letters Patent under the Sign Manual. In course of time it became customary to include in the Commission the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices, and they and the Lord Chancellor now perform the duties of what the Lunacy Act 1890 calls the "Judge in Lunacy."

The jurisdiction over lunatics committed to the Lord Chancellor was exercised by him in his Court of Chancery. The administrative duties were carried out by the Chancery officials, and the Chancery procedure was applied. Before 1845 the principal officers of the Court of Chancery were masters in ordinary in Chancery, who were barristers.

The preliminary to the jurisdiction of the Crown over lunatics was an inquisition before a jury establishing the lunacy. These inquisitions were held by Commissioners specially appointed for the purpose in each case, who had to be paid special fees. In 1842, in order to diminish the expense of these inquisitions, an Act was passed constituting two "Commissioners of Lunatics" to hold inquisitions.

Creation of Masters in Lunacy, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 100.

In 1845, in the time of Lord Lyndhurst, the union of Lunacy with Chancery was found unsatisfactory. The administration of Lunacy was transferred from Chancery to the two "Commissioners of Lunatics," who now became Masters in Lunacy.

The masters in Chancery were abolished a long time ago, and were succeeded by chief clerks with a salary of 1,500*l.* a year, who were always solicitors and not barristers, and those chief clerks are now known as masters in Chancery. But the masters in Lunacy have remained unaltered in title, qualifications, and salary (2,000*l.* a year) ever since, though their duties have greatly altered.

Rules in Lunacy, 1883.

The Chancery practice was entirely reformed under the Judicature Acts, the first of which was passed in 1873. But Lunacy remained unreformed until the year 1883, when Lord Selborne made new rules bringing the Lunacy practice into accordance with the reformed Chancery practice. This was a great improvement, but much more extensive reforms were desirable, which have not to this day been made.

Lunacy Burdened with Chancery Procedure.

When Lunacy was separated from Chancery it took with it the Chancery traditions. Chancery practice was suited for litigation between parties. It settled and affected rights which required a strict legal procedure. Lunacy is protective, paternal, administrative. It does not affect rights or decide questions between parties. There are no parties except the lunatic. But Lunacy, by adopting the Chancery practice, adopted the forms of litigation without its substance, except the substantial costs of Chancery procedure. A good deal has been done to mitigate this evil, but much remains to be done.

Position of Masters before 1891.

Before 1891 the masters in Lunacy stood to the judge in Lunacy very much in the same position in which the old masters in ordinary in Chancery stood to the Lord Chancellor or the present masters in Chancery stand to the Chancery judges. The masters in Lunacy had no power to make orders. They prepared reports based upon statements left by the solicitor and founded upon affidavits. These reports contained consequential directions and were laid before the judge, who made orders upon them. The masters did the clerical work of the office with the assistance of clerks. But they did not take the accounts, which were done by the chief clerk. They also held inquisitions, which involved a considerable amount of travelling all over England.

Decay of Inquisitions, Growth of Jurisdiction over Lunatics not so found by Inquisition.

Before 1890 nearly all the cases in the Masters' Office were cases of lunatics so found by inquisition. An Act of 1862 gave the judge in Lunacy powers of administration without inquisition in cases where the property was under 2,000*l.* or the income under 100*l.* a year, but the Act was not much used. An Act of 1889, repealed and re-enacted by the Consolidation Act of 1890, gave the judge in Lunacy powers of administration over the property of persons who, without being insane, were from old age and illness unable to manage their affairs. The power to hold inquisitions has not been taken away, but the result of the legislation of 1889 was in great measure to supersede it, inasmuch as the judge has, with some exceptions, all the powers in the case of a lunatic not so found which he has in that of a lunatic so found by inquisition. Inquisitions have in consequence greatly diminished. In the year 1914 only three inquisitions were held, and the average for the last 10 years has been 12. In the year 1890 there were 1,209 lunatics so found by inquisition, and no others under the jurisdiction of the judge in Lunacy. At the end of the year 1914 there were 436 lunatics so found by inquisition, and 4,527 lunatics not so found by inquisition under that jurisdiction.

Conversion of Masters into Judges in Lunacy.

Until 1891 the masters in Lunacy were superior clerks. They ascertained facts and prepared certificates. They settled orders drafted by their clerks, but all orders were made by the judge. The Lunacy Act 1891 (Sec. 27) made the jurisdiction of the judge in Lunacy as regards administration and management exercisable by the masters subject to appeal to the judge. Since the passing of that section the masters have, in effect, become the "Judge in Lunacy." The original jurisdiction of the judge remains, but it is hardly ever exercised, and the whole administrative work is now performed by the masters. Appeals to the judge are not very frequent, since the matters dealt with are mostly matters of discretion. During the year 1914 there were four appeals.

48,308. That takes the history of the department up to the year 1890?—Yes.

48,309. Since that time, have there been various proposals for reform of the existing arrangements?—Yes; there have been several.

48,310. It has been suggested that the Lunacy Department should be absorbed in the Chancery Division?—Yes; that was in the time of Lord Loreburn, or rather before that. I think there was a Commission that sat on the Feeble Minded which went into that question, and recommended that Lunacy and Chancery should be amalgamated.

48,311. Their recommendation was, I think, that the administrative part of the work done by the Lunacy masters should be transferred to the Chancery Division?—Yes.

48,312. And that the Chancery visitors should be fused with the Lunacy Commission as it was then called, the Board of Control as it is now called?—That is so.

48,313. Did the Lord Chancellor after that appoint a committee to consider the question further?—Yes; he appointed a committee, of which the present Master of the Rolls was chairman. The Master of the Rolls had been the principal witness before the Parliamentary Commission, and had advocated the transfer of Lunacy to Chancery; but when he came to look into it with his own committee he arrived at a directly opposite conclusion.

48,314. That committee recommended that the transfer to Chancery should not take place?—Yes.

48,315. And the report of that committee has been considered hitherto as conclusive on that point?—I think so, at any rate for the present.

48,316. In your opinion, is it conclusive?—Yes, I think it would be a great misfortune if the two departments were amalgamated. Lunacy is now suffering from the old union, and what you want to do is, not to unite them, but to separate them as much as you can, to free Lunacy from the old traditions of Chancery litigation, and so on, and Chancery practice, which is a very expensive procedure. You want to get as cheap a procedure as you can.

48,317. It is also the case, is it not, that the Lunacy Act of 1890 contained a section giving power to the Lord Chancellor to rearrange the Lunacy Departments?—Yes, to amalgamate the three departments of the Visitors, the Masters, and the Lunacy Commissioners, as they were then.

48,318. Or to amalgamate either the masters or the visitors with the Lunacy Commissioners?—Yes.

48,319. Have proposals ever been made for exercising that power?—Yes; Lord Loreburn had a scheme prepared to unite the three departments, but it came to nothing, because, on a critical examination of the section, some doubt was felt as to whether the Lord Chancellor had full power to do what he wanted.

48,320. (Lord Mersey.) Can you tell me whether the scheme was Lord Loreburn's or Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie's scheme?—Well, perhaps it was the scheme of both, I should say. I think they were entirely in accord about it, so far as I remember. I saw the Lord Chancellor frequently upon it, and he was very much in favour of the scheme. It originated, I think, in all probability, with Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie; he PRICHARD was in attendance).

probably first put it forward; but Lord Loreburn was quite in sympathy with it.

48,321. (Chairman.) Was the scheme you are speaking of formulated before or after the Report of the Commission on the Feeble Minded?—It was afterwards, I think.

48,322. There was also more recently legislation on the subject?—Yes; the Mental Deficiency Act, you mean.

48,323. The Act of 1913?—Yes.

48,324. That Act, when originally introduced in 1912, contained a clause providing for the amalgamation of the departments?—I do not know that. I never saw that Bill, so I cannot say what it contained. I did not hear that either; it may be the fact all the same.

48,325. The Bill introduced in 1913 and passed did not contain that clause?—No; I believe not.

48,326. We may take it that Parliament, having before them the Report of the Commission of 1908, and having been seised of the question by the clause in the Bill of 1912, passed legislation in 1913 without effecting this amalgamation?—Yes; that is so.

48,327. So that we may consider it as a question which has been decided by Parliament very recently?—Yes; I suppose that is so. I do not know whether the question of amalgamation was ever considered by Parliament separately and apart as an independent point; it may have been.

48,328. At any rate Parliament legislated on the subject and did not deal with the point?—Yes, that is so. I think that is the situation.

48,329. I think it may be convenient to the Commission at this point to get some information from you as to the exact scope of the operations of the different bodies we have been mentioning. Will you tell us briefly what are the functions of the three bodies, and how they differ?—If I may take the masters first, their duty is to administer the estates of persons of unsound mind, I mean by that the property; their duty is to deal with property, not primarily with persons at all.

48,330. Do all lunatics with property come under the review of the masters?—No, only those who are brought under the jurisdiction of the masters by application. There must be very large numbers of lunatics all over the country whose property is administered otherwise.

48,331. Supposing that the Board of Control in the course of the execution of their duty find that a certain lunatic has property which is not being properly administered, do they bring that case to your notice?—No, they would bring it to the notice of the Lord Chancellor; they send in a letter to the Lord Chancellor saying that, in their opinion, such and such property is not being properly administered, and he then sends the letter to us, and upon it action is taken and a receiver is appointed. But of course those cases are very rare, because the Board of Control have no power of inquiry or investigation. Things may come to their notice, but ordinarily they do not. It is very rarely indeed that it happens—perhaps there may be one or two cases in the course of a year.

48,332. To what do the operations of the Board of Control relate?—They relate to visiting asylums and seeing to the personal care of the patients. They have nothing to do with property at all, and know nothing about property as a rule.

48,333. Is the number of lunatics with property a small proportion of the whole?—Well, of course that is quite unknown; you cannot say how many have property. I believe there are 133,000 lunatics, and in our office we have 5,000; but it is impossible to suppose that there must not be a very much larger number with property; you cannot think that 5,000 lunatics are all the lunatics that possess property in England.

48,334. 5,000 is the number that is under the care of the masters?—They are dealt with by us; that includes lunatics so found by inquisition and lunatics not so found by inquisition; but there must, I should think, be a large number with property, who never come under our jurisdiction at all. Very often it is possible to administer the estate of a lunatic through trustees, as he may be only a life tenant, and he may have property of that sort.

48,335. (Mr. Coward.) You get a committee appointed under the Act?—A committee is appointed in case of an inquisition. You must first have an inquisition, and then, when you have got an inquisition, you appoint a committee.

48,336. (Chairman.) You have mentioned lunatics so found by inquisition. That is the old form of proceeding for finding a person to be a lunatic, I think?—Yes.

48,337. Is the use of that method practically dying out now?—Yes, it has very much died out. In 1890, I think, there were a few over 1,200 cases of lunatics so found by inquisition; now there are 430, I think, in round figures; so that they have very greatly diminished, and I believe during last year there were only three inquisitions held.

48,338. That form of inquiry is dying a natural death?—Yes, I think it is.

48,339. Then what is the other method of finding a person to be a lunatic?—So far as the masters are concerned, the lunacy has to be proved before them by medical evidence. What happens as a rule is this: a relative presents a petition to a justice of the peace for a reception order, as it is called, that is to say, an order to take care of the lunatic, to place him under care and treatment, and that petition is supported by two medical certificates. A justice of the peace then considers the matter, and makes an order or not as he thinks fit; that is called a reception order. The masters have nothing to do with that. Upon that reception order the lunatic is put under care, he goes to an asylum, or a licensed house, or a hospital, or he may be placed as a single patient. Then if he has property a summons is taken out before the masters to apply that property to the maintenance of the patient, and in order to get an order from the master you have to satisfy him that the lunatic is a lunatic.

48,340. Would the certificate of a justice of the peace placing a patient under control be sufficient evidence for the master?—It is not generally accepted alone as enough; we generally require medical evidence as well, generally the affidavit of a doctor.

48,341. (Lord Mersey.) I understood you to say that the certificate of a justice of the peace was based upon medical evidence?—An order made by a justice of the peace is enough to place the lunatic under care and treatment.

48,342. That order is not made except upon medical evidence?—No, on the certificates of two medical men.

48,343. Then do the masters require other medical evidence?—They generally require one affidavit to prove that the person is actually lunatic at the time. There may be a question of dates; you do not get this immediately, and we generally require a medical affidavit.

48,344. (Mr. Boutwood.) An independent one, or will one of the two suffice?—It is generally an independent one.

48,345. (Chairman.) Besides those two cases, lunatics so found by inquisition, and other lunatics whose property is brought under the care of the masters as the result of an application, have you also the care of the property of persons who are not lunatics, but who through age or infirmity are unable to attend to their affairs?—Yes; that was introduced by the Act of 1889, by a special clause introduced to enable that to be done.

48,346. Do those three classes cover the whole of the persons who come under your care?—Yes.

48,347. What are the relative numbers of those classes? You told us the number of lunatics so found by inquisition?—436.

48,348. And the total number of persons under your care is about 5,000?—Just under 5,000.

48,349. Then of the 4,500 or rather more who are not lunatics so found by inquisition, how many are lunatics and how many are persons unable to attend to their affairs?—I am afraid we cannot tell that; they are not a very large class, I think—those we call the D cases.

48,350. The majority will be lunatics?—Yes, the great majority. I should think, certainly, not more than 10 per cent. would be persons enfeebled by old age or disease.

10 March 1915.] Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,351. (Lord Mersey.) That would be about 500?—I should think that probably would be somewhere near the right figure.

48,352. (Chairman.) That would be 436 lunatics so found by inquisition, 500 persons not lunatics but incapable of attending to their affairs, and the remaining 4,000 or so lunatics certificated by justices of the peace, whose property as the result of application was brought under the masters?—Yes, but it is not quite accurate to say that those 4,000 would be all certificated by a justice of the peace, inasmuch as many of them are not certified at all; they are people of small property who live at home and are lunatics, but are not so certified—harmless people, idiots, would be among that class, not always certified.

48,353. Then a person may be a lunatic so far as regards the masters having the care of his property, but not a certified lunatic as regards the charge of his person?—Yes, certainly.

48,354. The work of the masters is mainly the administration of the estates of these 5,000 persons, and the task of seeing that their property is applied in a suitable manner to their interests?—Yes.

48,355. Besides that, there is the holding of inquisitions, which has practically died out?—Yes.

48,356. Does that cover the whole of the work, or are there any other branches?—No, I think that is everything, if you include, of course, in administration that they have to hear summonses and have to settle a large number of deeds and to consider accounts. Those are the principal heads under which it falls; but it is all really included under the large head of administration. They may have to carry on businesses of all kinds, and to deal with investments of infinite variety; there is hardly anything that may not come under the master's purview.

48,357. In fact, any business that was carried on by the patient, or in which he was interested, may come under the master's control and review?—Exactly.

48,358. Now will you tell us what the functions of the visitors are?—The visitors, of course, were originally created with a view to visit the lunatics so found by inquisition, whom they had to visit by statute twice a year; but those persons have very much diminished in number, and if the visitors only had to visit them, their occupation would be very much diminished indeed; I do not think they would have enough to do. But there is also power under the Act to ask them to visit persons who are alleged to be lunatics; and under that power they have been asked to visit a certain number of persons not lunatics so found by inquisition. In fact, it is quite essential that there should be that power, because in many cases it is absolutely necessary that one should be able to send somebody to see what is going on, and to look into the case, and consider whether the patient is really a lunatic, and so on. But those cases are not very numerous as regards the visitors, because we can get information in other ways. I think that 100 lunatics, not so found by inquisition, have been put on the visitors' permanent list, as they call it, and those they visit twice a year; and then, besides that, last year, I think, they made, on our request, something under 300 visits—about 270; I have not got the exact figure in my mind.

48,359. Those are special visits made at the request of the masters?—At the request of the masters.

48,360. Do they make special visits and reports under the instructions of the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, whenever he asks them to do so. I should think that does not happen very often, but it does happen. Then all the reports on the lunatics so found by inquisition go to the Lord Chancellor; the masters never see them. The other reports, the reports made upon their own request, the masters do see; and those also go to the Lord Chancellor.

48,361. Is there a report made on every visit?—Yes.

48,362. The reports on lunatics so found by inquisition do not come to the masters?—They do not. The masters, of course, can see them, if they ask for them.

48,363. Although the masters are administering the property?—Yes; but we can ask for them, and if we want to know anything about lunatics so found by inquisition, we can always go and inquire. But they do not as a matter of course come to us.

48,364. Is not that somewhat anomalous?—I think it is decidedly so, but I do not know that any harm results from it.

48,365. Do you see any reason for it?—Well, I suppose it goes back to the old days when things were managed on rather different lines. The masters in those days were not persons much more than clerks, and there would have been no reason for sending the reports to them then, because they could not do anything upon them. Now, of course, they can act upon them, and do what is necessary. That, I think, is the historical reason for it.

48,366. As I understand your historical sketch, the masters have in their process of development taken the place of the Lord Chancellor as it was originally, and the judges in Lunacy as it was afterwards, for practically all purposes?—That is so; the masters having formerly been a sort of superior clerks to the judge have now become the judge in Lunacy and the judge in Lunacy has become a court of appeal from the masters.

48,367. And appeals are very rare?—Yes, I think they are. The matters are not generally matters that are capable of being appealed; they are very largely matters of discretion, where, unless you exercise your discretion very wrongly, it is very difficult to appeal. I think there have been four appeals last year, and there were nine appeals in the previous year, but they never were very numerous.

48,368. (Lord Mersey.) And how many of the four succeeded?—I believe three did.

48,369. (Chairman.) The method of dealing with reports has not followed the process of evolution that has been applied to the office in general?—No.

48,370. What are the functions of the Commissioners as they were, the Board of Control as they are now?—Their function, as I understand it, is to visit all institutions for lunatics, asylums, licensed houses, hospitals, and also lunatics kept as single patients—to visit the places and see that they are properly kept, that proper books are kept, that the law is obeyed, and so on; that is their function.

48,371. And that function applies to a very large number of lunatics, some 130,000, throughout England and Wales?—Yes, and of course the large mass of lunatics under the masters' jurisdiction who may be subject to visitation by the visitors on request are in asylums or licensed houses, and therefore they are also visited by the Board of Control, so that there is very great overlapping.

48,372. Does that apply to lunatics so found by inquisition as well as to certified lunatics. If a lunatic so found by inquisition is in an asylum is he visited by the Board of Control?—I am told that a lunatic so found by inquisition even in an asylum is exempt from visitation by the Board of Control.

48,373. (Mr. Boutwood.) Does the Board of Control inspect merely the institution, or does it examine the individual; does it inquire into his lunacy as well as inquire into his care and treatment?—I think they do both; they not only inquire into the administration, but they see every patient, or are supposed to see every patient, but it must be a very casual seeing.

48,374. (Lord Mersey.) Could you give us an example of the overlapping which you say takes place?—One of my patients may be in a licensed house, say, which is visited by the Board of Control. I have no relation with the Board of Control at all; I know nothing about them, and they know nothing about me; therefore, if I want to know how this patient is going on, I have to ask one of the Chancery visitors to go and see him, although he has already been visited by the Board of Control and they know all about him. That is an instance of overlapping.

48,375. You cannot ask the Board of Control to examine the case and report to you?—Theoretically not, but no doubt in practice if I ever do ask them to give me information they are always most obliging and willing to do anything they can; but they do not go to see the patient in the same spirit as my visitors go; they know nothing about his property.

PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,376. Would you call that overlapping?—Yes, I think so, because if a member of the Board of Control had the proper information he would by his visit be able to tell me exactly how things stand.

48,377. But he has not the information?—But he ought to have it.

48,378. The information that you would get from him would not be satisfactory to you?—No, certainly not, unless he knew what I want to know. But then if the offices were united, of course he would have all the information that I have, and his visit would therefore not be what you may call a sort of partial visit that does not go really to the root of the matter.

48,379. Then is it your suggestion that the Board of Control should be provided with the information about the estate of a lunatic which you possess?—I do not think I should suggest that, as things stand now, because that probably would be imposing upon them duties which they would not care about; but if you could amalgamate the three departments, the difficulty would disappear at once.

48,380. As I understand, it has already been decided that there should not be such amalgamation?—That is so.

48,381. (Chairman.) Coming now to the question of the appointment of masters, how are they appointed?—The masters are appointed by the Lord Chancellor.

48,382. Is there a statutory qualification?—Yes, a barrister of 10 years' standing.

48,383. The salary of each master is 2,000*l.* a year?—Yes.

48,384. And that has been the salary for a very long time?—Yes, ever since the very first appointment, I believe.

48,385. What is the establishment of the office; how many clerks are there?—There are 19 clerks altogether. Two of those are devoted to the taxing part of the business.

48,386. There is one chief clerk?—Yes; and putting aside the taxing part of the business, there are six first class clerks or principal clerks.

48,387. Taking the total number, there are seven first class clerks, eight second class clerks, and three third class clerks?—Yes.

48,388. And out of that number one first class clerk and one second class clerk are specially employed in taxing work?—Yes.

48,389. The salary of the chief clerk is 800*l.* a year?—Yes.

48,390. And for the first, second, and third class clerks the scale is the usual scale for the other legal offices?—Yes, I think so.

48,391. In practice, are appointments always made to the third class, or are direct appointments ever made to the first and second classes?—Usually appointments are made to the third class, but there have been cases where the appointments have been made to the second class. I know of one appointment made direct to a second class clerkship, but, as a rule, they begin in the third class.

48,392. (Mr. Boutwood.) How long ago was that one case that you know of?—In 1894.

48,393. (Chairman.) Was that because there was no sufficiently qualified person in the third class?—I suppose it was. He was appointed by Mr. Maclean; he had in view a specially competent gentleman, whom he thought very useful, I suppose, and he appointed him to the second class, on the understanding that he was to become a first class clerk on the next vacancy. He is now a first class clerk, and a very valuable official, too.

48,394. By whom are the clerks appointed?—By the masters, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor.

48,395. The system differs from the system in the other legal departments where the appointments are made by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, it does in that respect.

48,396. As between the two masters, how are appointments made; are they made by the two jointly?—No, they take it alternately, but they have to agree, or at any rate they are expected to agree, in any appointment that is recommended to the Lord Chancellor.

48,397. In your opinion does that system work satisfactorily?—I think it has worked satisfactorily in the past. The office is composed on the whole, I think, of very good men. A large majority of them, I think, are public school men; there are five university men among them, and there are, I think, four barristers and four solicitors, so that they are a fairly competent set of men.

48,398. Has the chief clerk general duties connected with organisation and discipline as well as with the actual work of the office?—He has the general superintendence of the subordinate clerks, and he has to see that the attendances are properly kept; he keeps a book of the absences, and he knows when anybody is ill, and so on. They have to apply to him if they want to be away, and, of course, he acts, so to speak, as an intermediary between the two sides.

48,399. By the two sides, do you mean the visitors and the masters?—No, between the two masters, because each master has a separate staff attached to him.

48,400. What are the office hours?—From 10 to 4.

48,401. Is that all the year round?—No, not in the vacation. During the Long Vacation the attendance is only from 11 to 1, and, of course, then only a small part of the staff attends, two clerks in the vacation.

48,402. Does that apply also to the Christmas and Easter Vacations?—Yes.

48,403. The hours are shortened and the staff is diminished during those vacations?—Yes.

48,404. That means that the great majority of the staff have practically the legal holidays in the vacations?—Yes, they have the Long Vacation.

48,405. The Long Vacation and the other vacations, too?—Yes.

48,406. The small staff which has to attend during vacations has the benefit of the shorter hours in the vacations?—Yes.

48,407. (Mr. Coward.) Are both masters present in the vacation?—No, neither of them, as a rule.

48,408. (Chairman.) What are the arrangements for carrying on the masters' work during the vacation?—There are the two clerks in attendance, and they communicate by post with the master everything that is wanted. There is very little work during the Long Vacation, hardly any, but whatever work there is is sent to the masters and is almost immediately attended to.

48,409. (Lord Mersey.) I do not understand that. How is it that there is very little work in the Long Vacation? I should have thought the work was just the same?—No, it is not, because, you see, solicitors do not want to have any unnecessary work during the vacation, and very few summonses are taken out for appointment of receivers, and so on; those are nearly always postponed till term time. The work is very much diminished. There is, of course, a certain amount of administrative work that has to be done, but it is very rarely of an urgent kind. Every summons that comes in and is issued during the Long Vacation is, of course, always attended to immediately.

48,410. Then that means that if the whole staff were there during the vacation they would have nothing to do or very little to do?—Yes, it means that they would not have much to do, certainly not enough to keep them at work all the time. But you will observe, of course, that the work is increasing year by year enormously and rapidly; in 25 years it has nearly quadrupled.

48,411. (Chairman.) Measured in what way?—By the number of new cases, or rather, the number of cases in the office—1,200 in 1890 and 5,000 we have now.

48,412. Does each case of a new kind, which has come in since the legislation of 1890, mean as much work as each case under the old system?—I should say quite as much, if not more, because the masters have not got the statutory visits.

48,413. So far as all the work of summonses, drawing deeds, and so forth, is concerned, it would be substantially the same with these new cases as with the old?—Yes, practically.

10 March 1915.] Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,414. (Lord Mersey.) Has there been any great increase in staff since 1890?—No, I understand that there has not been since 1890.

48,415. It is since 1890 that there has been this large increase in numbers?—Yes, it is entirely since 1890.

48,416. Then either your present staff is very much overworked, or the staff in 1890 was very much under-worked?—Yes, that may be a just conclusion; I am not at all sure that it is not, although I myself should not say that the present staff is greatly overworked. I think they are sufficiently worked, but I do not think it is fair or right to say that they are greatly over-worked.

48,417. (Mr. Coward.) Considering the hours of 10 to 4?—Yes.

48,418. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) They have time during the Long Vacation to recover from any over-work?—They have.

48,419. (Chairman.) During term time, when the hours are from 10 to 4, do the clerks ever have to stop beyond office hours?—They are not obliged to do so, of course, but many clerks do, and many clerks take work home; there is a great deal of work done out of office hours.

48,420. Must the work in term time habitually be taken home and done after office hours in order to get through it?—That is very much a question of the personal equation. I do not think so myself. With a quick and ready worker there ought to be no necessity for taking things home; but some of them find that they have to do so. It depends very much on the individual; some people work so very slowly and others work so rapidly that it is difficult to lay down any general rule about it.

48,421. You are satisfied with regard to the staff provided under the present system?—Yes, I think we have as good a set of men as you could wish to have on the whole.

48,422. The suggestion has been made to the Commission that the system of open competition which is applied to the Civil Service generally should be applied to the legal departments. What is your opinion with regard to that suggestion?—It is very difficult to see how you would get people with legal qualifications if you had a competitive examination. I do not quite know how it would work.

48,423. One suggestion that has been made is, that there should be free competition among persons who have a certain amount of experience either as a barrister or in a solicitor's office. Would that suggestion commend itself to you?—That might be a good suggestion, because then all the candidates would be persons with the necessary qualification.

48,424. Some legal experience is desirable?—It is most desirable certainly, and in a first class clerk it is absolutely indispensable.

48,425. Have your first class clerks considerable responsibility in their work?—Yes, I think they have great responsibility. Everything in the office is practically ex parte, that is to say, there is no opposition, there is no opposing party; and any difficulties that arise have to be taken by the clerks themselves; they have to find out all the difficulties, they have to criticise accounts and so on themselves, and they have not got the assistance of an opposing party anywhere.

48,426. What do you consider the most important work done by a first class clerk?—I think drawing an order is the most important work and the most difficult, but then, on the other hand, they get most assistance from the masters.

48,427. An order would always be brought to the master for final approval?—He always has to sign it, and of course he ought to read it and see that it is right. It is difficult, because they deal with the Pay Office, with funds in court, and those are things which are highly technical and have to be done by somebody who understands the matter. I think that is the most difficult work. But on the other hand they have the accounts, also involving a good deal of difficulty and requiring, perhaps, in some ways almost more discretion than the orders.

48,428. Is that passing the accounts of receivers and committees?—Yes.

48,429. And in the case of orders does the work consist in drawing up the actual order after the master has decided the point?—Yes; the master sketches out what the order is to be, and then that is put into shape by his principal clerk, and then it comes back to the master for settlement, and ultimately for his signature.

48,430. In fact it is work of the same character as that done by the registrars in Chancery?—Yes, it is exactly the same.

48,431. Are the orders of a similar character to Chancery orders?—Yes, I think they are; they do not contain declarations and decisions of questions, but they are practically the same, I think.

48,432. Do you consider that they are orders which require as much knowledge and experience as the orders which are drawn up by the Chancery registrars?—Yes, I do most decidedly.

48,433. You find that that work is satisfactorily done by your first class clerks?—Yes, it is very satisfactorily done, according to my experience.

48,434. Do you often have to revise the draft of an order that they bring you?—Yes, very often.

48,435. Then, so far as you have to revise it, it is not perfectly done?—No, it is not always perfectly done; but it is done in a manner that relieves me of a great deal of trouble, and I dare say very often the alterations that I make are not, perhaps, things that go to the root of the matter at all, but matters of taste and style. Everybody has his own way of doing things. I do not myself like to sign an order that I have not read through from beginning to end; and that necessarily sometimes involves alterations and changes. But I must say I do not often find serious mistakes—very rarely.

48,436. Coming now to the lower classes, what is the nature of their work; taking the work of a third class clerk, does it involve much responsibility?—No, not I think as regards the third class; they do what is called registration work, which means keeping books, entering orders, and giving out things to solicitors, casting accounts, and so on—a lot of miscellaneous work of that kind. I do not think it can be said to involve any very serious responsibility.

48,437. The work is mainly of a routine or mechanical character?—Yes, it is of a mechanical nature entirely. It has to be done accurately, of course.

48,438. Do you find that it is a satisfactory preparation for the work of the higher classes?—No, I do not think that the work of a third class clerk is very much preparation, but they are always seeing the other work, and we bring them, so far as we can, to assist in accounting and so on; they are gradually trained up to it; they are not absolutely limited to doing a third class clerk's work.

48,439. Some witnesses who have appeared before us have suggested that the right method is to offer no prospect of promotion to persons appointed to the third class, where they will be doing the mechanical work, and to recruit separately for the higher classes from among persons of legal experience. For your office do you consider that system would be an improvement, or do you prefer the present system?—I do not know that I have really considered that question. The present system certainly works very well, and it is an advantage, I think, that a man should rise from the very bottom and know all the ins and outs of the office from the very beginning; that has its advantages; and it would of course introduce rather a different element into the office if you had clerks who are not supposed to rise.

48,440. (Mr. Coward.) You only have two third class clerks?—There are three. It is not a matter of great importance, I think.

48,441. (Chairman.) As regards the masters themselves, do you find that the system of two co-ordinate masters is satisfactory?—No, I think it is very unsatisfactory.

48,442. In what respects?—It has all the disadvantages of dual control. You have two masters, each going on his own lines, and very often different lines, doing the work in a different way, requiring different things in point of practice, wanting different kinds of affidavits and so on, drawing orders on quite different lines. The whole thing is unsatisfactory from that point of view. And there is no uniformity. It is very difficult to get it. You try to get it, but you do not. For instance, some years ago Mr. Fischer and I agreed that there should be common forms of orders, which was very useful indeed, and that introduced certain uniformity for a time; but there is a constant tendency to fall away and to fall aside, and to go back into the old courses. What is really wanted is that the whole thing should be put under one control; until that is done the office will never, in my opinion, be adequately and properly administered with first-class efficiency.

48,443. Do you consider that two masters are necessary for the work?—No, I do not think so myself, but many others would not agree with that.

48,444. At present you think that the work might be performed by one officer?—I do.

48,445. And if any further strength were required you would make the second officer subordinate to the first, and not co-ordinate?—If there were another master how exactly to work it would be a rather difficult question. I do not think myself, that I like the idea of an assistant master very much; you would have to arrange what the relations between the two were to be very carefully. I think it would be better if it could be done in this way: That you should have a single master, and then let him arrange how the work is to be done. The work would have, to some extent, to be reorganised; you would have to pool the work, and get more assistance from your staff; you would probably utilise the chief clerk, and perhaps another clerk, in some way more on the lines of the Chancery Division, where each judge has two chief clerks—something of that kind might be done. There are many ways of doing it; exactly how it should be done is a matter that would have to be very carefully considered. I do not profess to have thought out a scheme of that kind, but I am quite satisfied that if you had a man willing to do the work—it must not be a man who got it merely as a retiring pension, or a nice comfortable income; it must be a man who will really put his back into it, and do the work—if you have a man of that kind, he can do the work easily.

48,446. You see very great advantage in having a single head?—Yes, I think so; I think everybody would see that. At present solicitors complain; they come to me and say, "Oh, but Mr. So-and-so allowed all this, " and you will not—you are very hard upon us;" and it is hard; I recognise that.

48,447. (Mr. Coward.) And that does occur constantly?—It does; it occurs every day almost. It is impossible to get uniformity. It is not that the masters would not agree if they could meet together and discuss together, and thresh things out; but when you have two elderly barristers each wanting to go his own way, and each has his own opinion and his own way of doing work, you will not get uniformity.

48,448. (Chairman.) And owing to the fact that the right of appeal is very little exercised, uniformity is not secured in that way?—Not in the least; there is no uniformity whatever. Even if you have the right of appeal, it is only an appeal to a judge in chambers; it is not like an appeal in the High Court. You may have a dozen judges there, but you have the Court of Appeal, and cases are constantly being reconsidered; and then you have the opinion of the Bar, where the whole matter is brought into court and discussed. But the Lunacy work is always more or less in a hole and corner—nobody knows anything about it.

48,449. (Lord Mersey.) There is, as I understand, no allocation to each master of particular cases?—Yes, there is; it is done by rota.

48,450. Then the differences that arise are not differences that affect a particular case?—No, they affect the practice of each master; the cases are rotated.

48,451. That is to say, you might have control of lunatic A, and you would have sole control of lunatic A?—Yes.

48,452. Therefore all the orders that you made with reference to lunatic A would be in accord?—Yes, that is so.

48,453. The discord comes between orders made in A's case and orders made by the other master in B's case?—Yes.

48,454. (Chairman.) The same solicitor might be dealing with client A and client B, and find a different practice in dealing with his two clients?—He might.

48,455. As regards the relation of the visitors to the masters, do you find the present system satisfactory?—Yes, I think, on the whole, it works fairly well as long as matters are arranged on the present system. I think we get all the information we want.

48,456. The visitors are your eyes and ears for finding out the facts?—Yes.

48,457. In cases where there is an administrative authority and an inspecting authority, the usual arrangement is for the inspecting authority to be subordinate to the administrative authority, is it not?—Yes.

48,458. Are there reasons in the present case for departing from that system, or would that system be preferable?—They are, of course, in a sense subordinate. I do not mean to say subordinate as officers, but they are under the masters, they are set in motion by the masters, and their reports only come when they are asked for them; they have no originating power of their own.

48,459. They are under the master in this sense, that the master can ask them to visit a particular lunatic?—Yes, only in that sense, of course.

48,460. But as regards the arrangement of their work, the method of carrying it out, and so forth, they are entirely independent of the masters?—Yes, that is so.

48,461. A considerable part of their work consists of reports to the Lord Chancellor, not to the masters at all?—That is so.

48,462. Reports which never come to the masters unless they ask for them?—That is so.

48,463. If the organisation could be set up afresh, would it not be more natural to place the visitors in subordination to the masters as part of their organisation?—If you could have that ideal state of things, no doubt great reforms might be made, and very useful reforms. I think certainly there should be at once more centralisation and more decentralisation. What you want is to have visitors all over the country, not people living in London, but visitors on the spot.

48,464. (Lord Mersey.) How many visitors are there at present?—Three; two medical and one legal.

48,465. (Chairman.) And their headquarters are in London?—Yes.

48,466. So that for visiting distant parts of the country it means a good deal of travelling, which would be unnecessary if they were located on the spot?—Yes.

48,467. (Lord Mersey.) But if they were on the spot you would require a very much larger number?—Yes, you would, much larger.

48,468. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) They would not be full-time appointments?—I do not think you would expect, in that case, to have such expensive officials if you had them all over the country. It is really a question on which you would have to consult and find out how it could be done.

48,469. (Lord Mersey.) If you had them all over the country, I suppose you would probably pay them per head, as it were, pay them for each visit?—That would be one way of doing it, no doubt.

48,470. (Chairman.) You have, I think, periodical meetings with the visitors?—Yes, we meet once a month.

48,471. What is the business that is done at those meetings?—There is no business really, as a board; there is nothing to discuss, as a board. We meet, and the visitors mention cases that they have visited; but that has not anything to do with meeting as a board, it really has no meaning as a board meeting whatever; but is useful inasmuch as if there is any case about which you want to speak to the visitor personally you can talk to him about it. That, I think, is the real use of those board meetings. There is no business; nothing to put to the meeting; no resolutions are passed, or anything of that kind. There is a sort of general conversation—that is what it comes to.

10 March 1915.] Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,472. General conversation about particular cases?—Yes.

48,473. In fact, it is an opportunity for personal consultation and discussion of cases?—Yes, that is the utility of it, I think.

48,474. Would it be more difficult to arrange these meetings if the visitors were located at points in the country?—Yes, it would be impossible; but I do not think that is of very great importance, because you ought to have on your report everything you want to know; and if you want to know anything more, I suppose you could get it by correspondence.

48,475. If, as the result of a visitor's report, some alteration is required in the arrangements for the maintenance of a lunatic, how is that carried out; how are instructions given?—The first thing to do is to write to the receiver, or the receiver's solicitor, and tell him "The visitor has made such and such a recommendation. Is there any reason why it should not be carried out?" Then the receiver either assents or dissents, and if he dissents, of course, he has to give his reasons. It sometimes happens that he does not like the recommendation, and he has good reasons for objecting to it; then it is not carried out. But, as a rule, I think in most cases, the receivers are quite willing to do what is suggested.

48,476. Does the visitor know what instructions are given upon his report?—Yes, an endorsement is put upon the report, and that goes back to the visitor. He sees what has happened; he sees what the master has done.

48,477. And at his next visit he sees whether that is carried out?—Yes.

48,478. Does he, as a matter of fact, give instructions himself on minor points?—No, I do not think so. As regards lunatics so found by inquisition, he may do so, and I dare say he does in small details.

48,479. What strikes me is that in visits of that sort there must often be small details on which the visitor may see something that would be for the comfort of the lunatic. It would hardly be worth making a special report and sending instructions to a solicitor, and so forth, but the matter could be set right by a personal suggestion of the visitor on his visit?—I think in that case he would do it in small matters of domestic economy, and so on.

48,480. But that would be a matter of advice and not an instruction of the kind that a master can give?—Yes, entirely.

48,481. Is there any fixed age for retirement at present, either for masters or clerks?—No, not any.

48,482. Do you think there ought to be?—I do, most strongly.

48,483. Have there, in the past, been cases in which it would have been advantageous to have a fixed age for retirement?—I am afraid so. I do not think you can expect a man in extreme old age to carry on such work as this.

48,484. (Mr. Coward.) But it varies very much?—It does enormously; but still I think a limit of age ought to be fixed both for masters and for the staff. The thing has been almost scandalous in the past in some cases.

48,485. (Chairman.) In the case of the staff, do you consider that the general Civil Service rule would be suitable?—I think so myself; other people, of course, have different opinions about that. It seems to me a very reasonable limit. It is 65, is it not?

48,486. The rule is that a man may retire at 60, and can be called upon by the head of his department to retire at 60, and he must retire at 65, with the possibility of exceptions in very special cases?—Yes, I think that is a very good rule indeed.

48,487. Then as regards the masters themselves, what age would you suggest as the limit of office?—It is very difficult to say, but there, again, I should have thought that 72 was an outside limit.

48,488. (Lord Mersey.) Why would you make it higher in the case of masters than in the case of clerks?—That is rather a difficult question to answer. I was rather putting it on the analogy of the judges.

48,489. The judges go on for ever?—But there was a committee, I think, which discussed that question, and they were of opinion, on the whole, that 72 would be a reasonable age for retirement of a judge. I am not suggesting for a moment that a Master in Lunacy is at all as great a person as a judge; of course he is not; but at the same time his work is very much more like that of a judge than that of a Civil servant, and if you were to adopt that analogy I should think it would be a reasonable rule. It might be fixed, perhaps, with advantage even at an earlier age, but I should say that 72 would be the very outside limit.

48,490. (Chairman.) And as regards visitors, do you consider that there ought to be a limit in their case?—I think so, most decidedly.

48,491. Would you, in their case, suggest the Civil Service limit or the judicial limit?—I think I should prefer to apply the Civil Service limit to them, but it is difficult to say.

48,492. Their work, with a large amount of travelling, must be very exacting for men of advancing years?—Yes, it is. There is a great deal of travelling about. Of course, it would be very desirable to get a little movement in these things. I should myself like to see a visitor appointed for 10 years only, with an option to continue him; but, of course, that is another matter. It is a case, really, where you want to have new blood, and the latest scientific methods, and all that introduced, if you can, but we are backward in all these things.

48,493. The taxing is at present done, as you told us, by a first class clerk in the office, assisted by a second class clerk?—Yes.

48,494. Recommendations have been made by some of the committees that have sat on the subject that the taxing should be transferred to the Central Taxing Office?—Yes.

48,495. What is your opinion on that point?—I do not see what advantage you would gain by that. You would gain the advantage of uniformity, but, on the other hand, you would very largely increase the expense, which would cost about 1,200*l.* a year more, I estimate, unless you were to distribute the Lunacy taxing over all the taxing masters, or make one of the existing taxing masters the Lunacy taxing master; but I should think the Central Office people would not like that. If it means that you are to have another taxing master in the Central Office, I cannot see what advantage you would gain.

48,496. Is the work done satisfactorily at present?—I believe quite satisfactorily, so far as I know.

48,497. You have had no complaints on the subject?—I do not say that the solicitors do not dislike having their bills taxed down; they do; but I do not think they would dislike it more from Mr. Corley than from anybody else. I have not heard any complaints of injustice or improper taxing.

48,498. Or an application of a different standard of rules from those applied in the general taxings?—No, I do not think I have heard that; but that, of course, is a matter which would not much come before me. That is rather a solicitor's question. I do not like to express a decided opinion about that.

48,499. Is there an appeal to the master from the taxation of the first class clerk?—It is not really an appeal. The master is his own taxing officer. He does it, it is true, by the hand of an officer, but still he is the taxing officer. Of course, numerous points are referred to the master, but it is not, technically, an appeal.

48,500. Any point of doubt is brought to him?—Any point of doubt is brought to him, and, of course, there is an appeal from the master to the Lords Justices.

48,501. Is that ever exercised?—I think, practically, not.

48,502. (Mr. Coward.) Lunacy bills are very different from the ordinary bills?—They are.

48,503. They are all composed of comparatively small items?—They are.

48,504. The attendances upon the master and a letter or two, and the question of whether the master will allow 3*s.* 6*d.* or 5*s.* for a letter, and 6*s.* 8*d.* or 10*s.*, or whatever it may be, for an attendance—they are little things?—Yes, they are very little things.

10 March 1915.] Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,505. (Chairman.) The business being almost entirely non-contentious, there are none of the large charges arising out of contentious business. Is that the point?—Yes. For instance, if you are taxing a bill in an action you can get up to 300*l.* or 400*l.* in a page or two, because there are counsel's fees, witnesses' fees, and large disbursements; whereas, in Lunacy, you may read 50 pages before you get to 100*l.* The work is heavier in that way. There is a great deal more to read over and very much less to show for it.

48,506. In the office is promotion at present by seniority or by selection?—It is by selection, but, of course, seniority has weight. I mean, no clerk is entitled to be promoted because he is the senior clerk for the post, but if he is the senior clerk that is an element which would have great weight in considering the question.

48,507. In practice, does that result in seniority being generally followed?—No; there have been several cases lately in my time when that has not been followed and the best man has been appointed, though there was another man who was of longer standing; but it does, no doubt, happen more often than not that the senior man is promoted. I think I may go as far as that.

48,508. Is promotion made by the masters themselves?—Yes, subject, of course, to the approval of the Lord Chancellor.

48,509. The staff is divided into two separate compartments, one belonging to each master?—Yes.

48,510. Is there any difficulty in comparing the relative merits of the clerks attached to one master and the other?—Of course, the master to whom they do not belong has very great difficulty in knowing their abilities. I myself now, having had to do the work on both sides, have got to know the whole staff, but for a long time I knew nothing whatever of Master Fischer's staff, and the consequence was, when promotion came along and had to be considered, I was in a great difficulty to know what to do.

48,511. How did it happen that you had to do the work of both sides?—It was during Master Fischer's illness. When I came back after the Long Vacation he was ill, and I did his work until he died in November, and a new master was not appointed until December; so I had, roughly, two months of it.

48,512. That difficulty as regards knowing the clerks would be removed if, as you suggested, there was one head of the office?—Yes, undoubtedly. Of course there is a certain amount of wastage by having the office divided absolutely into two divisions. There is always, of course, one clerk who has a little spare time which cannot be utilised; you cannot throw him into the other side where there may be pressure of work.

48,513. A clerk is not eligible for appointment as a master unless he happens to have had 10 years' qualification as a barrister?—No, he must be a barrister of 10 years' standing.

48,514. Have any of the clerks that qualification?—I think some of them are barristers of over 10 years' standing.

48,515. (Lord Mersey.) Has a clerk ever been made a master?—No, never.

48,516. (Chairman.) But if a clerk had that statutory qualification, there would be nothing to prevent him being appointed, if the Lord Chancellor thought him a suitable person?—No, that is the only qualification—10 years' standing as a barrister.

48,517. (Lord Mersey.) You told us that there were three visitors, two medical men and one legal?—Yes.

48,518. When you request one of these visitors to see a patient, do you choose from the three according to the particular circumstances of the case?—No.

48,519. I mean, do you send the legal man in some cases and the medical man in others?—No.

48,520. You do not send the three together?—No, we make no selection. The request goes down to the visitors' office asking that a report may be made.

48,521. Then is it a chance whether the legal man goes or a medical man goes?—It is a chance, unless you specially ask for a medical visit; then, of course, a medical visitor would go.

48,522. The legal visitor, of course, is a barrister?—Yes.

48,523. He does not take practice?—No, I think not.
48,524. Do the medical men carry on their profession?—No.

48,525. What is the pay of the medical man?—1,500*l.* a year.

48,526. You suggested that it might be desirable to have a larger number of these gentlemen distributed over the country?—Yes.

48,527. Have you considered whether that would increase the expense much?—I should have thought it ought not to; but I have not considered that question, because it is impossible to consider it without taking medical advice about it. One would like to consult experienced medical men.

48,528. As I understand, what you would do would be to nominate a certain number of medical men up and down the country, who should, as occasion arose, pay the visit that the master desired him to pay?—Yes.

48,529. Then he would, of course, carry on his profession in the ordinary way?—Well, that is a matter, of course, for consideration. I do not know whether it would be a good thing, because it is rather a difficult matter. There are a large number of asylums and licensed houses all over the country, to each of which there is a medical superintendent, of course a highly competent gentleman, or he is supposed to be, at any rate. Possibly an arrangement might be made so that those gentlemen might be utilised as visitors.

48,530. I do not quite see how you would make the arrangement you suggested apply to the case of the legal visitor?—I do not see myself that the legal visitor is wanted; it is quite an anomalous position.

48,531. What is it that the legal visitor does that is different from the work of the medical visitors?—He does exactly the same.

48,532. What is the object of having a legal visitor?—I do not know at all. It goes back to the Act of 1845—two medical and one legal. Why there was a legal gentleman appointed I have never been able to understand. I do not for a moment wish to say that the legal visitor is not most valuable and most useful; but he has no different functions to perform than the medical visitors.

48,533. Could you tell us what the functions are of the visitors? What is it that the masters ask them to do?—Take a very common case. You find a lunatic is in an asylum; he has got, say, an income of 500*l.* a year, and you find perhaps that 150*l.* is being spent. Then it occurs to you that probably not enough is being spent and that the lunatic might be better cared for, and you ask a visitor to go and examine into the case, and he goes down and sees the patient; and it may be that the patient is quite incapable of enjoying anything else at all, and he says so, and there is an end of the matter; or he may say: "This patient is quite capable of enjoying all sorts of things—a separate sitting-room, or a carriage drive, and all sorts of luxuries."

48,534. (Mr. Coward.) A private room?—Yes; all kinds of little improvements may be suggested. That is one of the principal uses of a visit. Then there is always the case of the lunatic who says he has recovered, or that he wants to see a visitor. They like to be treated as if they are important people very often.

48,535. (Lord Mersey.) Has it ever happened that a patient has recovered?—Yes; there have been cases.

48,536. I have heard many cases where a lunatic has said he is well?—It is not often the case, but there have been cases where, as the result of a visit from a visitor, we have been able to set the patient free from asylum control.

48,537. I should have thought that for these cases a doctor was almost better than a legal man?—Yes, I think he is; in fact it is almost essential that he should be a doctor.

48,538. I rather gather that, from your point of view, the legal man is unnecessary?—I never was able to understand why one visitor should be a legal visitor. The masters themselves are lawyers and they do not want legal advice as a rule, and if they do want it they can always get it.

48,539. Do I understand that you do not get any advice from the legal visitor?—I remember a case where I did not get legal advice, but the Lord Chancellor did—a case where a lunatic woman had a considerable property in Scotland, and a hall-porter, I think, had married her. The Lord Chancellor wanted to know what the rights and wrongs of it were as regards the marriage, whether it could be set aside, and so on; and I remember the legal visitor then gave a very learned opinion about it. That is an instance.

10 March 1915.] Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,540. A doctor could not have done that?—No, of course a legal opinion could have been got, but we should have had to pay for it, no doubt. The opinion we got cost nothing; but that is quite an exceptional case. That is the only case of the kind I remember. The legal visitor is never asked to advise the masters legally. You never ask him as to the construction of a will or anything of that kind.

48,541. I rather gather that you do not think that the system of appointment can be improved?—For the appointment of the staff I only judge from the fact that we have such a very good staff that probably you could not better it.

48,542. If you find the present system works very well, I suppose you would hesitate about altering it?—Exactly.

48,543. Do you find that the present system of promotion is satisfactory?—Yes, I think quite satisfactory.

48,544. But the present system of retirement you do not think is?—There is none at present.

48,545. I mean to say it is left to the discretion or the indiscretion of the individual?—Yes. There have been no cases of difficulty about staff so far as I know, and certainly in my time never anybody there who ought to have retired.

48,546. But you have heard of cases in days gone by?—No, I do not think so. I have not heard of them, but I do not say they may not have existed.

48,547. I thought you said that there had been cases where a man had remained long after the time when his powers failed?—Yes, that is as regards masters.

48,548. Not with regard to the staff?—No, I am not aware of any case of that kind. There may have been cases. I remember there were, when I was at the Bar, one or two very aged clerks in the master's office, but I have no personal experience of that.

48,549. (Mr. Boutwood.) There is one question I should like to put, rather to illustrate a general point which you have suggested. Two of the visitors are medical men who do not practise?—Yes, that is so.

48,550. Do you consider it a good system to have professional men of that sort holding office for life and quite cut off from the practice of their profession, or do you think it tends to isolate their views and practice and keep them in the background?—I should prefer to see them more in touch with the advance of science, and so on. Perhaps I ought not to say that, because after all I do not know enough about it, but I should like some circulation in the thing. If you could have visitors appointed for a shorter period, I think it would be an advantage. Of course the present visitors are very eminent persons.

48,551. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You say that, owing to the system of dual control, there is a tendency for the practice of each master to diverge from that of the other master?—Yes.

48,552. That system of dual organisation goes right down through the office from the top to the bottom?—Except that it does not touch the third class clerks.

48,553. It goes right down to the bottom of the second class?—Yes, it does.

48,554. Therefore there is the same tendency right down through the practice of the office for divergence of usage and tradition?—Yes.

48,555. Every man on each side of the office looks for his promotion solely on his side?—No, not solely. You have to have the concurrence of both masters in moving up.

48,556. I know, but it is not the practice when a man is promoted from a second class clerk to a first class clerk to shift him from one side of the office to the other?—No, that is not usual. It has happened though in the case of one man who is now on my side and was formerly on Master Fischer's side.

48,557. The work of the third class clerks is that which, in an ordinary solicitor's office, is done by the office boy?—Hardly quite as poor as that. It is a little better than that, I think.

48,558. Who does the office boy's work?—There is no such work to be done. There is a messenger and the staff of the Royal Courts.

48,559. But outside the messenger and the gentlemen who see that the passages are cleaned, all work, however mechanical, has to be done by your third class clerks?—Yes, it has.

48,560. (Chairman.) Including such work as addressing envelopes?—(Mr. Prichard.) That is done by each member of the staff who writes himself. We do not have circular letters.

48,561. (Lord Mersey.) The man who writes the letter addresses the envelope?—Yes, I should myself.

48,562. (Mr. Graham Wallas to Master Theobald.) The last two appointments to the third class were made, judging by the dates here, at the age of 29?—I dare say that is so.

48,563. And they were made at a salary of 100l. a year?—Yes.

48,564. To the most mechanical work which exists in the office?—Yes.

48,565. And those who were so appointed were in fact on the ladder of promotion up to the very important work done by the first class clerks?—Yes.

48,566. In the case of a man of 29, do not you think you would get a better man at that age if you appointed him at a higher salary and with more responsible work?—If you appointed him, for instance, to be a second class clerk at once?

48,567. Appointed him at once to responsible work and at a salary corresponding to that responsible work?—Very likely you would; but it must be remembered what extraordinarily good men we have got to come in as third class clerks. It is always an astonishment to me that we get such good men at such poor pay.

48,568. You say in your memorandum that there is nothing in your office in the nature of a time-book?—No.

48,569. Have you ever satisfied yourself that in fact everybody at the office is in the office on the stroke of 10?—I cannot say I have.

48,570. Have you any opinion on the subject of whether in fact they are all there?—I should think they probably are not all there on the stroke of 10. But is not there a certain allowance made, even in the strictest office, of about 20 minutes, or something of that kind?

48,571. Then you think, in fact, 10 a.m. means in practice 10.20?—I should say you must take a liberal view of it, no doubt.

48,572. There, again, I suppose it is quite likely that the practice on the two sides might diverge?—No, I do not think so.

48,573. (Chairman.) Is not that a matter which is directly under the view of the chief clerk who deals with both sides?—Yes, he is the only gentleman who would know when the clerks attend. I should not know myself. I am not there at 10.

48,574. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The Master of the Rolls' Committee in 1912 reported as follows: "We may add that the efficiency and dispatch with which the work of this office is carried out would be materially assisted by the employment of shorthand-writer typists. At present there are none employed. We think it desirable that one or more of such typists should be appointed. Advantage might be taken of any reduction in the number of the existing staff to give effect to this." Has that recommendation ever been carried out?—No.

48,575. Why?—There has not been, I think, any reduction in the staff, for one thing.

48,576. But there have been since that time two new appointments to the third class made?—Yes, I suppose nobody has asked for it, and I do not quite see what use it would be myself.

48,577. Then in the existing organisation of the legal departments, the fact that a committee has recommended such a thing may, in fact, be forgotten the moment the recommendation has been made?—I am afraid it looks like it in this particular case.

PRICHARD was in attendance.)

48,578. I see of the third class clerks lately appointed one is Mr. G. E. Prichard. Is he any relation of Mr. R. R. Prichard, the chief clerk?—Yes, he is his son.

48,579. When any vacancies occur in your staff, are any steps taken to make those vacancies known?—No, no public steps are taken, and there is no advertisement or notice or anything of that kind given.

48,580. Then in fact the only man who knows that there is a vacancy may be the chief clerk?—That is so, but of course the whole staff would know.

48,581. Is there what is known as a waiting list in the office?—Not strictly, but this happens and has happened: I get applications from time to time from gentlemen who want to know whether there is any vacancy in the office, and I always send those applications to be filed, and they would be attended to the next time there is a vacancy. There is no waiting list in any other sense.

48,582. As far as you know, no one has been promised the next vacancy at this moment?—No, there is nothing of that kind.

48,583. Now a personal question: Like Mr. Henry Fawcett, I believe you have the misfortune to be blind?—Yes.

48,584. You were appointed in 1907?—Yes.

48,585. Were you blind at the time of your appointment?—No, I was not.

48,586. It has come on since?—Yes. It came on in 1908, and I then, of course, tendered my resignation, which was not accepted.

48,587. Had you to satisfy the Civil Service Commission at the time you were appointed, and were you certificated by the Commissioners?—No.

48,588. In the case of a continuous office like the Lunacy Department, do you find it rather remarkable that the work dries up so completely in the Long Vacation that no master in Lunacy ever puts in any appearance during the Long Vacation?—Well, it is not necessary. Of course, if a master were wanted, he would go there at once.

48,589. Do not you think it may go the other way, that no work is presented because it is well known in the profession that no master is there?—No, I do not think so. The solicitors are told—at least, so far as I am concerned—that all work will be immediately attended to, and all summonses taken, and orders made upon them.

48,590. You told us that the work of a visitor is, in a matter of travelling, extremely exacting. Are you aware that there is no medical visitor whose age is below 70?—No, I did not know they were as old as that. I thought Dr. Nicolson was a good deal younger.

48,591. The age given us is 74 and 70?—No doubt that is correct.

48,592. In asking for assistance from a man of 74, do you find yourself influenced in the amount of assistance you ask for by his age?—No, I simply ask him to go and visit a patient—no more than that—giving him, of course, all the details of the case.

48,593. The late senior master, Master Fischer, is dead?—Yes.

48,594. What age was he at the time of his death?—84.

48,595. He did not resign before his death?—No.

48,596. Is there anyone who, if a master is in fact unable to perform his work from old age or ill health, can dismiss him?—I do not think so.

48,597. Your belief is that in your case, if you should happily live to 95, you will have an absolute freehold of your office?—Well, I suppose that is the legal position.

48,598. (Lord Mersey.) Who appoints you?—The Lord Chancellor.

48,599. Cannot the man who appoints you cancel the appointment?—No, I do not think so. That has always been felt to be a difficulty. I think if it could have been done in some former cases, it would have been done. Of course, the Lord Chancellor can bring great pressure to bear, I should think, upon anybody, and there is a way in which, if I live to 95, and become what we call a D case, no doubt you might get the other master to make an order appointing a committee to make me resign the office.

48,600. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) But the committee would receive your salary, I suppose, and would spend it upon such indulgence as you were capable of enjoying?—He might make a bargain with the Treasury, but they are hard taskmasters, I expect.

48,601. (Mr. Coward.) If you had one master, as you were suggesting, it would tend to economise labour, would it not?—Undoubtedly.

48,602. And, probably, the effect would be that you might do with a smaller staff than is now employed, because now you have to divide the staff, and then you would have a consolidated one?—Yes, there is that possibility, remembering always that the office is increasing year by year.

48,603. Perhaps you are not quite so good a judge about this, but supposing you had a solicitor's office in which you had two partners, and you had the work divided, the clerks divided, and everything divided, of course it would be carried on at far greater cost than it would be if you had one staff?—Undoubtedly.

48,604. And I would suggest to you that the same principle would apply in your case?—Yes, I am quite of that opinion.

48,605. You were dealing just now with the relations between the masters and the visitors, and you told us that we were backward in all these things. Is there any other country in which they are more up-to-date than we are in these things?—Do you mean in the medical science relating to lunatics?

48,606. No; in what you were dealing with—the mode of governing and controlling these unfortunate people. I suppose that is what you meant when you said we were backward in all these things. In the arrangements you were speaking of between the masters and the visitors, could you make any suggestions of ways in which things might be improved? You say one master instead of two, and I should agree with you, but are we behind other nations in this?—That I do not think I could answer.

48,607. (Mr. Boutwood.) I thought you meant that our present arrangements did not really enable us to bring to the work of the visitors the best available medical knowledge in this country, and that, consequently, that work fell below a domestic standard—not below a foreign standard?—I do not think I intended to refer to foreign standards, because, of course, I am ignorant in those matters. I only know what people say. I have no accurate information about it.

48,608. (Mr. Coward.) You were talking about the difficulties in the forms of the orders. Will you kindly tell me what would be a form of order that you would consider of a difficult character? Can you shortly sketch one for me?—It is a little difficult to do that. If you have, as used to be the case, six gentlemen drawing orders, they are all drawn in different styles and on different lines and with different language, and so on. Even as regards the Pay Office, which ought to be uniform, you do not get uniformity. People use little expressions by which they do not shorten things in the way they might. For instance, a person may have a long name and two or three christian names, and the surname and the name is repeated over and over again in the order. That ought to be done by calling the person "the patient"; of course, there you have a short and concise expression. In the same way many of them will repeat the name of the receiver over and over again, when, of course, he ought to be called "the receiver"—all those little devices for shortening labour.

48,609. I was rather dealing with what sort of order you would say was a difficult order. You said there was a great difficulty, and these orders were upon a sort of level with the orders drawn in Chancery, which are very very different things?—No, I do not think so.

48,610. What would you consider an order that you would draw that would be an order of a difficult nature?—You may have an order which involves the sale of real estate, the sale of personal estate, the sale of furniture; you may require that outstanding cash should be lodged; you may have a direction that mortgages should be paid off; you may have to arrange how maintenance is to be got and applied; you may have to raise it by annual sales.

48,611. Still, all these things you would have to do; you simply put them down, and they are more in the form of a direction than anything else. Would it come in the order?—Yes, it would come in the order.

48,612. I appreciate what you mean?—I do not mean that the orders are specially difficult, but I do mean that they want technical knowledge, because when you have a fund in court and the Pay Office has to deal with it, the pay officers are technical people, and they want you to use their language. That is where the difficulty comes in. I do not say that they are precisely the same as the Chancery orders; of course they never could be like the old Chancery orders in the good old days when you had administration suits, and it was all done without pay schedules and things of that kind. Such orders you could never have in Lunacy, but they are also abolished in Chancery; the Chancery order nowadays is a very simple thing, and I do not think there is any substantial diversity of orders.

48,613. Then you would say that your orders are simple to-day?—Simple as compared with the old orders, but not easy things to draw without any experience and knowledge.

48,614. (Sir John Kempe.) With reference to recruiting your first and second class clerks, I presume if you have a vacancy in the second class and find a third class clerk suitable, you would put him up?—Yes.

48,615. That has happened sometimes?—Yes, it has.

48,616. Do you appoint the third class clerks with a view to that ultimate promotion. Do you pick out men who you think will be suitable for promotion by-and-by, or do you pick them out for the third class clerkships only?—I think you take the best man who offers himself.

48,617. You do not try to recruit from legal sources—from solicitors' offices, and so on?—No. What has generally happened in my experience has been that there would be applications, and when there is a vacancy it generally gets known and people apply, and among the applicants you select the one who appears to be the most satisfactory. Of course, if there is nobody satisfactory, you have to go farther afield.

48,618. I suppose the fact that you are so very top-heavy in your organisation, only having three third class clerks to 16 in the classes above them as compared with the other offices, gives you a very small recruiting ground in your third class?—Yes, there are so few of them.

48,619. It makes it much more rare to find one suitable to go up?—Of course the third class clerk, unless there is some real reason why he should not go up, would ordinarily become a second class clerk when there is a vacancy.

48,620. He would go up by seniority as a rule?—As a rule, I think, because you do not for a second class clerk necessarily require the same technical knowledge as in the case of a first class clerk.

48,621. Do you find any difficulty in teaching the third class clerks the duties of a second class clerk, or do you find them pick it up easily?—I think so.

48,622. Even though the clerk may not have had legal training beforehand?—I think so. They are generally very anxious to learn, and they do not find the third class work very interesting, and whenever they can they like to see what is going on in other ways.

48,623. I notice that you said the difficulty was to get the men to learn the technical work, the work of the office was so technical. What do you mean by "technical." Would the work of a legal office be more technical than that of an ordinary civil office. There is required a knowledge of certain Acts of Parliament, I suppose, and legal forms, but that is about all?—When I said technical I was referring to orders, I think; I did not mean that the other work was highly technical. It is the orders which are technical which have to deal with Pay Office funds.

48,624. Then your office is one of those in fact in which the ordinary system of promotion from the bottom to the top can be carried out without any difficulty?—I think so.

48,625. You can train a man up to your work without difficulty?—I think so.

48,626. Early in your evidence you were speaking as to lunatics with property, and you said that the Commissioners very often had no opportunity of knowing what property they had. Can a person outside move in a case like this. Supposing a person outside knows there is some scandal going on as regards property of a lunatic, can he move and write to the Lord Chancellor?—Undoubtedly he can. If he did that, the thing would be at once taken up and looked into immediately.

48,627. It is not only the visitors who start a question of that kind, it can be started outside?—Yes.

48,628. (Mr. Boutwood.) What is the average length of service in your third class?—(Mr. Prichard.) I cannot say anything more than that it has varied from three to 19 years. I could get out an average any time, but I have no knowledge at the moment.

48,629. (Mr. Shipley to Master Theobald.) Do you know whether the increase of the work in your department is due to an increase in the number of insane people, or is it due to a greater variety of the work?—I think it must be, to some extent, due to the increase of the number of lunatics, but I think it is still more due to the fact that people are beginning to understand that it is rather dangerous to administer a lunatic's property without lawful authority to do it. I think that knowledge is gradually spreading. Another reason why the work has increased is, I think, that people are beginning to understand that it is not so expensive to do it. We have very much diminished expenses in the last 10 years. The cessation of inquisitions alone has very much diminished it, but beyond that we have succeeded in many ways in diminishing expenses.

48,630. The fact that you do not find so much to do in the Long Vacation as in the rest of the year is probably due to the solicitors rather than the fact that people do not go mad in the dog-days, as they are generally supposed to?—I think, undoubtedly, solicitors do not want to do more work than is necessary in the Long Vacation.

48,631. There is no evidence that there is a diminution of the number of people going mad just at that time of the year, is there?—No.

48,632. (Mr. Matheson.) You say in your memorandum that four of your staff have been called to the Bar and four are qualified solicitors?—Yes.

48,633. That is about half of the total staff?—Yes; the total is 19.

41,634. Have the other members of the staff had any legal experience?—No, I do not think so.

48,635. Do you find any great difference in efficiency between those who have that qualification and those who have not?—Yes, I think so. I think, from the point of view of personal assistance, the assistance you get from a man who has had legal training is very much more valuable than the assistance you get from the man who has not.

48,636. Would you go so far as to say that it is necessary that a man should have had legal training before he comes into the office?—No, I do not think it is necessary for all purposes of the office that you should have legally trained men. I think, for the purpose of taking accounts, you want common sense, but legal training is really not essential though it is useful.

48,637. Do you think that a man could ultimately rise to the capacity of drawing orders if he has not had a legal training before he comes in?—A man may have so much experience and be so intelligent that he really can do without legal training.

48,638. It is not absolutely necessary?—It is not absolutely necessary, I should say, but very important.

48,639. About the meetings with the visitors. I suppose the visitors do not report on all the cases they have visited? They do not go through all the list of cases?—At the Board meeting, no.

48,640. Would they report on their own motion, or only report on cases they were asked to report upon?—

10 March 1915.]

Master HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD, K.C. (Mr. RICHARD RUSSELL

It is not exactly a case of reporting; they have already reported. They send their reports to the masters, and when you meet them you may ask the visitor: "Will you tell me about a particular case? What did you think of so-and-so and so-and-so?" You may discuss the case further and get explanations of the report; that is all that happens.

48,641. If a lunatic wants to make a complaint, is he bound to make it to the visitor, or has he any other means of forwarding a complaint to the masters other than through the visitors?—He does not ordinarily complain to the visitors at all. He writes to the masters, or he can write to the Lord Chancellor.

48,642. (Mr. Boutwood.) What are you supposed to do at these Board meetings? You have said that their chief advantage is incidental, but what is the formal supposition of them? What is the technical reason for having them?—They are held under the statute, but I do not know that that gives much explanation. I suppose it goes back to the old days of inquisitions, when masters were in the nature of visitors; their position was totally different in those days. They were, so to speak, superior clerks, and I suppose they attended as being possibly people who would themselves visit. It may have been that; I do not think there ever was very much sense in it.

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD, called and examined.

48,650. (Chairman.) You hold the post of Legal Chancery Visitor of Lunatics?—Yes.

48,651. How long have you held the post?—Four years last November.

48,652. There are three visitors in all, two medical and one legal?—Three.

48,653. What are the duties of the visitors?—They are statutory. To visit and personally see every lunatic so found by inquisition, generally called a Chancery patient—that is my own phrase—twice at least in every year, and every such lunatic resident in a private house at least four times in each year during the two years next following inquisition. In practice, patients remain on the four-visit list so long as the visitors think they should be kept under special observation, often for many years. To visit all such lunatics or alleged lunatics as the judge in Lunacy (including the Lord Chancellor and the masters) directs. To report to the Lord Chancellor (specially in certain cases); all reports to be kept secret, and destroyed at the death of the patient or supersession of the inquisition. To form a joint Board with the masters for mutual guidance and directions.

48,654. Those duties are statutory?—One or two words I have used are not strictly in the letter of the Statute, but those duties are statutory.

48,655. The requirements as regards visitation are laid down in Sections 183 and 184 of the Lunacy Act of 1890, and the requirements as regards the meeting of the Joint Board in Section 167?—Yes. Section 185 provides for reports, and Section 186 for the reports being kept secret.

48,656. We have heard already that the number of lunatics so found by inquisition is rapidly declining?—Yes.

48,657. That method of finding a person to be a lunatic has become practically obsolete now?—Perhaps that is putting it a little too high, because in contested cases sometimes members of the family have recourse to inquisition, and there are certain cases in which difficulties arise with regard to a lunatic's property abroad, or in the Colonies, in which case a foreign tribunal or administrative body will not recognise anything except an inquisition.

48,658. Is that specially the case as regards Australia?—It is the case, I believe, with regard to Australia or some of the States of Australia, and also the case with some, if not all, of the Canadian Provinces. We occasionally have a new case put on our books for that reason.

48,659. However that may be, we were told that there were only four inquisitions last year?—That may be.

48,643. (Chairman.) At present none of the visiting work is done by women?—No.

48,644. In your opinion, is it desirable that any of it should be done by women?—I think it would be most useful in many cases if we could have women visitors.

48,645. There must be many questions arising in connection with women lunatics that could be best dealt with by women visitors?—No doubt there are many questions of domestic economy, nursing, and so on, in which a woman's advice would be most suitable.

48,646. Even in the case of male lunatics women's advice might be useful?—I think so.

48,647. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would it be a convenient thing if there was a responsible woman official in your office among your other officials?—I do not know what functions she would perform there.

48,648. One to whom certain questions of that type could be referred; one who could advise on some of the patients?—It might be of some use. Of course, the great thing would be to have somebody who could go and see the patients. It is very difficult to find out by correspondence all details of that kind. You really want to see what is actually going on.

48,649. (Chairman.) Has the Board of Control any women as members, or as visitors?—I believe there are two lady members on the Board of Control.

48,660. The total number of persons who may come under your view is something like 5,000?—That I believe to be correct.

48,661. Will you give us the numbers you at present have on your books for the purpose of visiting?—We have 431 inquisition cases and 100 cases placed on the books for regular visitation which are not inquisition cases.

48,662. That makes 531 who all have to be visited twice a year, and some of them more frequently?—Yes, some four times. I may add that we sometimes pay an extra visit if we make a recommendation and are not quite satisfied as to whether it has been carried out, or if we feel special anxiety about a patient. I remember particularly last year paying a visit to a patient, as to whose care I was not satisfied, and to whom I paid several visits in the year, although she was not a four-visit case.

48,663. That is a matter of discretion?—Yes.

48,664. You have further special requests for visits from the masters or from the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, or from the Lords Justices, who are judges in Lunacy.

48,665. Do you ever get requests from the Lords Justices?—The medical visitors frequently do, or not infrequently, at any rate. One case arises which does not often arise now, that if a patient requires a jury the Lords Justices will ask for a visit in order to see whether the patient is really fit to comprehend what he is asking for. Again, if there is a question of superseas the Lords Justices will ask for a visit. Superseas is the means by which inquisition is got rid of.

48,666. What was the total number of special requests on the average of the last four years?—282.

48,667. And for dealing with those cases, what is the annual average number of visits paid?—The number of visits would be the same as the number of requests.

48,668. But I am dealing with the whole of the cases?—The average number of visits that we have paid annually, in the whole of our cases, is 1,371 for the last four years.

48,669. That is about 450 per visitor?—Yes, about that.

48,670. That, of course, involves a good deal of travelling?—It involves a great deal of travelling. The special requests lead to more travelling than the ordinary work, because it is more difficult to fit them in with our regular circuits. Special requests addressed to the medical visitors involve a great deal of additional travelling, because very nearly every medical request is an urgent request. We get a number of requests asking us, when in the neighbourhood, to visit a patient and see whether he is properly cared for; that can wait until we do a series of visits in the neighbourhood. Again, we very often get a request, saying, "Pending a summons for appointment of Receiver," and the question arises whether a patient is capable of managing his affairs. Of course, that has to be disposed of before the summons can be heard, and that means a special journey for a medical visitor, often into some remote part of the country, for the sole purpose of paying that one visit.

10 March 1915.]

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD.

48,671. The average amount of travelling is something like 1,000 miles a week for the three visitors?—Yes, something like that.

48,672. A little over 300 miles per visitor each week?—Yes.

48,673. Have you any office work apart from the actual visiting?—No office work, except the attendance at the Board meetings.

48,674. Such office work as is necessary—the filing of reports and keeping your own lists and books, and so forth, is done by the clerical staff of the office?—Yes, and the secretary attends the office.

48,675. How is the work divided between the three visitors?—We divide the whole country into three districts, and we divide the Metropolitan area also into three districts. In each case it is the North, the West, and the Home. Roughly speaking, the Northern district comprises the area north of a line drawn from the Wash to the middle of Cardigan Bay. The Western, the area south and west of lines drawn from Warwickshire (inclusive) to Cardigan Bay and the Hampshire Avon; that is to say, it takes in the whole of South Wales and the West of England as far as Bournemouth. The Home district comprises the rest of England. The visitors visit in these districts in yearly rotation, so that in the course of three years each visitor becomes acquainted with all the patients on the regular lists; and, what is hardly less important, the patients become acquainted with the visitors.

48,676. So that this year you have one section of the Metropolis and one section of the three districts into which the country is divided?—Yes. This year I have the West, next year I shall have the Home, and the following year I shall have the North.

48,677. And the medical visitors follow in the same rotation?—Yes; Sir James Crichton-Browne follows me, and he will take the West next year.

48,678. Although you are the legal visitor and the others are the medical visitors, I gather there is no substantial difference in the duties which you perform?—No; there is no substantial difference, except this: that the medical visitors have to visit in cases where a medical visit is asked for. Occasionally it happens that a legal visit is asked for, but that is very rare. Theoretically and in practice, I put in a little more attendance at the office than the medical visitors do. When I am in London I generally go to the office, and they only go to the office when they have some special reason for it. We all go to the office at times in order to look into a patient's means, or, perhaps, to see a solicitor who is looking after a patient's affairs, or something of that sort.

48,679. That at once suggests the question, What is the reason for having a legal visitor?—Personally, I regard the work of the legal visitor as certainly the least useful of the three. Legal questions do arise sometimes. Patients sometimes ask legal questions; they write letters sometimes which involve legal questions. The Lord Chancellor sometimes sends down a legal question for a report—not often, but it happens occasionally.

48,680. If there is a legal question of any difficulty, would not that come to the master for decision?—It would, if it was in the course of his administration of a patient's property, certainly.

48,681. But all the patients whom you visit have their property under the administration of the masters?—Yes.*

* This answer is a little too general. The Lord Chancellor occasionally asks for a visit in a case where the master is not administering property. Such a case occurred a few days ago, and one in my own experience about three years ago. In that case the patient had written to the Lord Chancellor complaining of detention.—J. W. M.

48,682. Can there be any legal question with reference to their property which is not under the master's view?—Not with reference to their property.

48,683. What sort of question are you thinking of which may be outside the masters' view?—Sometimes they ask us whether they can make a will, for instance; that happens sometimes in the course of our visits. I had a most elaborate case to discuss the other day as to what could be done with a patient whom we could not find, and who had property in America. This was a question which came down from the Lord Chancellor, and it involved a good deal of research, and it was not a practical question really. A letter had been written, I think, to the Lunacy Commission and had been forwarded to the Lord Chancellor.

48,684. Was that property belonging to a person who was not yet under the control of the masters?—He was not so found, and no order had been made for the reception of his property, and he had come back to this country, having been detained in America, and somehow or other got free again; and I think he wrote to the Lord Chancellor saying that this property was in America, and that the American people would not set it free. Then the question arose as to how it could be got for him, and the difficulty became accentuated because the patient could not be found after he had written this letter. It did involve a considerable amount of legal research which fell upon me.

48,685. What happens if a legal question arises with reference to a patient in the district of one of the medical visitors?—If it was such a question as a medical visitor did not feel able to answer he would probably bring it up at the next Board meeting, and we should discuss it. Sometimes questions arise which involve a certain amount of not exactly the hearing of evidence, because we have no power to administer an oath, but what amounts to the same thing. You have sometimes to report upon questions of fact which a legal visitor is supposed to have more experience in determining than a medical visitor might have. Again, I have heard Master Theobald say that in some cases he would rather have a legal man's report than a medical man's. Medical men do not always take quite the same view of the propriety of detention as a legal man takes. There is a certain amount of conflict between the legal mind and the medical mind as to the propriety of detaining a patient. The legal mind thinks more about the liberty of the subject, and the medical mind is perhaps apt to think more about the future health of the subject and the welfare of the race. They approach the question of discharge from somewhat different standpoints sometimes.

48,686. Does not that make some difficulty, if in one year you have the patient reported on from the one point of view and in the following year from the other point of view?—It might make a difficulty, but then you see we have always got the Board meetings at which we discuss these things. I could give you an instance; I was not really concerned in it, because the difference of opinion was between the two medical visitors. We have recently got a patient removed from Colney Hatch Asylum who is now at any rate in the enjoyment of liberty, although, I believe, he is not formally discharged yet. In that case there was a difference of opinion between my two colleagues as to whether he should have his chance or not, and after a good deal of discussion at the Board it was decided that we ought to advise that he should have his chance.

48,687. That is to say, in a case of doubt the three visitors meet with the two masters, discuss the case all together, and compare notes about it?—As a matter of fact that particular question was not discussed with the masters, who had left the Board. The masters' intervention at the Board is rather personal. They come into the Board meeting with the cases relating to their patients that they want to discuss with the visitors, and when they have disposed of those cases they go back to their work upstairs as a rule. Then the visitors go on discussing among themselves cases on their list which they have been visiting in rotation.

48,688. In your work are there often questions as to whether a man should still be detained or not, or does the great majority of your work relate to

10 March 1915.]

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD.

the material circumstances of the patient, the dealings with his property, the arrangements for his maintenance, and so forth?—The great majority of the work relates to the property of the patient and his maintenance, comfort, and so forth. But, of course, it is very common for patients, when we visit them—particularly in asylums—to ask for their discharge, or to ask for a transfer to another asylum, or for a transfer into private care, or something of that sort. Perhaps they ask for one thing and we feel able to advise another; we say: “The patient is not very happy here; we might try him “in another asylum,” or “He is not happy in an asylum, “and he might be tried under private care.” Such questions arise very frequently, but not so frequently as the question whether he should be allowed drives in a motor-car, or something of that description.

48,689. So the questions you most frequently have to deal with would be largely, I suppose, questions of common sense, knowledge of the world, and knowledge of people?—Yes.

48,690. And partly, also, medical as regards the effect of certain treatment on the patient, the probable development of the disease, and so forth?—Certainly.

48,691. In fact, for dealing with that part of your work you have, to some extent, to acquire a medical point of view as well as a legal point of view?—You do, and one hopes that one does, to a certain extent, acquire that in the course of one's experience. Speaking for myself, as I go on with my work, and get more familiar with the sort of cases that I deal with, I feel a little more competent to help in that direction.

48,692. Looking at the matter entirely apart from personal questions, if you were arranging the system de novo, do you think the system of two medical visitors and one legal visitor is the right one, assuming the three were required?—Speaking quite frankly, I should say that the legal visitor might be dispensed with; but at the same time I hear patients speak so well of my predecessor that I do not think I should say that it is an office which should be lightly dispensed with. I think you could dispense with it, perhaps.

48,693. Who was your predecessor?—Mr. Palmer.

48,694. (Mr. Boutwood.) When you say “dispensed with,” you mean a medical officer should be appointed instead?—I think you would require to have a medical officer appointed instead.

48,695. You do not mean simply to abolish the post?—It is really a question upon which I do not think my opinion, perhaps, is complete. I very highly appreciate the value of my medical colleagues, and I do not know what they would say as to the assistance they may get from having a legal colleague; but I have often felt that my work was really, comparatively speaking, of small importance compared to theirs, and that they could really get on in most cases quite as well without me.

48,696. (Lord Mersey.) I do not quite understand that. On whom would you throw the burden of paying the visits that you pay?—You would have to have another visitor. I do not think you would save the country a visitor.

48,697. (Chairman.) The work could not be got through by two visitors?—No, I do not think it could.

48,698. To whom do you report?—We report to the Lord Chancellor in every case. In cases of special requests we send a report direct to the master.

48,699. When the request comes from the master?—Yes, but in all cases that report also goes to the Lord Chancellor.

48,700. In the inquisition cases, do you report solely to the Lord Chancellor?—In those cases solely to the Lord Chancellor.

48,701. And the master does not see the report unless he asks for it?—No; there are exceptions. The committee of the person is under the direction of the visitors, and, therefore, if we wish a patient to be removed, or an expenditure to be incurred, which his allowance admits of, we give a direction to the committee of the person, and the report upon which that is based is sent to the Lord Chancellor, and does not go to the master at all. On the other hand, if we want to recommend that the allowance of a patient should be increased, that involves the master giving a direction to the committee of the estate, who is not under our direction, and, therefore, we have to send our report to the master as well as to the Lord Chancellor, although he has not asked for one.

48,702. That is to say, where your recommendation requires any action by the master, you send a duplicate copy of the report to the master?—Yes. In those cases we should send the report to the master instead of sending the report to the committee of the person, or, perhaps, as well as sending it to him.

48,703. Except in those cases, the master does not see the report sent to the Lord Chancellor unless he asks for it?—No, he does not see the report sent to the Lord Chancellor unless we wanted him to do something for us.

48,704. In the cases which you visit every six months, is your report of any length, or some such report as “the patient is going on satisfactorily”?—In a great many cases we do not make a special report. We do not do so unless we have a recommendation to make, or unless there is some special reason for calling attention to the patient's state of health. For example, the other day I went to visit a patient, of whom the official solicitor is the committee. The patient had recently moved, and I knew the official solicitor would be glad of a report as to what I found. It was quite satisfactory, and as far as the Lord Chancellor was concerned, I should not have made a report; but I did make a report, because I wanted the official solicitor to know that everything was satisfactory. In the ordinary case, when everything is satisfactory, we have a printed schedule in which we state that we have visited the following patients, and we find that they have been properly maintained, having regard to their means and the schemes for their maintenance, and then we send in that at three-monthly intervals to the Lord Chancellor. It used to be the practice to make a special report in every case, but that was waived a good many years ago.

48,705. Do you think the relations between the visitors and the masters are satisfactory as they are at present, or could they be improved?—I think the relations between the visitors and masters are most satisfactory. The masters are very approachable, and I hope that we are really of considerable assistance to them. I do not see how they could get on with their work without us.

48,706. The point which suggests itself is, whether the relation could not be made an even closer one. As regards the property of the persons whom you visit, you, I understand, have no executive powers?—No.

48,707. You visit and report and recommend?—Yes.

48,708. And the carrying out of those recommendations depends upon the masters?—That is so.

48,709. Except in cases where you are reporting specially to the Lord Chancellor, and in those cases, I presume, if the Lord Chancellor thought anything should be done, he would send the case to the masters?—As I say, if our report involves the necessity of anything being done by the master, it would go to the master, because we should send it to him.

48,710. Even in the cases where the Lord Chancellor has asked for a special report?—Then no doubt he would, if that involved some action on the part of the master, send it to the master.

48,711. So, if any action has to be taken upon the report if it relates to property, it has to be done by the master?—You may go further than that. If a committee does not carry out the suggestions of the visitors, the visitors would go to the master to ask him to put pressure upon the committee, and, if necessary, to remove him. The visitors have really no executive powers, I think I am right in saying, even over our own patients. We have no real powers, although, in effect, the committees always carry out our recommendations; but we can only enforce our requests by going to the master to have the committee removed.

48,712. You are the eyes and ears of the masters, but the executive power rests with the masters?—That is so.

48,713. The point that occurred to me was, that where you have those two functions—the inspecting and the directing functions—as a rule the inspecting branch comes under the direction of the executive branch?—Yes.

10 March 1915.]

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD.

48,714. In the present case, the inspecting branch is entirely independent. The masters may make requests for inspection, but they have no control over your actions and no authority to direct in what order you shall do your work, or anything of that sort?—I think really the section is almost wide enough to give them that authority. It says: "The Chancery visitors shall also visit such persons alleged to be lunatics, and shall make such inquiries and reports in reference to them as the judge in Lunacy directs; and, at the expiration of every six months, they shall report to the Lord Chancellor." I am not sure that the Act provides for it, but in practice we follow the form of the request which comes down from the master. If the master requests that we should visit when in the neighbourhood, we postpone until our own convenience. If the master asks for a visit at earliest convenience, we go as soon as ever we can. It is the master who really settles whether there is to be an immediate report or not.

48,715. You follow his instructions or requests in that respect?—They specify them in turns, which vary according to the urgency of the case. Sometimes they say, "As soon as convenient," sometimes "at earliest convenience," sometimes "there is a summons pending," and it is requested that the visitor will visit soon, in "order that the summons may be disposed of," and then we comply with that request.

48,716. Would there not also be some advantage from the other point of view if you formed part of the same organisation as the masters, and so carried their executive authority?—I should like to consider that, I think, before giving an answer. It would depend upon what executive authority you intended to extend to the visitors.

48,717. What I mean is this: You can give advice and your advice may be followed, but if it is a question of saying, "Do this," it has to go to the master, and a letter has to be written to the receiver or the solicitor, or whoever it is, saying that this must be done?—Yes.

48,718. Would not it be convenient if, in all minor matters at any rate, you could say with the delegated authority of the master, "Do this"?—Yes, I think it would. We do that to a certain extent, and perhaps it would be well if that could be extended. I mean, one visits in a special case and makes a recommendation, and then there is a little difficulty about carrying it out. Then the solicitor makes an appointment to see the visitor, and then the visitor has to say: "You may have to go to the master to get something further done."

48,719. That is the sort of inconvenience which it struck me might arise from the present position?—Yes. I think perhaps it would be a good thing if we could have a little authority to have our recommendations carried out.

48,720. The visitors are appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

48,721. Is there any statutory qualification?—There is a statutory qualification for the legal visitor—a definite qualification. The qualification for the medical visitor is much more indefinite. The legal visitor has to be a barrister of five years' standing. I think all that is required of the medical visitor is that he should be a fit person, being a medical practitioner in actual practice. The barrister has to be a fit person, being a barrister of not less than five years' standing.

48,722–31. (Lord Mersey.) What is a medical practitioner?—He is a person duly registered under the Medical Acts.

48,732. (Chairman.) In fact, have the medical visitors usually been men with experience in charge of asylums or similar posts?—Yes. I have not gone back far. In the case of my colleagues, Sir James Crichton-Browne was medical superintendent of the Crichton Institute, and Dr. Nicolson, my other medical colleague, was medical superintendent at Broadmoor Asylum. Then there was the father of the late Mr. Justice Bucknill; I feel sure he had an asylum experience, but I cannot say where.

48,733. (Lord Mersey.) The Lord Chancellor appoints him?—Yes.

48,734. He is very unlikely to appoint a man who has not, nominally at all events, proper qualifications?—No. I have not armed myself with the names of the predecessors of my colleagues, but from what I have heard them say, in speaking of them, I feel justified in saying, that usually the appointment is made from among asylum superintendents.

48,735. (Chairman.) There is no age limit for retirement, at present?—No.

48,736. Do you think it would be desirable to fix an age limit?—I cannot say that I do. If an age limit had been fixed in the present case, the public would have been deprived of the services of two people whose services are very valuable. Sir James Crichton-Browne is considerably above the age of 65, which is usually the age for retirement, and Dr. Nicolson is also above the age. I may say as regards Dr. Nicolson, that so far from his showing any incapacity, he is still constantly employed by the Home Office in cases of life and death, which of course is not a permanent appointment, and they can employ anybody they like.

48,737. The amount of travelling must be somewhat exacting as years advance?—Yes. I point out in my précis that it affords a guarantee that a man will not go on endeavouring to do his work when his health has begun to break down. As I have also pointed out, there are cases of mental failure unaccompanied by physical failure, and there is ample power to deal with that under the Act, because a visitor is not irremovable; he can be removed either for misconduct or neglect of his duty or for incapacity.

48,738. The office staff is very small?—There are three clerks and the secretary.

48,739. The secretary is not a Civil servant?—No. I may say that considerable economy was effected when a change was made, and a secretary was appointed. There was a chief clerk who received, I believe, 600*l.* a year, or at any rate a materially larger salary than our present secretary receives, which is 300*l.* a year.

48,740. Then he is rather in the position of a private secretary. Is that the nature of his work?—I suppose that is so. He is appointed by the Lord Chancellor. As a matter of fact our present secretary was in the Lord Chancellor's office as a private secretary before his appointment.

48,741. And are the other clerks appointed also by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

48,742. Their work consists in keeping records and books and files of reports, and so forth?—Yes, and answering formal letters.

48,743. General clerical work, not involving much responsibility?—Purely clerical work.

48,744. In their case there is no age limit for retirement?—No.

48,745. Are any of them past the age of 65?—Two of them are.

48,746. Do you find them perfectly efficient still?—One of them is very efficient. I do not know that I could say as much for the other.

48,747. Do you see any reason why the general Civil Service rule should not apply to that purely clerical staff?—No, I cannot see any reason why it should not.

48,748. You suggest some economy of labour might be effected by the use of typewriters?—Yes.

48,749. Is there a great deal of copying?—There is. The average number of special reports sent in by the visitors to the Lord Chancellor is 372. Every one of those has to be copied, and some of them are of considerable length.

48,750. And some of them are in duplicate, if they are reports that go to the master?—Yes, some of them are in duplicate.

48,751. Is a copy also filed in the office?—What happens is this. In regard to patients that we visit regularly, when we make a report we put it down in a notebook and that is copied in the office, and it goes to the Lord Chancellor. If it goes also to the master a duplicate copy would have to be made, but where the master sends a special request we write our report on paper in order that it may go to him at once. A copy is made of that. The master keeps the original. The copy is sent to the Lord Chancellor, and all the copies that go to the Lord Chancellor come back to us and are filed in the office, so we do not require to have a copy made to file in the office, the one that goes to the Lord Chancellor being filed in the office. There would be one copy in every case, and in some cases two.

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD.

48,752. There would be economy of time and money and also convenience in using a typewriter?—Yes; our secretary has gone so far as to say that he thought he could do with two clerks if one of them was a typist.

48,753. You have a shorthand writer?—Yes, but he does not do any shorthand writing.

48,754. Why not?—I believe it came about in this way. He was appointed as a shorthand writer, and he used only once a month on the day following board meeting day to take down in shorthand the secretary's letters to committees which arose out of the business of the board. Then I believe it was on account of his sight failing, or threatening to fail, that the late secretary, who is now secretary to the Lunacy Commission, relieved him of the duty of taking down his letters and wrote his own letters in longhand, and since then he has not done duty as a shorthand writer.

48,755. Does he do duty as an ordinary clerk?—Yes, he does a great deal of work. He copies all the special reports on special requests, amongst other things, and these occupy a great deal of his time.

48,756. But if you had a shorthand writer and typist, that copying would be spared?—Two of the clerks share that duty between them, one copying the reports from the notebooks, and the other the reports from the paper. If we had a typewriter there would be considerable economy in labour there.

48,757. (Mr. Matheson.) Is there any work in the office for which a man of the quality of a second class clerk is required?—I think I might say, No, to that, because, in point of fact, as to our three clerks, the one who was appointed as shorthand clerk is nominally a temporary clerk, although he has been with us for 18 years, and, I think, each of the others began in the same way. I do not think either of them have ever qualified in any way as second class clerks, but the senior clerk, when he became the senior clerk, became a second class clerk.

48,758. Which is really promotion?—Which is really promotion.

48,759. Is your office contiguous to that of the masters?—Immediately below it. The masters' office is up one flight of stairs.

48,760. Are the visitors pensionable officers?—Yes, I believe we are on the ordinary Civil Service basis.

48,761. I gather that, on the whole, you think medical visitors are probably more useful than legal ones, but that there is some advantage in occasionally having an independent opinion which is not confined to the profession of medicine?—That is my opinion, and since I replied to the Chairman it has occurred to me that not infrequently a patient says to me: "You are the legal visitor, are you not?" and I say: "Yes"; and he says: "You are the person I want to see." I do not know that it does him much good, but it gives him some satisfaction.

48,762. Supposing there were three medical visitors, would it be possible to provide for an extra opinion of a legal kind in some other way—in a more occasional way, do you think?—It would be possible to provide for a legal opinion being obtained, of course, but you would not get your opinion from a man who knew the patients, and was familiar with the work of the officers, and the work that was being done.

48,763. The effect is that the present arrangement really gives the lunatic the opportunity of getting legal advice or legal conversation from a person with whom he is familiar and whom he knows?—That is true.

48,764. (Mr. Shipley.) How many establishments altogether do the visitors visit during the year?—In every half year we visit 68 asylums and 128 private houses, in the course of visiting the patients on our books. A few of the private houses have to be visited twice in each half year. So that in each half year we pay rather more than 200 visits to separate establishments in visiting patients on our books—say 410 to 415 per annum. The special requests, which I have stated average 282 per annum, each entail a separate visit, with the exception of a small percentage which can be made to fit in with our ordinary visits to asylums. The total number of separate visits to establishments would thus work out approximately at about 675.

48,765. (Mr. Coward.) How many patients do you visit in one day?—I think at Virginia Water, which is a large mental hospital, we have, perhaps a dozen patients, or ten, and we can visit those ten or a dozen persons in one day; but on another day it takes the whole of the day to visit one.

48,766. There is a distinction drawn in the list we have before us between the visits—1,371 in one case, and about half that number in the other case?—Those are the numbers of visits to patients: not visits to different establishments.

48,767. (Mr. Shipley.) Is your office in London in the Law Courts?—Yes.

48,768. How do you decide, when a case comes up, whether you shall go or the medical visitors go?—It is decided in this way: We have our districts; if the case is in the west, say, I go to it, unless there is a request for a medical visitor, in which case one of the medical visitors will go to it, and they visit out of their districts in turn.

48,769. Then you are pretty constantly in the train?—Very frequently.

48,770. Do all the visitors live in London?—Sir James Crichton-Browne lives in London. Dr. Nicolson lives in the country. I live in the country part of the time, and in London part of the time.

48,771. It was suggested this morning that it might be an advantage if the visitors were done away with, and local people were appointed visitors from time to time. Do you think that that plan would work at all well?—It would work in many cases, no doubt, but I think there are reasons why local people are undesirable. You are more free from prejudice, for example, when you go from the Central Office, and when it comes to a question of determining whether a patient is fit to manage his own affairs you want the very best man you can get.

48,772. Has your business as visitor increased much in the last 10 or 15 years?—Looking at the last four years, since I have been a visitor, I think it has been about stationary. I do not suppose there has been very much diminution in the last four years in the number of Chancery patients, but if there is a diminution, it is balanced more or less by the number of special visits.

48,773. Are you at all acquainted with the management of this sort of thing in any other country besides England?—No, I am not.

48,774. You do not know whether in the United States, or, in normal times, in, say, France, the lunatics are better or worse looked after than ours?—I have met with lunatics who, I think, have said that they were both better looked after and worse looked after in foreign countries, but I cannot really say with any knowledge on the subject. As to how we divide our work, I might say that I undertake a certain amount by arrangement with the secretary. If I find that one of the medical visitors is getting over-pressed, I say: "Send me something of his I can go to, which may be 'on my road,' and so on. We work it for mutual convenience as far as possible.

48,775. (Sir John Kempe.) I see you say in your notes that the staff for the masters' office is recruited from a higher class than that of the visitors, but the scales of salary are the same in both offices?—I am speaking from information furnished to me by our secretary, and also to a certain extent from observation, because one is brought in contact with the masters' clerks occasionally. They are mostly either solicitors or barristers I am given to understand; their work is more administrative, I understand, than ours. I really do not know about the internal working of the masters' office, but that is the information given to me by our secretary. I asked him particularly with reference to the suggestion as to amalgamating the two staffs, and his answer was: "Well, their work is different from 'ours, and they have a higher class of clerk to do it."

10 March 1915.]

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD.

48,776. Your clerks are not qualified as barristers or solicitors, as the others are?—Our clerks are not qualified in any way.

48,777. (Mr. Coward.) I do not understand that you have any office hours or do attend at the office, except that you come down when you are in town?—No; I was there this morning, for instance. Sometimes there is something which the secretary wishes to see me about, or there may be a letter he wishes to consult me about, and so on. Sometimes one finds there is a message from the master, but it is purely voluntary work as far as I am concerned.

48,778. Your work consists really in paying visits?—Yes.

48,779. What is the average number of visits that you pay in a week—I mean going to different places?—I think really I am actually travelling about three days a week during term time, sometimes two, sometimes four; but I should think on the average I am travelling about three days, or, if not travelling, one may be going about London paying visits. Then we do not pay much regard to term time, because we pay our visits in vacation too.

48,780. I was going to ask you that question. When you are travelling you cannot tell how long your journey may take you; that is to say, if you had to go down to Bath, for instance, it would take you many hours?—Yes.

48,781. On the other hand, if you had to go to Virginia Water, probably the whole thing would take half a day?—Yes, that would be so. Very likely, then you are able to put in another visit the same day.

48,782. Do you have no vacation?—We have a vacation in this sense, that we do not have Board meetings in vacation. We regulate our own work to a great extent.

48,783. The masters are away for the whole of the vacations?—Yes, but they do a certain amount of work even when they are away. It is not often that I get a request during vacation, but the medical visitors do sometimes. I have to see to a request sometimes.

48,784. Do you do any of these visitings in vacations?—Oh dear, yes. Personally I have generally arranged so that I do not do any visiting in September, but that is because I have got through my work before.

48,785. The actual amount of travelling that you do is not at all excessive. A man who lives at Brighton and comes up to town four days a week would probably do more travelling than you do?—Yes.

48,786. And do his day's work besides on each of the four days?—But he does not have to wait about at junctions or jump into motor cars. It is not only the travelling, but when you have got to the end of your day, then you very often have to write reports and things of that sort. You have not done your day's work when your travelling is done, and you are sleeping away from home so much, too; you are rarely sleeping two nights in the same bed.

48,787. Yes, that is so; but I thought I understood you to say that your reports consisted of notes made in your notebook at the time you made your visit?—I make notes in a little pocket-book in pencil, but we have what we call a report-book, and I write that up if I can the same evening, and sometimes I put it off to a day or two afterwards.

48,788. I suppose you never had the enjoyment of having a shorthand typist?—No.

48,789. You do not therefore know whether the shorthand typist would do the whole work of your office except that of the secretary?—I do not think he could do that, because so much of the work consists of keeping books.

48,790. Would not the secretary do that? You have a second class clerk, a third class clerk, and a shorthand writer. If you had a shorthand typist, I was wondering whether he would not do the work of the three?—Then you suggest that the secretary should keep the books. There are a considerable number of books to prepare. Our instruction-books, for instance, require a good deal of preparation and transcribing. They could not be done by typing, and there are records of incomes and there are a number of ledgers.

48,791. What office hours do those men keep?—Their office hours are from 10 to 4—the usual hours in the Law Courts.

48,792. And what vacations have they?—The two senior clerks, who are Civil servants, divide the vacations between them. The third clerk does not come in vacation unless he is specially required.

48,793. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Do you pay your visits with or without notice?—The rule is to pay visits without notice; on the other hand there are exceptions. We have a good many patients who are out a great deal; sometimes out in their motor cars. I have been to an asylum at Exeter and found that a patient had gone to Newbury Races. In those sort of cases, if we are satisfied that the patient is properly looked after, we sometimes give notice. Sometimes patients particularly ask for notice because they say they are so upset by our visits unless they have time to prepare for them.

48,794. You told us that what was essentially required in your work was common sense?—Yes.

48,795. A kind of fresh common sense in dealing with those rather difficult questions?—Yes.

48,796. Would you say that a visitor who had developed crankiness and faddiness might do an almost unlimited amount of harm?—Yes, I think he might.

48,797. Looking at the world generally, crankiness and faddiness are sometimes the results of old age or they come with old age?—That is so, no doubt. I referred to my predecessor. I have never heard him spoken of otherwise than affectionately by patients. I have really been quite touched sometimes by the way they have spoken of him.

48,798. But a cranky old gentleman who is greatly beloved by lunatic patients may nevertheless be a bad visitor?—He might be; but I certainly should not say that of my predecessor, because it is not only the lunatic patients who so spoke of him, but people who look after the lunatics.

48,799. Is your predecessor dead?—No.

48,800. What age was your predecessor when he left?—I think within a little of 70—70 or 71. His health broke down and he had to give it up.

48,801. Is it the duty of anyone to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to any defect of efficiency in a visitor?—No, it is nobody's definite duty.

48,802. The visitors are usually appointed at a fairly advanced age?—Yes; of course there are exceptions. Sir James Crichton-Browne was not at an advanced age when he was appointed.

48,803. And they get a pension based upon the number of their years' service?—Yes.

48,804. So normally they hardly ever stay on after the full 40 years, or till the full 40 years?—They get a number of added years. You do not have to serve the full 40 years for a pension.

48,805. But unless they become very old they do not normally stay till even their full years, including the added years?—No, I should think not.

48,806. Do you realise that that arrangement does constitute a very great inducement to a man to stay on year after year when every year makes an addition to his pension?—Yes, I see that.

48,807. Would you agree that that is a reason why a man holding that kind of post should have an age limit?—Yes, it is a reason, certainly; but I should not be disposed to agree that it might not be counter-balanced by other reasons.

48,808. Two of your three clerks are 65 years of age?—Yes.

48,809. One of them was appointed at the age of 46?—I do not know what his age was when he was appointed.

48,810. Do you know why he was appointed to your office?—No, I cannot tell you why. He was in the Post Office originally. I do not know who appointed him.

48,811. The shorthand writer put down here, you told us, became too blind shortly after his appointment to write shorthand?—His eyes threatened to give way, so I am given to understand.

48,812. In other departments of the Government a man who cannot do his work gets a compassionate

10 March 1915.]

The Hon. JOHN WILLIAM MANSFIELD.

allowance, or something of that kind. Was that ever suggested in the case of the shorthand writer here?—No, because Mr. Dickinson dispensed with his work as a shorthand clerk, and he has been able to fill up his time in other ways.

48,813. Then it was arranged that he should write in longhand what he had hitherto written in shorthand?—No, he only did shorthand work on one day in the month.

48,814. You say the shorthand writer does not come at all in the Long Vacation?—No.

48,815. He is down here as receiving 2*l.* 10*s.* a week. Is that paid during the Long Vacation?—Yes, I think he gets his 130*l.* a year.

48,816. In the office there is no woman at all?—No.

48,817. Do you think that in some cases it might be a convenience that there should be a woman about the place?—Do you mean in the capacity of visitor?

48,818. No, I am thinking first of their being actually in the office. I suppose patients sometimes wander into the office?—Pretty rarely.

48,819. At any rate women would do the shorthand and typewriting very well as an official?—Yes, they would do that very well.

48,820. Have you considered whether it would be a convenience to have a lady doctor, for instance, among the visitors?—I have not considered the question. I do not feel certain that a lady doctor would command the same confidence.

48,821. Do you know whether in the office there is a time-book?—I do not think there is. I am not aware that there is.

48,822. Whose duty would it be to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the fact if one of those old gentlemen of 65 was not turning up with sufficient regularity?—I suppose it would be my duty.

48,823. Do you know in fact whether they turn up regularly?—Yes, very regularly.

48,824. You told us that in a normal week you do about three days' travelling?—I should say that is about right.

48,825. For how many weeks in the year does that go on?—I reckon that the legal year is about 36 weeks, and I should think I am doing that travelling for about the 36 weeks and some weeks in vacation, too—probably three or four weeks in vacation—so probably it would be about 40 weeks in a year.

48,826. So you are travelling about 110 days in a year?—Yes, 110 to 120.*

48,827. Have you any really laborious duties on the days you do not travel?—No. Sometimes one is writing reports on those days.

48,828. It may happen that you write up a report?—Yes.

48,829. But, normally speaking, on the other days of the 365 your duties do not exist?—Perhaps I ought not to say they do not exist, but they are not onerous, certainly. One has a certain amount of correspondence. One gets letters from patients, and one writes up reports, and so forth.

48,830. Do you think, if a leaving age was arranged so that one could assume that every one of the visitors was of normal bodily health, that that number of 110 to 120 working days might be increased?—I should not like to be too closely pinned to those 110 or 120 days, but possibly they might.

48,831. (Lord Mersey.) What is your travelling? I see you say in your précis that the average number of miles travelled by the visitors was 1,000 miles a week. That means the whole three travelled 1,000 miles a week?—Yes.

48,832. So you would travel about 330 miles or so?—Yes. I think in justice to the other visitors I ought to say that they travel more than I do, because, as I have already pointed out, they get the special medical requests which involve special journeys to see single patients, so a certain deduction should be made from my mileage and added to theirs.

48,833. Are these people that you visit gathered together in particular spots—in an asylum, for instance? Do you see several on the same day?—Yes, in the asylums we do. I dare say our regular patients are about equally divided; that is to say, the inquisition patients between the asylums and the private cases; but the bulk of our journeying is going to see private cases.

* In making this estimate I was thinking of the work in my present district—the Western. Some addition should be made for the Northern district, and a much larger addition for the Home district. It ought not to be taken as applying to the Medical Visitors. See my answer to Q. 48,832.—J. W. M.

Mr. STANLEY LEATHES, C.B., called and examined.

48,834. (Chairman.) You hold the post of First Civil Service Commissioner?—Yes.

48,835. How long have you held that position?—Since the beginning of 1910 as First Commissioner. I first became a Commissioner in 1907, and previous to that I was secretary and began to hold that office at the end of 1903.

48,836. As you are aware, this Commission is dealing with the legal departments. Will you tell us which appointments to the legal departments come before the Civil Service Commission for certification?—Messengers and ushers and officials of that kind are certified by us just like messengers for other departments. Besides them there are practically only the clerks in the various branches of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and those in the Land Registry, which I suppose is not a branch of the Supreme Court.

48,837. You have nothing to do with the higher appointments, such as masters and registrars?—Nothing at all. I cannot remember any office of that kind for which we certificate.

48,838. In the case of the clerks, what do you require before you issue your certificate?—The clerks are nominated, as you know, and we receive the nominations as a rule from the secretary to the Lord Chancellor. After nomination in the ordinary course we proceed to examine them, under the scheme which I think has been laid before you, to ascertain that they are within the limits of age, and that they are in sufficiently good health to afford a reasonable prospect of service for a long time.

48,839. For that purpose do you require a medical certificate?—Yes. Also we get evidence as to character.

48,840. In some cases are they exempt from examination?—They can only be exempted from examination with the consent of the Treasury on the application of the Lord Chancellor, when the use of Clause 7 is granted; and in that case, although the use of Clause 7 may be granted, we should not exempt them from examination unless certain conditions were fulfilled. Those conditions are: (1) That they shall be not less than 25 years of age. (2) In the first class the candidate can be exempted if he is a solicitor of five years' standing in actual practice at the time of nomination. (3) In the second class exemption is allowed when the nominee is an admitted solicitor or a managing clerk in actual employment for the previous five years.

48,841. (Mr. Coward.) The first one does not include the managing clerks?—No, it does not.

48,842. (Chairman.) That is appointment direct to the first class?—They are very rare. I am not sure that there have been any. In the third class exemption can be allowed only when the nominee is a bona fide clerk to a solicitor at the time of nomination, in actual employment for seven years, and not less than 25 years of age. In addition, barristers of five years' standing in actual practice may be exempted from examination if they are nominated for the first class clerkships; and for the second class clerkships, candidates who have been for not less than 10 years clerks to one of His Majesty's judges or a barrister of the rank of king's counsel.

48,843. In fact you may say generally that the conditions of exemption are that the candidates should be over the age of 25, and have a certain degree of experience in the law in one capacity or another?—That is so.

10 March 1915.]

Mr. STANLEY LEATHES, C.B.

48,844. The amount of that experience varying according to the class to which he is to be appointed?—That is so.

48,845. I see, from the figures you have put before us, that the number of exemptions from examination is comparatively small compared with the number of those who are examined?—Yes, it is.

48,846. Taking third class clerkships, you give 186 who were admitted after examination, and 43 who were exempt from examination?—That is right.

48,847. You have also been good enough to give us a very interesting return* showing the previous experience of the persons appointed in the last 15 or 16 years, and other particulars about them?—Yes.

48,848. I gather from the return, as might be gathered also from the number of exemptions from examination, that it is only in the minority of cases that the candidate has had previous legal experience?—That is so. Very considerably less than one-half have had any legal experience beforehand.

48,849. Taking the cases where a candidate has had five years' experience or more as a clerk to a solicitor, or in some other legal work outside the public service, I make out that there are 61 who have had such experience to 172 who have not had such experience. Would you agree to those figures?—Those, no doubt, are right, as taken from our return. I have not taken out the particulars myself, but I am quite prepared to believe that that is about the proportion.

48,850. That is to say, roughly, about one-quarter only have had legal experience to any extent?—Legal experience to matter. There are a certain proportion of others who have had some trifling legal experience of some kind or other.

48,851. I make it that there are about 30 others who have had experience shorter than five years, and generally in those cases some other occupation has intervened before appointment?—Yes.

48,852. So, taking what you may call substantial legal experience, the proportion is not more than one-quarter?—That is so.

48,853. As regards the offices to which those appointments are made, it would seem, from the particulars you have been kind enough to give, that, especially in the Principal Probate Registry, and the Central Office, and the Admiralty Registry, candidates are appointed without previous legal experience?—Yes. A good many of the clerks in the Land Registry are appointed to the second class. That is the only substantial number of appointments direct to the second class, and they, so far as I can make out, are pretty nearly all barristers, or persons of considerable legal experience.

48,854. One may infer from that, that the appointing authorities have not considered previous legal experience to be by any means an indispensable qualification for appointment?—That is a reasonable inference.

48,855. The examination is, I think, of a very elementary character?—Yes, very elementary. We have been asked to make it more elementary often enough, but we have declined to do that.

48,856. Do any substantial number of candidates fail to pass it?—Yes, I should say so. I am not quite sure how many fail ultimately, but many certainly fail once or twice.

48,857. They are allowed another try?—They are always allowed another try, if they are re-nominated.

48,858. The examination consists, practically, of spelling, writing, and arithmetic, with the addition of some digesting of returns?—Yes, and indexing, and English composition. It is not a very severe test, but it is a test which goes a little beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic.

48,859. It has been suggested that open competition should be applied for recruiting these appointments. What is your opinion on that suggestion?—I, personally, can see no objection. Of course, I do not know anything about the inside of the law courts, and there may be reasons which make it necessary that these persons should all be nominated, but they have never been communicated to me or to my department.

48,860. So far as you can judge from what you see of the persons who come to be certificated, do they differ materially either in extraction or education or personal qualities from candidates who enter the public service by, say, the examination for the second division?—If you compare them with candidates for the second division, I should say some of them, undoubtedly, come from social classes higher than those which you would expect to find competing for the second division; others, again, come from classes which are lower than those which you would expect to find competing for the second division. If you compare them in bulk, from the point of view of the instruction that they have received, which is the only real test we can apply to them, I should say that they were not only inferior to the candidates for the second division, but to the candidates for assistant clerkships; that is, taking them in bulk; but there are exceptions, no doubt.

48,861. Taking them in bulk, in educational qualifications they are inferior to the assistant clerk class?—Yes; I should say so.

48,862. Would you expect that the result of recruitment by open competition would be to raise the standard of education and intellectual attainment?—I should say so, certainly. The salary is pretty good, even in the third class; they begin at 100*l.* a year, which is an inducement to a great many people.

48,863. That is a better commencing salary than in the second division?—It is; and much better, of course, than the assistant clerks' salary, and the maximum of the third class is also better than the maximum of the assistant clerk as at present.

48,864. And there are also prospects of promotion to the higher classes?—There are prospects of promotion.

48,865. It has been suggested to us by some witnesses that previous legal experience is of great importance, not only for the particular knowledge that a candidate would have acquired, but also as giving a legal outlook. From that point of view it has been suggested that you might have competition amongst persons who have certain defined legal experience. Do you think that that is a practical suggestion?—I find it rather hard to imagine how such experience could be defined. We have already one condition laid down, without which exemption from examination is not to be granted, namely, that a candidate should have served for seven years as a bona fide clerk to solicitors. We find it very hard to say what is a bona fide clerk to solicitors. Is an office boy a bona fide clerk to a solicitor? They begin very often at 14, 15, or 16, and a solicitor says: "This young man has been our bona fide clerk for seven years"; but we find it very difficult to believe that a clerk is a bona fide clerk to solicitors at the age of 14 or 15, and yet he is returned as such, and if we make inquiries we probably receive a rude reply.

48,866. We have been told that solicitors' clerks generally begin as "bag-carriers," and come gradually to more responsible work. You would have some difficulty in saying whether, in the bag-carrying stage, they should be called bona fide clerks to solicitors?—Yes. That is probably what they are. Perhaps "office boy" is the wrong term. I am not up in the technicalities.

48,867. You think that that would create some difficulty in applying the system of limited competition for the recruitment of this service?—I feel we should find great difficulty in scrutinising the certificates which say that "So-and-so" has been a bona fide clerk to solicitors for a certain number of years, and we should either have to engage in somewhat quarrelsome investigations or else we should have to let them all through simply on the certificate.

48,868. We have been told that legal experience is thought more necessary and valuable in certain departments than in others; in particular in the Chancery departments. Do you see any difficulty in applying a scheme of open competition to certain departments and having a system of nomination in others, or a system of limited competition in others?—I do not think it would be easy. It might be done. Of course, if you had admission to the clerical service of the Law Courts at two different points, supposing you admitted them by open competition straight into the second class, then you might have some substantial qualification of a legal kind; you might say that a man should have been an articulated clerk for a certain time, or even say that he should be an admitted solicitor. I am not at all sure that you would not get a field in that way. But, if you are going to admit them at the bottom, I find it very difficult to suppose that you would get any substantial qualification which could be tested for the lowest grade. You might, but I see a difficulty. I also see a difficulty in making a difference between one office and another.

* Vide Appendix XCVII.

Mr. STANLEY LEATHES, C.B.

48,869. Taking the case which you put of admission to the second class, you were suggesting competition with the previous qualification of certain substantial legal experience?—Yes.

48,870. When a man had acquired that substantial experience and was qualified for the second class, would not he have usually passed what you may call the competition age?—I think if the competition were definitely in legal subjects he might be well examined. Of course, all of us who have been examined have found that as we got a little older we disliked being examined more and more, and we were less inclined to think that we had done justice to ourselves; but if you are going to be examined in the matters which occupy your constant attention in the pursuit of your profession, I think that objection disappears to a certain extent. I should not like to examine people very late in life, but it is possible that in professional subjects examination up to the age of 30 is not objectionable.

48,871. In general subjects what would you put as the limit of examinable age?—Of course, if you have the qualification of an admitted solicitor, then, no examination in general subjects would be required because they have to pass that in some form or other in order to be admitted as solicitors.

48,872. (Mr. Coward.) And a very good examination too?—Yes, a very good one. If you cannot put the qualification as high as that—I am not at all sure you could not—you might still have the subjects of English composition and possibly arithmetic, which I think, people can go on being examined in, though perhaps not with great comfort, until the age of 30. It is the real scholastic subjects which one cannot examine in, after people have left off studying. You cannot examine them profitably in history or geography or mathematics or things of that sort.

48,873. (Chairman.) Supposing open competition proved impracticable, would you suggest an improvement of the present qualifying examination?—That would depend partly on the limits of age laid down.

48,874. Taking appointments to the third class, the present limits of age are, I think, 20 to 30?—Yes.

48,875. In the first place, would you suggest any modification of those age limits?—I see no advantage in going up to 30 unless you are going to exact some substantial legal experience. On the contrary, I am inclined to think that a young man who is willing, at the age of nearly 30, to take a post of this kind, has probably failed in one or more professions.

48,876. And if you are not going to have previous legal experience, would not there be some advantage in lowering the limit?—Undoubtedly. I should put it quite low—certainly not later than 25.

48,877. Would you also modify the lower limit of 20?—Yes, I think you might well begin at 18, only 100% is rather too much to offer a young man of 18 unless he has received a substantial education.

48,878. Supposing you had a limit of 18 to 25, what kind of qualifying examination do you think would be suitable for appointment to the third class?—There is another alternative, if I may be allowed to suggest it. There is not only the possibility (1) of open competition and (2) of a qualifying examination of nominated candidates, but also the possibility of limited competition; that is to say, a competition of persons nominated in excess of the number of posts to be filled.

48,879. That system is in force at present for certain Civil Service appointments?—Yes, a considerable number.

48,880. Do you think that that would be a suitable system for the cases we are now considering?—Yes, I should think it would. There must be heaps of young men quite as well qualified as those who appear in this list, and it is not much more trouble to nominate two or three than to nominate one.

48,881. And then have a competition between those who are nominated?—Yes.

48,882. In an examination of that kind, or in the qualifying examination, would it be practicable to include legal subjects?—Difficult, I think. If you once begin to include legal subjects, I think you must assume that the candidates have left all kinds of schools, and have turned their attention to the law and the law alone. If you are going to have a competition in law, I should not have any general subjects except English composition and, perhaps, arithmetic.

48,883. Would it be practicable, do you think, to devise a legal examination which would be suitable for men without very long experience of the law, and at the same time would not be a suitable subject for cram?—It would be very difficult, I should think, just because you make a qualification that they are not to have had much experience of the law and not to have been at it long. If you try to catch people who, although not qualified solicitors, have been working for the solicitors' examination, you might have an examination like the solicitors' examination but of a somewhat lower standard. Although, of course, like all other examinations, it is more or less susceptible of cramming, I do not think it would be specially objectionable on that ground. It would have to be a substantial examination in law if it was not to be a cram examination, nor an examination which could be got round by cramming.

48,884. The matter with which the clerks have to deal in the offices is much more legal procedure and forms than the substance of the law itself?—So I understand.

48,885. So that if the examination was to have any relation to their future work, it would be rather in matters of that kind than in law in general?—Yes. On the other hand, I should imagine that anything that you could learn about legal procedure before you had actually come into contact with it, or had actually to carry it out, or assist in carrying it out, or see other people carry it out, could only be a matter of cramming.

48,886. (Lord Mersey.) And very worthless?—I should have thought so.

48,887. (Chairman.) Suggestions have been made, I think, as to adding some legal subjects to the qualifying examinations?—That is so. On the representations which came from the Lord Chancellor's Office we had correspondence. The Lord Chancellor's Office were very anxious to get rid of the digesting of returns and the indexing, so we said if that was to be removed we must have something substantial in its place. Then correspondence followed, and it was suggested that legal procedure should be included. However, that correspondence came to an abrupt end when this Commission was nominated, so that we got no further about it. I think, probably, we should have come to some agreement with the Lord Chancellor's Office about the kind of legal procedure which it was desirable to examine in, and which it was possible to examine in, but I think they, as far as I remember the correspondence, were coming to the conclusion that the examination in legal procedure should not be prior to admission but afterwards.

48,888. In fact, that it should be of the nature of probation?—Yes.

48,889. After a man had been in the office for a certain period he would have to pass a qualifying test?—Five years, I think was said. The candidate was to pass another test before being promoted to the second class. That was, I think, the proposition to which the correspondence was leading up, but it came to an abrupt end, and neither party saw the other's mind quite clearly.

48,890. As regards the higher officers with whom at present you have nothing to do, you are aware that a scheme was recommended by the Commission in their earlier Reports for dealing with appointments to professional offices. That recommendation contemplated a committee on which, amongst others, the Civil Service Commission should be represented, to report on the qualifications of candidates to the authority who finally made the appointment?—Yes.

Mr. STANLEY LEATHES, C.B.

48,891. Can you form an opinion as to whether a scheme of that kind would be applicable to the higher appointments in the legal departments?—May I ask what kind of higher appointments you are thinking of—not second and first class clerks?

48,892. No, I am thinking now of the posts of masters and registrars with salaries of 1,200*l.* and 1,500*l.* a year?—Yes. It seems to me it could be applied to them.

48,893. Can you form an opinion as to whether it would be advantageous?—It depends upon the system which it is desired to displace.

48,894. The present system is a system of appointment in many cases by the Lord Chancellor, and in other cases by other high legal officers—the heads of different divisions of the Supreme Court?—That sounds a most admirable manner of appointment.

48,895. Are you prepared to say whether you think a committee to assist those officers in their choice would be an advantage?—It ought not to be.

48,896. Would you say that those high officers should be able to appoint suitable persons without the assistance of a committee?—Surely.

48,897. In the legal offices there is a certain amount of work of a purely mechanical and routine nature which is done mainly by third class clerks at present, and there is work of a more difficult and important kind which is done by the first and second class clerks. Based on that division of work, a suggestion has been made that third class clerks should be recruited without any prospects of promotion to the higher classes, and that the higher classes should be recruited separately by appointments directly to the second class or even sometimes to the first class. This would introduce a bar between the third class and the higher classes somewhat similar to that which exists, say, between the second division and the first division in the Civil Service generally. Can you form an opinion on that question of organisation?—I should have thought that it would, wherever it was possible to introduce it, bring about a very considerable economy of talent. It is a very great waste of time to put a man who is fit to eventually become a second or first class clerk to many years of drudgery on the barest routine. It is not only a waste of his talents for the time being, but it probably leads to a permanent deterioration of them; it takes the edge off him.

48,898. On the other hand, would you not get a discontented class if you had men who came into that class with no prospect of rising beyond 200*l.* a year?—I should not like to make too absolute a bar. I think everyone should feel that there is promotion before him, although it may be difficult to attain. I should suppose that if the system you suggest were set up, promotion would be so rare that perhaps the position of the lower clerks would not be entirely satisfactory. Although the great majority of assistant clerks in the Civil Service do not actually get promoted, promotion is fairly within their reach; and as things are they are not very well content, as you know.

48,899. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I have before me the return of particulars as to candidates nominated. By “nominated” you mean nominated and appointed?—No, “nominated” is nominated, I think.

48,900. Then I am not to assume that all of them were appointed?—I think they must have all been appointed. I do not think we should have put them down if not appointed. When I say “nominated” means nominated, it makes a certain difference to the dates; some of the numbers do not quite agree, because one table is a table of people certificated in a particular year and another is a table of people nominated in a particular year.

48,901. Those are nominated and ultimately certificated?—That is so.

48,902. Looking at the first column, “Father’s profession,” I find in the case of eight of those persons the father’s profession is put down as an official in the Probate Registry?—Yes.

48,903. There are two other cases in which the father’s profession is put down as “Civil servant,” where the occupation at the time of nomination was temporary employment in the Probate Registry. Therefore, one supposes that that is some indication that the father was a Civil servant in the Probate Registry?—That I could not be sure about. If you like to have those things looked up I will have them looked up.

48,904. I should like it.—Just where the words “Civil servant” are mentioned?*

48,905. Yes. Should I be right in presuming that, at any rate in those eight cases where the father is returned as an official in the Probate Registry, the appointment probably was made in the Probate Registry?—I think so. I think the nomination for the Probate Registry proceeds from the head of that branch. No doubt it is presented to the Lord Chancellor and approved by him, but I should suppose it would originate in the Probate Registry.

48,906. This must make a large proportion of the officials in the Probate Registry, and one may say it is always the custom in the Probate Registry that the newly-appointed officials are sons of old officials?—The Probate Registry is a large office. I should say the proportion is not very large.

48,907. But important?—Seventy-eight have been appointed in that time.

48,908. On page 2 of your return there is one whose father’s profession was “district probate registrar”?—Yes; and there is another one above, whose father held the same office.

48,909. He was appointed at the age of 28?—Yes.

48,910–18. May I presume that he was appointed in the Probate Registry?—I am informed that he was.

48,919. Then judges’ clerks and barristers’ clerks are exempt from all examination?—Yes, judges’ clerks and barristers’ clerks of a certain standing.

48,920. Do you know why?—It was done at the instance of the Lord Chancellor, and I suppose the Treasury raised no objection, because they thought that a judge was not likely to have an incompetent clerk.

48,921. Is it partly because a barrister’s clerk usually follows up his master throughout his career, and is, in his origin, a person very likely of small education? Would you say that?—Certainly I do not understand that they are exempt from examination because they are supposed to be less likely to pass than anybody else, but because they are supposed to have obtained in those capacities qualifications which are adequate for the duties intended. But you must remember, please, that although we may be consulted about these arrangements they are really made between the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury. We are not actually responsible for them.

48,922. The purpose of the Act of 1859 was to secure that no one should be appointed to a Civil Service post, including rights of pension, unless he had been examined and received a certificate from the Civil Service Commission?—Quite so.

48,923. The masters and registrars are appointed to pensionable posts?—No doubt.

48,924. And I think you tell me that they do not receive any Civil Service certificate?—No.

48,925. And if there are other officials connected with these legal departments who are appointed to pensionable posts without being submitted to the Civil Service Commission, you would not know of it?—No, we should not.

48,926. Whose business is it to find out and inform them?—I could not tell you.

48,927. Is it not the business of the comptroller and auditor-general?—Possibly; I do not know. I may point out another thing which is a matter of some little interest, that in the Act of 1873 (and this applies to the Law Courts) it was laid down that any officer “to be here—” after appointed in pursuance of this part of this Act, “and whose whole time shall be devoted to the duties of his office, shall be deemed to be employed in the permanent Civil Service of Her Majesty, and shall be entitled, as such, to a pension or compensation in the

"same manner, and upon the same terms and conditions, as the other permanent Civil servants of Her Majesty are entitled to pension or compensation." That, of course, would have brought the whole staff of the Law Courts under the ordinary rules of the Civil Service; but by an amending Act of 1879 that was left out, and another clause was substituted, requiring indeed that any officer of the High Court appointed after the commencement of the Act should have a Civil Service certificate if he was to receive pension rights, but providing that: "The Lord Chancellor may from time to time, with the concurrence of the Treasury, make, revoke, and alter orders declaring that this section shall not apply to any office or class of offices specified in the order." So practically all the officers in the Law Courts are exempt from the operation of the Civil Service clause, except those whom we now look after.

48,928. And you do not know which offices have been exempt?—No. All we know is that certain nominees for certain offices are sent to us for examination.

48,929. Those rules and orders might cover the whole office without your knowing it, except in the case where nominees are sent to you?—Quite so.

48,930. Do you find in practice that the medical examination involved by the Act of 1859 is of some importance with regard to pensionable posts?—Very important, undoubtedly.

48,931. Would you say that a man who felt that his eyesight was failing, or in other ways that his health was failing, might, in the absence of a medical examination, be tempted to apply for a pensionable post quite late in life?—It does seem quite possible.

48,932. Can you see any reason, therefore, why that medical examination should not be applied by the State as freely and regularly as it would be applied by an insurance office?—No, I certainly think that it ought to be.

48,933. Would you say that the large rights of personal nomination by certain high officials, which prevail throughout the legal departments, are exactly similar to the general arrangement in the Civil Service before the reforms which began in 1855?—Undoubtedly.

48,934. And your phrase, that it ought not to be necessary to substitute any alterations, would have applied just as well to the state of things before 1855?—Perfectly.

48,935. But it was found, in spite of your statement that it ought not to be necessary, that it was necessary?—Certainly.

48,936. (Sir John Kempe.) I notice in your evidence already given to this Commission, you said you would be in favour of nomination if the nominating authority could be a perfect authority?—Yes.

48,937. I suppose from that I may deduce that now you think wherever it is possible open competition ought to be adopted?—Wherever it is possible and convenient, shall we say? By convenience, I mean the convenience of the public; that is, the genuine advantage of the public service.

48,938. You would not consider the convenience of the office?—No.

48,939. If the office said that it was much easier to get on with a trained man, would that, in your opinion, be sufficient justification?—No.

48,940. As a matter of fact, there are other offices where the duties are almost as technical, I should say, as those in the legal departments; for instance, the Estate Duty Office, which is supplied with clerks entirely through open competition?—Yes.

48,941. That has answered very well, and the work there is quite as technical as the legal departments have to meet?—Yes, it is probably more technical.

48,942. Therefore I do not see any ground for saying that the work cannot be learnt in the office?—No; my view is, if you take on a clever young man, you ought to be able to teach him any sort of legal work. Of course you would make a few bad bargains, but on the average you ought to be able to get a class of man you could train to do legal work.

48,943. But, at the same time, technical qualifications are wanted?—Technical qualifications must be obtained at one time or other; whether obtained before or after entering the office is largely a matter of convenience.

48,944. But, so far as you can see, would you say that there is probably no more reason for requiring technical qualifications for a legal department than for requiring that the Local Government Board should be recruited from municipal officers, or the Customs from shipping clerks. In fact, in any department you might say that there is a great deal of technical work quite as technical as in the legal departments, and your recruits by open competition will master it perfectly?—Subject to the limitations of my ignorance, I should agree with you.

48,945. It does not fall within your province to decide matters of that sort?—I mean, I know so little about what these clerks actually do in the law courts.

48,946. I understand you are inclined to think that you would have to allow the first and second class clerks, in a branch like the Chancery, to have a certain amount of technical qualification?—I do not feel sure that that is necessary. I was trying to make provision for legal qualifications if it were proved that they were needed. Otherwise I do not see why you should not select the second class clerks by any good open competition.

48,947. You told the Chairman that you saw an objection to the differential treatment of different offices. We know in different offices some require much more technical knowledge than others; but you see a difficulty about recruiting for them separately. As it is now, you have the same kind of officers with the same scale of salaries for all the legal offices although the prospects are different and the work different?—Yes.

48,948. They are really as different as ordinary Civil offices are, but you see a difficulty about separating those offices?—What I was thinking of was that I thought it would be difficult to recruit two different kinds of third class clerks by two different kinds of examination, and pay them the same salary. That is what I had in mind. If that was not what was intended I modify my remark accordingly.

48,949. To depart, in fact, from the present system, which is to get the same class of clerk for all the offices, you would have to modify it?—Yes, it would be necessary to modify that.

48,950. One witness appeared to see a great difficulty—I think in the Chancery master's office—about teaching the work where there were only two or three clerks in an office. There are several Chancery masters, and only two or three clerks in each office, and they said that if there was a vacancy there it was very difficult to train a man. Could you suggest any way of supplying those offices temporarily with men to carry on the work while the new men are being trained? You might find a difficulty in providing for offices where there are only two or three in an office, and they cannot be interchanged. It has been said that in that case you can only get over the difficulty by having technical qualifications with nomination?—That sounds as if it would get over the difficulty of the technical qualifications, but I cannot imagine that anyone can know what has to be done in a master's office until he has been in a master's office six months.

48,951. The argument is that if you supply the clerks from solicitors' offices you get the man in who has been dealing with the master's work before, and knows what he is about?—There may be something in that; I do not know.

48,952. They are technical qualifications which are rather difficult to describe, but I suppose it means a knowledge of Acts of Parliament and of forms and of legal terminology?—Especially a knowledge of forms, I should think.

48,953. Might not all those three things be acquired after seeing the work done, in a few weeks almost?—If the masters get men direct from solicitors' offices who are constantly dealing with the Chancery offices, then I can see how they can lay their hands on the man wanted; I do not see much evidence on this list of the staff that that is what is done, but it may be so.

48,954. Do you think that a clerk supplied by open competition would be more likely to learn these things

10 March 1915.]

MR. STANLEY LEATHES, C.B.

than a solicitor's clerk?—Unless he was a solicitor's clerk who had done that class of work before.

48,955. We understand that a solicitor's clerk has to begin at the bottom, and must have learnt something?—He may have learnt something, but not necessarily that particular work.

48,956. They say he would have learnt some of the technicalities?—I should not like to express an opinion about it.

48,957. (Mr. Matheson.) Does not the list of appointments seem to suggest that there is a want of proper classification of functions about these clerks. When you have such a variety of people varying in age and qualifications in all sorts of ways, does not that suggest that there is something wrong in the arrangement of the work?—It certainly suggests some want of uniformity in methods of nomination. I do not feel prepared to go beyond that.

48,958. Supposing the third class were made more or less self-contained with a prospect of promotion only in exceptional cases, would not something like the examination which we suggested for the junior clerical class meet the case of these third class clerks?—Yes, I should say so.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTIETH DAY.

Thursday, 11th March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.

Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.

Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.

Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.

Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.

Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. JAMES RIGG BROUGHAM, called and examined. Mr. J. W. BRADFORD (first class clerk) was in attendance.

48,959. (Chairman.) You are the Senior Registrar in Bankruptcy?—I am.

48,960. How long have you held the post of registrar?—Since August 1848.

48,961. Were you originally appointed to the public service in 1845?—Yes, as a clerk in the Lord Chancellor's Secretary of Bankrupts' Office.

48,962. And you were appointed registrar in 1848?—August 1848.

48,963. So that you have held that post for nearly 67 years?—Yes. I was appointed to the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy in 1848, and was then transferred to London in 1862; but while acting in Liverpool I used to act in London also, being constantly interchanged. The original appointment of registrars was, when I was appointed, under the Royal Sign Manual.

48,964. Including the provincial appointments—the appointment at Liverpool?—Under the Royal Sign Manual. Then in 1849, when there was a Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, appointments were made by the Lord Chancellor.

48,965. Before your appointment to the public service were you in the legal profession?—I was in a lawyer's office in Edinburgh—in the office of a writer to the signet.

48,966. The system of bankruptcy administration was materially altered by the Act of 1883?—Yes. We have had many Bankruptcy Acts, and a great many alterations. When I was originally appointed the work was very different from what it is now; it was very much lighter work altogether. It has been varied from time to time, until now we have partly judicial functions to perform, which we had not originally, nor for many years afterwards. The alteration was in about 1869.

48,967. Was it the Act of 1883 which created the system that substantially exists at the present time?—Yes, substantially that is so.

48,968. That is to say, it placed the jurisdiction in the Bankruptcy Division of the Supreme Court, and in the County Courts?—Yes.

48,969. Since the time of that Act the operations of the Supreme Court are conducted by a Judge in Bankruptcy and registrars?—That is so.

48,970. The work which goes to the registrars is in the main defined by Section 102 of the Act of 1914, which consolidated the previous Acts?—That is so.

48,971. May it be said that the effect of that generally is that all ordinary proceedings in bankruptcy come, in the first instance, before one of the registrars?—Yes.

48,972. Will you kindly tell the Commission, very briefly, what is the course of proceedings in an ordinary bankruptcy? It begins with a petition?—It begins by a petition. It is possible that before that a bankruptcy notice is very often the beginning, but not in every case. A petition is the foundation of the bankruptcy—a petition asking for a receiving order.

48,973. And that petition goes before one of the registrars?—It is filed in the Senior Registrar's Office, and then it is answered for a day, and the hearing comes before a registrar after it is served.

48,974. Upon that, if circumstances are found to warrant it, is a receiving order usually issued?—If all the requisites are proved a receiving order is made. It is very frequently disputed, and counsel appear very often on the hearing of a petition to dispute it—counsel on both sides.

48,975. That leads to the appointment of a receiver?—One of the official receivers is appointed in the bankruptcy.

48,976. It is always an official receiver?—Yes, always an official receiver. There are a certain number of official receivers in the court appointed by the Board of Trade—they are officers of the Board of Trade.

48,977. They are officers of the Board of Trade under the Inspector General in Bankruptcy?—Yes.

48,978. Is the next step a meeting of creditors?—Generally, a meeting of creditors called by the official receiver and presided over by the official receiver.

48,979. What follows upon that?—It depends. If the debtor appears, he is examined previously to that before the official receiver; and at the meeting, if he has not proposed a scheme of composition, or some scheme of arrangement, then the creditors have an opportunity of passing a resolution that he should be adjudicated a bankrupt, and they appoint a trustee. If they pass no resolution, then the official receiver generally applies for adjudication himself. If they pass a resolution he applies, by virtue of that resolution, to the registrar for adjudication, and the debtor may either be adjudicated or not, as circumstances may arise.

48,980. That comes before the registrar for decision?—Yes; and, sometimes, the debtor opposes that on different grounds; but if it results in adjudication, then the adjudication is made, and all these notices of the receiving order and the adjudication are sent, when made, to the Board of Trade by the Senior Registrar's Office, and then they are published in the Gazette and newspapers.

48,981. After that there may be an application for discharge?—The next step is an appointment for a public examination of the debtor, and that has to be held in open court.

48,982. By the registrar?—The registrar presides at that, and the official receiver examines the debtor on oath, and the examination is all taken down in shorthand. After that, when it is concluded, the debtor may apply for his discharge. He sometimes applies immediately; sometimes he waits two or three years, which, I think, is unfortunate. At one time the Court used, immediately after the public examination, to appoint a day for discharge, and the debtor was obliged to appear; and, if he does not appear, he took the consequences. Now, it is left for the debtor to apply at any time for his discharge after his public examination has been concluded.

48,983. And it rests with the registrar to grant or refuse the discharge?—The application for discharge is heard before the registrar, when he can refuse, suspend, or grant. There are certain offences in the Act which oblige him to suspend, or to make some other order, either granting it on consenting to judgment, or some such terms.

48,984. All those proceedings normally take place before the registrar?—All before the registrar in open court.

48,985. In what cases do the proceedings take place before the judge?—The judge hears all motions. They are, practically, motions that relate to property where there is dispute as to whether the property is the property of the debtor or somebody else, and that, always, is determined by the judge, and the motion is before the judge. I have prepared a list of particulars of the business dealt with by the judge in Bankruptcy. In open court he hears appeals from the Board of Trade to the High Court.

48,986. What would the nature of those appeals be?—They are appeals as to the appointment of a trustee. There are not many of them, but, where the Board of Trade objects to the appointment of a trustee and that is appealed against, it has to go before a judge; there are not a great many of those, but there are some. Then applications to set aside, or avoid any settlement or conveyance, transfer of security, or payment by the bankrupt for or against the title of the trustee to any property adversely claimed; applications for committal for contempt; appeals against the rejection of a proof, or applications to expunge or reduce a proof where the amount in dispute exceeds 200*l.*; if it is below 200*l.* the registrar can deal with it. Then applications for trials of issues of fact by a jury. Those are the main points, I think.

48,987. Those are the main matters dealt with by the judge in court?—Yes.

48,988. There are certain other matters which are heard by the judge in chambers?—Yes. Any applications relating to any of those matters may be heard in chambers; any preliminary applications and also judgment summonses—of which there are a large number—are so heard. The judgment summonses are heard in open court under Rule 374 of the Bankruptcy Rules. The average number of such summonses per annum is 516.

48,989. Why are those necessarily heard before the judge and not before the registrar? I understand it is under one of the rules; but what is the reason of the rule? Are those proceedings of special importance?—When there were first judgment summons I think they were heard by the registrar for a short time. There are applications under judgment summons to commit to prison. If they do not pay, they are committed to prison for so many days, and I think it was thought desirable that that application should not be heard by the registrar, and that it ought to be heard by the judge.

48,990. Because it may involve committal to prison?—It involves the committal of the debtor to prison. I suppose that was the reason of it.

48,991. Have the parties the right to ask that any of those ordinary proceedings that are being conducted before the registrar should be adjourned to the judge?—Yes. If all the parties before the registrar request that it should be heard before the judge we have to adjourn it to the judge, or if one of the parties asks for it and the registrar thinks it of sufficient importance, either as being difficult or new matter, he can adjourn it to the judge. There are not very many of those cases—very few. I may say, as to the orders of the registrars, there is a direct appeal to the Court of Appeal from the registrars. When the registrar makes any order it is the order of the Court, and the appeal is direct to the Court of Appeal.

48,992. Are there many appeals from the decisions of registrars?—Not more than from the judge, I may say. There is a return made every year of those, and I think I might say they compare very favourably. In the year 1912 there were only 24 appeals to the Court of Appeal, both from the judge and from the registrars. In 1913 there were only 17, and in 1914 there were 34.

48,993. Is the bankruptcy business increasing or diminishing?—At present it is very much less, in consequence of the moratorium and what has taken place; but I do not think there is really any very material difference.

48,994. Referring to the judicial statistics, may the number of bankruptcy petitions be taken as a fair measure of the amount of bankruptcy business?—Certainly. The number of petitions is a very good criterion.

48,995. I see the annual average from 1889 to 1893 was 5,669 petitions; that, I think, is including the County Courts as well as the Supreme Court?—We have the number of our own petitions in the High Court for the years from 1910 to 1914. In 1913 there were 1,653 petitions, and in 1914 there were 1,324. It fell off at the end of 1914 after August.

48,996. Have you any figures to show how that compares with, say, 20 years ago?—No, but it could be easily made up.

48,997. In the judicial statistics the figures only give the total number of petitions which, I think, includes the County Courts as well as the High Court?—Yes.

48,998. The total was 5,669 annually, from 1889 to 1893, and 5,111 from 1909 to 1913, which would seem to show a certain diminution, but not a very large diminution—something like 10 per cent.?—Yes.

48,999. Would that, do you think, be the case in the High Court as distinguished from the County Courts?—I should think the proportion is much the same. As regards the High Court the number of petitions varied very little except in the last year. In 1910 there were 1,492; in 1911 there were 1,637; in 1912 there were 1,612; and in 1913, 1,653; showing in those last three years a slight increase. Of course bankruptcy varies sometimes with the state of trade—whether trade is good or bad. Some people think that when trade is good there are more bankruptcies.

49,000. To whom do appeals from bankruptcy decisions in the County Court go?—To the Divisional Court of the High Court before the Bankruptcy judge and one other judge. Then there is an appeal from that court to the Court of Appeal, if leave is given.

49,001. How many registrars are there?—There are five Bankruptcy registrars, one of whom is attached to the winding-up of companies, and that leaves four for bankruptcy business.

49,002. In the information you have given us about the bankruptcy proceedings generally, we have, I think, a fair indication of the nature of the bulk of the registrar's work?—Yes, I think so.

49,003. Has the registrar also to attend in court?—They attend in court on the judge when he sits in Bankruptcy, and also on the Court of Appeal. One registrar attends the judge in Bankruptcy and also the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal.

49,004. Is the judge in Bankruptcy sitting continuously throughout the sittings?—Oh, no; he only sits when he is required, and when he can be spared from other work to a certain extent.

49,005. How often, roughly, does he sit in Bankruptcy?—There is a return made of the number of days that he sits in court.

49,006. (Mr. Coward.) Sometimes his days in court are very short?—I should say no. I think he generally has a very full list when he sits in court. He does not always get through it in one day.

49,007. It was referred to in the Commission on Delay, and I remember evidence was given about it then. Lord Justice Phillimore gave evidence as to the time occupied in hearing Appeals in Bankruptcy.

49,007A. (Lord Mersey.) He may have been a very quick judge—I do not know; but I have sat for a good long time in Bankruptcy, as Mr. Registrar Brougham, I dare say, remembers, and my experience was that I always had a full day's work?—Generally a very full day's work. I have here the number of days on which the judge has sat to hear bankruptcy matters, excluding the Divisional Court. In 1912 it was 95 days; in 1913, 107 days; and in 1914, 95 days. Then he sat on other days with another judge as a Divisional Court in 1912, 13 days; in 1913, 15 days; and in 1914, 13 days. There were applications in chambers as well, but these are the numbers of sittings in open court, and I should say that they are nearly all sittings up to 4 o'clock generally. Of course, sometimes cases break down, but as a rule it is a full day's work.

49,008. (Chairman.) That would amount to something like half the working days in term time?—Probably.

49,009. The working days are, I believe, estimated at 212?—There is a return of all these figures in the judicial statistics.

49,010. Has the senior registrar special duties as distinguished from the other registrars?—Yes, different and additional duties. He has the separate duties of what is called the Senior Registrar's Department. These duties can, in his absence, also be discharged by the other registrars. The Senior Registrar's Department consists of nine clerks, namely, a first class clerk or chief clerk two clerks of the second class, and six of the third class. All the correspondence from the Lord Chancellor and others is generally dealt with in the office. Petitions, as I have already said, are presented there and are filed; public searches of the books; creditors sworn to proofs.

49,011. The senior registrar's department acts as the central office of all the registrars' courts; all documents are filed, and all clerical work is done there for all four registrars except that which is done by their personal clerks?—Yes. I have a return here of the business of the senior registrar's department for the years 1912-13-14, and it shows the number of searches; the fees taken for the searches, fees for oaths, fees on filing affidavits and bankruptcy notices, and the creditors sworn, and the returns that they have to make to the Board of Trade—a very full return. I will hand in that table. It shows that the searches are over 600 by the Land Registry Office, and by the public 11,905 for last year. The fees taken are 500*l.* or 600*l.* The fees are all taken by bankruptcy stamps.

49,012. And the senior registrar's department has charge of the records?—Of all the records of the establishment.

49,013. They are very voluminous?—We have had a book prepared of all the records.

49,014. Are the more ancient records often referred to?—Not so much now. There is a decrease, of course, in references to very old records, but we had for a very long time continual searchings of the old records, especially for unclaimed dividends. I think those have dropped off a good deal now.

49,015. (Lord Mersey.) Is there a period at which the records are destroyed? They are not preserved for ever, are they?—Certain records are preserved, I may say, for ever.

49,016. Are they sent to the Record Office?—Some are and some are not. All the records of bankruptcy are preserved and all the records of insolvency proceedings are preserved. The insolvency proceedings are now transferred to a place at Stratford, so that they may be open for search by anybody who requires to search for them, and occasionally we have searches for those old insolvencies.

49,017. There is a gentleman there, I suppose, in charge of them?—The senior registrar is in charge of them.

49,018. But there must be some official in charge of them?—The records are in an office at Stratford.

49,019. There must be some officials there?—Yes.

49,020. Have you any idea how many officials there are there? Is it under Sir Maxwell Lyte?—It is a labour exchange department. We used to have those records in Chichester Rents, and it was suggested if they were removed to Stratford, where they had a labour exchange, it would save the rent we had to pay at Chichester Rents, and they are now there and locked up there. There is no access to them except by those who have the right to attend.

49,021. If a man wants to get access, where does he apply?—He applies to the office of the Senior Registrar in Bankruptcy.

49,022. (Chairman.) I see from the figures you give, that there are half a million records of insolvencies stored at Stratford, dated from 1813 to 1861?—I might say in answer to Lord Mersey's question, as to whether records are destroyed, that bankruptcy notices, judgment summonses, and papers of that sort are destroyed periodically as confidential waste.

49,023. (Lord Mersey.) I suppose they are burnt?—They are pulped.

49,024. (Chairman.) What is the method of appointment of the registrars. By whom is the appointment made?—The Lord Chancellor.

49,025. Is there any statutory qualification?—None.

49,026. As a matter of fact, what has been the previous experience of the present registrars?—The present registrars, except myself, have all had some standing at the Bar and experience at the Bar.

49,027. All four, including the Companies Winding-up registrar, were barristers before appointment?—All barristers of standing and of considerable experience.

49,028. What is the method of appointment of the clerks in the office?—They are appointed by the Lord Chancellor, generally as third class clerks, after they have passed the Civil Service examination. The Lord Chancellor appoints them subject to passing that examination as third class clerks, and then they move up.

49,029. Does the Lord Chancellor consult you as to candidates?—Generally the Lord Chancellor does through his secretary. When an intimation is made to him of a vacancy, generally the Lord Chancellor's secretary communicates with the senior registrar and sends anyone that he thinks fit, and asks whether I think he is a suitable man.

49,030. Does he send candidates only when there is an actual vacancy, or does he send candidates at any time before putting their names on the Lord Chancellor's list?—Only when there is a vacancy.

49,031. Does he send one candidate and ask you whether that man is suitable, or does he send several and ask which is the more suitable?—Sometimes one and sometimes more than one.

49,032. If he sends more than one he then asks you which you think the most suitable?—Yes.

49,033. Have the men, who have been appointed in that way, as a rule, had legal experience before appointment?—Generally speaking, they have been clerks in solicitors' offices or had some other legal training. Generally what we prefer is to have those who have been in a solicitor's office. We find them the most suitable.

49,034. At what age are they usually appointed? Are the limits of age from 20 to 30, as in the other legal offices?—I think they come at about 20 to 23 for the third class.

49,035. Have you found the results satisfactory? Have you got the right sort of men?—At present, perfectly so.

11 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES RIGG BROUGHAM. (Mr. J. W. BRADFORD was in attendance.)

49,036. You have no reason to be dissatisfied?—Of late years we have been perfectly satisfied. I think we have got a very good establishment all through the staff of clerks at present. The mode of appointment has, I think, been very satisfactory.

49,037. In saying that you think it advisable that they should have had previous legal experience, what are your reasons? Is it the actual knowledge that they have acquired, or is it the legal habit and attitude of mind?—I think it is the legal attitude of mind, and they acquire a considerable amount of legal experience, because there are so many legal points which arise in different matters they have to deal with.

49,038. Do you think they can acquire that better by their outside experience than in the office itself?—It enables them in the office to acquire it more quickly I think.

49,039. If you had an intelligent and well educated young man of 19 or 20 appointed without previous experience in a solicitor's office, would it take him very long to acquire a knowledge of the work?—No, not as a third class clerk.

49,040. Would his experience in the office as a third class clerk qualify him for advancement to the higher classes?—Certainly.

49,041. So that you would say that previous experience is desirable but not indispensable?—Not indispensable, no.

49,042. The establishment of your office consists, I think, of one first class clerk, seven second class clerks, and six third class clerks, that is including the four registrars' clerks?—That is so.

49,043. (Mr. Coward.) Does not that include the Companies Winding-up?—No, that is Bankruptcy alone.

49,044. (Chairman.) It does not include the Companies Winding-up or the Taxing Department?—That is right.

49,045. Of the second class clerks, four are specially attached to the registrars?—Yes.

49,046. What is the nature of their duties generally?—They attend in court when the registrar sits in court and supervise the swearing of witnesses and debtors, and also take a note of the evidence read or heard, and the judgment of the Court for the purpose of drawing up the orders—that is part of their duty in court. In chambers, in all cases it is their duty to see that applications and other documents bear proper revenue stamps and to cancel the stamps. They issue the bankruptcy notices on behalf of the registrars, and that requires a wide knowledge of the judgments and orders made in all civil courts in England, including the issuing of execution therein. It also necessitates knowledge of the numerous decisions relating thereto, which entails constant reading in order to keep up-to-date in any recent decision. Then they do the investigation of creditors' petitions on behalf of the registrars, and, where necessary, taking the registrar's directions upon them.

49,047. That is work preparatory to the registrar's decision?—Yes.

49,048. They have a good deal of other work, I gather, of the same nature: work preparatory for the registrar, which relieves the registrar of a considerable amount of detailed investigation of documents?—Yes. I have sent in a full copy of their duties to the Commission.

49,049. Is their work rather important and responsible?—Very important. I may say that of the four registrars' clerks and the clerk attending the judge, three have been called to the Bar since their appointment as clerks to registrars.

49,050. (Lord Mersey.) Was that with a view to promotion, or what?—I cannot say.

49,051. Can you suggest any other object in their being called?—I do not know. I never quite knew why they were called to the Bar. I suppose it might be to fit them for some better appointment.

49,052. (Chairman.) Do they also draw up the orders with the parties?—They draw up the orders, settle them in draft, and then they submit them to the registrar.

49,053. Are the orders drawn up in that way simple or difficult?—The orders of the Court are not very difficult, but certain orders—for instance, vesting orders —require a very great deal of care in drawing up; they are very long, and sometimes complicated; questions of title arise upon them.

49,054. Are they comparable in difficulty with the orders drawn up by the Chancery registrars?—I should think not more so.

49,055. The other clerks, apart from those specially attached to the registrars, are in the Senior Registrar's Department?—Yes.

49,056. Performing the duties which you have described as appertaining to that department?—Yes.

49,057. What sort of work have the third class clerks in that department? Is it work of a routine and mechanical nature, or is it work requiring discretion and judgment?—There is a certain amount of routine work and a certain amount requiring discretion.

49,058. I suppose the greater part of their work would consist of the issuing of notices, the keeping of books, and other work of that kind that is necessary for the routine of the office?—Yes, very much so.

49,059. Have they also any duties of a more responsible nature?—No; I think it is pretty well routine work. They require, of course, to keep up to the law in bankruptcy and the different sections that are applicable to their department, and they attend to the filing of the papers.

49,060. Do any of them write shorthand?—I think several of them do.

49,061. Is much use made of shorthand dictation in the office for correspondence, for instance?—Yes.

49,062. A considerable use?—Yes, and, of course, the clerks to the registrars find it very useful to write shorthand.

49,063. Do you use shorthand dictation yourself much?—No.

49,064. Is typewriting used in the office?—No, there is no typewriting except in the Official Receivers Department, where there is typewriting of their reports, but that is a Board of Trade department. We have a Scrivenery Department instead of the typewriters. It is a branch of the High Court Scrivenery Department. All office copies are written in the Scrivenery Department.

49,065. Is typewriting used there?—No, not in that department.

49,066. The whole of your work is manuscript and not typewriting?—There is no typewriting in our department at all.

49,067. Would not it be of advantage to use typewriting?—I do not know that it would.

49,068. We have been told, as regards speed and expense, that it takes half the time, and costs half the money for the same amount of matter. That would be a distinct advantage in the use of typewriting?—The principal work would be the office copies. There are a large number of office copies.

49,069. Would there be any objection to their being typewritten?—No, I see no objection whatever.

49,070. It is easier to read, and less expensive to produce?—Yes. We take about 72*l.* a month for supplying office copies.

49,071. So there is a considerable amount of copying?—Yes, a substantial amount, and there might be a saving in that respect.

49,072. (Mr. Coward.) Would not those copies, to a certain extent, represent examinations in Bankruptcy?—They are both copies of examinations and copies of affidavits.

49,073. But the examinations that you would make would be taken down by the shorthand writer and transcribed?—The proceedings at the public examinations are all taken down by a professional shorthand writer appointed by the Court. He transcribes them, and sends one copy to the official receiver and one is kept for the file of the proceedings.

49,074. They are typed, are they not?—They are not typed.

49,075. They should be, of course?—The official receivers in Bankruptcy make reports to the Court on the debtor's application for discharge, and they are generally typed. Very often they are very long reports, going into the whole case.

49,076. (Chairman.) I understand that the work of the third class clerks is for the most part of a purely clerical character, and more or less of a routine nature—keeping books, filing returns and documents, and so forth?—Quite so.

49,077. But the actual manual copying is done by the Scrivenery Department, and not by your clerks?—Yes, mostly so.

49,078. The work of the second class clerks is of a decidedly more responsible character?—Yes.

49,079. Have they work that you consider important and good work?—Certainly.

49,080. Are you satisfied with the organisation of the office as it stands at present?—Perfectly.

49,081. Do you think the classification of the clerks corresponds to the work they do?—The only thing I am dissatisfied with is that I think we have an insufficient number of first class clerks. In the whole office we have only one first class clerk. That, compared with the number in the other departments of the High Court, is very much less, and I think we ought to have at least two additional first class clerks.

49,082. The comparison with other departments, of course, might cut in both directions; it may be that the others have too many. But, examining the question from the point of view of the work, is work done now by the second class clerks which you think of sufficient importance to justify the appointment of a first class clerk?—Yes. For instance, I may say that a second class clerk attends the judge and the Court of Appeal. I think his duties are such that they are worthy quite of a first class clerk.

49,083. What are his duties in court? You have told us, I think, that he takes a note of the proceedings and takes down notes for the order to be made?—Yes.

49,084. (Lord Mersey.) And he very frequently tells the judge what the law is?—I think Lord Mersey knows very well the importance of the clerk, and that he has a great many important duties. He has to prepare all the orders for the Court of Appeal, and if there is any difficulty about those orders he settles them in draft for the registrar to approve of them. He attends all interlocutory applications in bankruptcy, and, dealing with judgment summonses, he has to take a shorthand note of the proceedings there, endorse the transcript, and file it for the judge's signature, and then he obtains and stamps the orders for the registrar's signature.

49,085. (Chairman.) You say he has to take a shorthand note?—Yes.

49,086. Do all the clerks who sit in court write shorthand?—No, I do not think so—some, but not all.

49,087. Then the note is not necessarily in shorthand?—It is not a sine qua non.

49,088. Are the clerks who sit in court referred to by the judge on questions of procedure or even of law?—I think they are occasionally. The registrar sits in court with the judge and the clerk attends also.

49,089. Both the registrar and the clerk are in court?—Both sit with the judge, and also in the Court of Appeal.

49,090. So that the judge's requests for information about procedure would be addressed to the registrar and not to the clerk?—Generally speaking.

49,091. (Lord Mersey.) But it sometimes happens, does it not, that the registrar is not there, and that the clerk alone is there?—Very seldom so in open court. In chambers the clerk is there.

49,092. I am talking about open court?—With regard to judgment summonses the registrar does not attend the court, but only the clerk.

49,093. (Chairman.) Is it necessary for the registrar and the clerk both to be in attendance?—I should say not. If the clerk is sufficient, then it would not be necessary for the registrar to attend.

49,094. (Lord Mersey.) If Mr. Bradford is there, he is enough, as a rule?—Perfectly so, and also Mr. Roper, who at present attends the judge, is perfectly sufficient.

49,095. (Chairman.) Then your suggestion is, that the number of first class clerks ought to be increased by two?—By two. There is a petition or request by the clerks stating their scheme for the improvement of the clerks, which has been prepared by the clerks themselves, and I should like to hand it in.

49,096. I think the Commission have already received an application from the clerks which, I presume, embodies that scheme?—Yes, I have a copy here. It is both of the second class clerks and the third class clerks, and I should strongly support their application.

49,097. What is the present system of promotion from one class to another?—Seniority, provided they are sufficiently qualified for the work.

49,098. In practice, do you find that seniority is generally followed?—As a rule I think so, though not in every case.

49,099. Looking at the list, it would appear that there is no third class clerk who has been longer in the service than any of the second class clerks?—I believe that is so.

49,100. You said appointments are always made to the third class now?—Yes. I do not think any have been appointed direct to the second class, certainly for some long time.

49,101. Promotions are made by the Lord Chancellor on your recommendation?—By the Lord Chancellor, but I will not say quite on my recommendation; they generally ask whether we approve, or whether he is a suitable man.

49,102. When there is a vacancy in one of the higher classes, do you then make a recommendation?—Yes.

49,103. Or does the Lord Chancellor say: "I propose to appoint Mr. So-and-so; is he suitable?"—Somehow or other the applications generally come through the Senior Registrar's Office, and we forward them to the Lord Chancellor with any remarks we think proper or right in the case.

49,104. Do the clerks in the third class actually apply for promotion if there is a vacancy in an upper class?—Yes. Whenever there is a vacancy in the second class, the third class clerks generally apply.

49,105. That is a somewhat unusual system?—I think they generally apply, but, as a matter of practice, too, when there is a vacancy, the senior registrar suggests that So-and-so in the third class would be a suitable man for the appointment.

49,106. What are the hours of attendance in the office?—10 to 4.

49,107. Is that all the year round?—10 to 2 in the vacation.

49,108. Is that in all the vacations, or only in the Long Vacation?—In the Long Vacation and certain days of the short vacations, the same as in the High Court.

49,109. Is there much work in vacations?—Yes.

49,110. Is there a distinction between vacation work and other work, as there is in the High Court?—Yes. We only sit during the Long Vacation one day in the week in court. Certain matters, for instance, applications for discharge of debtors, are not considered as vacation work unless there is something special. If there is anything special requiring it, of course an appointment is made to hear it.

49,111. But the work of the office, the searches, and so on, goes on as usual?—The searches go on. I have a return here giving a comparison of the work done and fees taken during term and vacation. The petitions filed during term, the same number of weeks as in vacation, are 335. The petitions filed not in term but in vacation are 294.

49,112. So there is not a very large difference?—Not a very large difference. The number of bankruptcy notices in the same period are 771 in term and 627 in vacation. The number of searches in the office are 2,975 in term and 2,089 in vacation—about 900 difference.

49,113. (Lord Mersey.) By "term," I suppose you mean the sittings and not the old-fashioned term?—Yes, sittings.

49,114. (Chairman.) What holidays do the clerks get in the year?—They get six weeks' holiday in the year.

49,115. Is that the whole of their holiday. Do they get any of the legal vacations in addition?—That is the whole of their holiday.

March 1915.] Mr. JAMES RIGG BROUGHAM. (Mr. J. W. BRADFORD was in attendance.)

49,116. Is there any age limit for retirement?—No, none.

49,117. Neither in the case of the registrars nor in the case of the clerks?—No.

49,118. What is your opinion as to the question of fixing an age limit?—There may be instances where a retiring age limit is not only desirable but necessary. As a general principle, however, I do not think it would be absolutely beneficial to this branch of the public service, but if it is thought to be desirable to introduce an age limit with power of extension in exceptional cases, it ought not to apply to the present officials, who were appointed and accepted office without any such limitation.

49,119. In the case of the clerks, do you see any reason why the rule which applies in the Civil Service generally should not apply in your office?—Not as a rule, but perhaps I am a prejudiced witness against an age limit.

(Chairman.) If I may be permitted to say so, you yourself are the best argument I have yet come across in favour of the absence of an age limit.

49,120. (Chairman.) As regards the organisation of the office generally, have you any reforms or changes to suggest, or do you find it satisfactory?—The arrangements at the office are perfectly satisfactory at present.

49,121. Does the work fully employ the office staff that you have?—They have quite full employment.

49,122. Have they often to stop beyond the fixed office hours?—They do occasionally. I may say that as regards the judge's clerk, I have a return here from him in which he shows that for the last few years he has worked over hours between 300 and 400 hours every year. A great deal of the work he has had to take home, and the other clerks occasionally have to stay, especially the registrars' clerks—when we sit in court they have to stay later.

49,123. But usually they would be able to get away at the end of their regular hours?—As a general rule, yes.

49,124. Is the taxing work arising out of proceedings in your department done by Mr. Tanner and his staff?—Yes, he is a taxing master with three clerks.

49,125. Do you find that that work is done in a satisfactory manner?—Perfectly so.

49,126. The question has been raised whether that taxing work should be transferred to the Central Taxing Office. Do you think there would be advantage or disadvantage in that?—It would be extremely inconvenient.

49,127. It is more convenient having it in the same building?—It would be much more inconvenient if transferred to the Central Office. The Taxing Office has to have reference to files of proceedings; the master may require in one day seven or eight different files of proceedings to be brought up to him from the Record Office to enable him to tax the various bills of costs thereunder. Every day he requires constantly a dozen proceedings. It would be extremely inconvenient for it to be transferred to the Central Office, not only inconvenient to the taxing master, but also, I think, to the profession.

49,128. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The clerks in the office are under your direct control and supervision?—Yes.

49,129. That is to say your personal control and supervision?—Yes.

49,130. Do they keep a time-book?—There is a time-book which the clerks sign on their coming in in the morning.

49,131. Is that shown to you at intervals?—I have looked at it occasionally. I leave it, if I may say so, very much to my chief clerk. If he has any complaints he would bring them before me.

49,132. Do the registrars' clerks sign the time-book?—They do not. When the time-book was established a good many years ago, they were exempt because of the peculiar nature of their duties, and their attendance on registrars late in court, and so on. They were exempt the same as, I think, the Chancery clerks are.

49,133. What are the ordinary hours during term time?—10 to 4.

49,134. And during the Long Vacation?—10 to 2, and on certain days in the shorter vacations 10 to 2.

49,135. If the two first class clerks were appointed as you suggest, would that fact change their duties at all?—Not the slightest.

49,136. It would be simply a change in their status and pay, and not a change of duty?—A change of the pay; that would be all.

49,137. At present a clerk is appointed always in the third class?—Yes, now.

49,138. And he is appointed apparently at about the age of 20?—20 to 23.

49,139. He has normally been a law clerk doing ordinary work in a solicitor's office?—Yes, generally speaking.

49,140. He has always hitherto gone by pure seniority to the position of a second class clerk?—Generally by seniority. I cannot say quite whether it is so in every case.

49,141. And as a second class clerk it may be his duty, when he is sitting in court in the absence of the registrar, to tell a distinguished judge what the law is?—I will not say that quite.

49,142. (Lord Mersey.) It certainly is not his duty to do it?—No.

49,143. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) It may be his privilege?—That may be so. He may be competent to do it, but I do not know that he is.

49,144. Do you feel if a man is going to proceed by mere efflux of time to a post requiring qualities such as are involved in action of that kind, it would be well to secure that he should have high educational qualifications when he comes in?—It would be much better for him.

49,145. You agree that in all other Government departments, except the judicial departments, the clerks are appointed in different grades, and the purely routine work is done by a clerk who is appointed for that, and who is not upon the rota by ordinary promotion for the higher intellectual work. Would it be a good thing if that were introduced into your office?—I think our present arrangements are very good.

49,146. Since you are responsible for the whole control and supervision of the office, the question, for instance, whether typewriting should be introduced depends upon your decision, does it not?—No, I do not think so.

49,147. Then upon whose decision would it depend?—I do not think the question has ever been raised, but it is a matter for the Scrivenery Department, I should think.

49,148. But there is other writing done in your office at present besides that done by the scriveners?—Not much.

49,149. The scriveners have typewriters in their room. Has the question ever been raised whether they should write for you in longhand or in typewriting?—It has never been raised. I do not know that the scriveners have any typewriters in our department. I am told they have not.

49,150. Then, as far as you know, the question of whether typewriters should be used for this large mass of work for which 72*l.* per month is paid by the public has never been raised?—No, never.

49,151. Has it ever been considered whether women typists might be employed?—No.

49,152. As far as you know, that question has never been raised in your long experience?—Never; I have never raised the question of typewriting.

(Sir John Hewett.) I presume that when the judge consults the clerk it is about a definite point of law and procedure, and not upon an intellectual problem?

(Lord Mersey.) That is absolutely true. What I meant by my interruption was simply this, that on a question of practice a judge will frequently ask the clerk, who knows it much better than he does, what the practice is.

(Sir John Hewett.) I think I mean exactly the same thing, and I only wanted to get it on record.

49,153-4. (Sir John Kempe.) The classes of clerks coming to the office appear not to be arranged in relation to duties. I think you admitted that. They represent very little relation to the importance of the duties, that is to say, some of the second class at present do first class work, and the third class do second class work, overlapping to a certain extent?—Yes.

11 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES RIGG BROUGHAM. (Mr. J. W. BRADFORD was in attendance.)

49,155. Is there any discontent in the office as to being kept waiting for promotion?—Yes, there has been.

49,156. That, of course, is the case more or less in all departments, but in every legal department the proportions of the classes are different, and, therefore, in each department the prospects of promotion are different; that is to say, if you have a large top to the classes there is quicker promotion than if you have a small top to the classes?—We have a small class at the top compared with other departments.

49,157. In your office, do you think it might suit the organisation better to have what is called the Service scale? You know what the second division is; that is to say, a clerk goes in at the bottom and rises through classes, but the classes merely represent disciplinary checks. If a man is good enough he goes into the section above, without waiting. There is no question of the relation of the duties. Would you say that in your office a Service scale like that would be better than a division into classes very imperfectly representing duties?—No, I do not know that it would. I am very satisfied with the present arrangement.

49,158. You do not mind a man waiting at the top of the class until there is a vacancy. You would not prefer that he should go on?—Yes, I think so.

49,159. Of course, the Service scale is more expensive, and you would have to have rather lower salaries if you had the Service scale; but you prefer it as it is with the better salaries?—Do you mean that when he has served a certain time and gets to the top of his class he should have an opportunity of getting a higher salary?

49,160. That is what the Service scale is; as soon as a man reaches the top of his class he goes into the next scale, provided he is efficient?—Instead of going into the next class they get a higher salary.

49,161. It practically comes to that, that instead of going into a new class he gets a higher salary, and goes straight on according to the Service scale?—I should like anything that would improve their position.

49,162. Would you be willing to have a rather lower scale of salaries provided that they could count upon going right through from the bottom to the top, if they are efficient. Probably you cannot answer that?—I have not considered it.

49,163. (Mr. Matheson.) You told us that you work in the Long Vacation, and the work did not seem to be very much less than that in term time, and at the same time you said that the hours were from 10 to 2 in vacation. Do you find that that is enough to get the work done?—Not always, and they have to stay late very often.

49,164. The clerks are not supposed to have the right to go away at 2 if there is work waiting for them?—If there is work to be done they stay if required.

49,165. (Mr. Boutwood.) One question which arises rather out of the proceedings before this Commission at an earlier stage of its work: I received an impression then about changes that have taken place in the public service in course of time, and I wondered how far your experience would point to anything of the sort in the legal offices. You can look back for a good many years in a public department. How do you think the present ordinary clerical staff compares with the similar staff of 30 or 40 years ago?—I think it is very much the same. We had a very good staff of clerks 30 or 40 years ago, and some of them we still have. We have one certainly who was clerk 30 or 40 years ago.

49,166. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Can you throw your memory back 70 years? Is there any marked change in the composition of the ordinary clerkships now as compared with 70 years ago?—I think we have a better class of clerk now than we had 50 years ago.

49,167. But not better than you had 30 or 40 years ago?—I say they have always been improving, I think. Certainly I think we have a very high class staff of clerks now. Our second class clerks are very good. There are one or two papers I should like to hand in which might be useful, I think.

Mr. EDWARD MANSON, called and examined. Mr. THOMAS BARNES (chief clerk) was in attendance.

49,168. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Manson.) You are Registrar in Bankruptcy specially in charge of the Companies (Winding up) Department?—Yes.

49,169. How long have you held that office?—I was appointed in November 1912. I have held it two and a half years.

49,170. What was your experience prior to your appointment to that post?—I had been a practising barrister in Chancery, and I had been in Sir Francis Palmer's chambers, who, as you know, is a great company expert. I had been with him for several years, but before that I had written a great deal on company law—books and articles.

49,171. (To Mr. Barnes.) You are a first class clerk in the same department?—Yes.

49,172. How long have you been in the department?—I have been there ever since the office was established in 1892.

49,173. How long have you been a first class clerk?—Since 1895, but I was appointed in 1883 in the Chancery chambers, and I went over when the office was established.

49,174. (To Mr. Manson.) When was the present system of companies' winding-up instituted?—In 1891, in pursuance of the Companies' Winding-up Act, 1890.

49,175. Before that time the companies' winding-up had been conducted in the Chancery Division?—Yes.

49,176. That is to say, it was dealt with by the Chancery masters, the Chancery registrars, and the taxing masters?—That is so, and then a special department was created under the Act to meet the new machinery, that is, the machinery of the Board of Trade and the official receivers.

49,177. The effect of that Act was to take the work of companies' winding-up away from Chancery, and to create a self-contained Winding-up Department under a registrar?—That is so.

49,178. The whole of the business, including the filing of all documents, the making of orders, and the taxation of costs, is done in the department?—That is so.

49,179. What is the relation of your department to the Board of Trade?—There is none, except that the official receiver, who takes possession of the assets on a winding-up order being made is an official of the Board of Trade; but Lord Justice Vaughan Williams used to say he is also an officer of the Court; primarily he is an officer of the Board of Trade. Immediately on a winding-up order being made, the official receiver becomes the official receiver and liquidator. He then summons a meeting of the creditors and contributories of the company, and calls upon them to decide whether they will have the official receiver continued as liquidator or whether they will have a liquidator of their own choice.

49,180. The relation is much the same as the relation between the registrars in ordinary bankruptcy matters, and the Board of Trade receivers in Bankruptcy?—It is.

49,181. Are the Board of Trade receivers in companies' winding-up the same persons as the official receivers in ordinary bankruptcy?—No, there are three separate official receivers in companies' winding-up.

49,182. Whose work relates solely to companies?—Yes.

49,183. What is the ordinary course of proceedings in a company's winding-up? How is it initiated?—By a petition presented usually by a creditor.

49,184. Or by the company itself?—The petition may be presented either by a creditor, a contributory—that is, a shareholder—or by the company itself.

49,185. (Mr. Coward.) This is a compulsory liquidation?—Yes, I am speaking of that. The Act of 1890, I ought to say, for the purposes of the machinery created by the Act, related only to the companies ordered to be wound up compulsorily. Voluntary windings-up were left alone, but they have really been brought into the same machinery, because now applications can be made in voluntary windings-up to me or to the Court, and the same relief can be given under section 193 of the Act as is given in a compulsory winding-up. Any creditor or contributory, or the company itself, can make an application in relation to any matter occurring in the voluntary winding-up for guidance or decision. So that we have in this department the administration under a voluntary winding-up as well as under a compulsory order, and it represents a very large amount of the work done.

11 March 1915.] Mr. EDWARD MANSON. (Mr. THOMAS BARNES was in attendance.)

49,186. That would be where applications are made?—Only where application is made. Otherwise there is no control except that a voluntary liquidator has to send in quarterly reports to the Board of Trade to satisfy them as to how the voluntary winding-up is proceeding.

49,187. (Chairman.) Then a voluntary winding-up can be conducted without the control of the Court, except so far as is implied in those quarterly reports to the Board of Trade?—Yes; and in the power of applying to the Court for advice or direction in any matter which occurs.

49,188. Is the majority of the business that of compulsory winding-up or voluntary winding-up?—Far the larger number of companies are wound up voluntarily. I have the last return here, and perhaps I may give the figures. The number of companies ordered to be wound up was 137, according to the last report.

49,189. (Lord Mersey.) For what period?—That is during the year 1913, which is the last return. The number of voluntary windings-up was 1,799.

49,190. (Chairman.) Is that in the High Court only, or does it include the County Courts?—That includes the whole of the windings-up.

49,191. But the number dealt with in County Courts is not large?—It is not large, as far as I know. The result is that 90 per cent. of the companies liquidated are wound up voluntarily. Then there is another large proportion of companies that are struck off the register as defunct; they escape without any control at all.

49,192. Who initiates the procedure for that purpose?—The Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, if he does not receive the required returns within a certain time, sends notice to the company that they must send them in, and if they do not do so he automatically strikes them off, and they are done with.

49,193. Does that come before the registrar?—No. That is a matter which I think might well receive consideration, because there are not less than 1,035 of those companies in 1913 that have simply disappeared without any inquiry into their antecedents.

49,194. If any contributory wished for inquiry he could initiate proceedings for the purpose, I suppose?—He could, only generally it is a case of there being no assets and there is nothing to be got. The Board of Trade has power of inquiry, but it has to be set in motion by somebody, and there is nobody, as far as I know, who is concerned to set it in motion.

49,195. (Mr. Coward.) And it costs money to do it?—Yes.

49,196. (Lord Mersey.) And it is not worth doing?—No, there is no result to be got. Of course there may be misfeasance which might be got at. I think it represents a very unsatisfactory state of things that such a large body of companies should escape entirely uncensored or uninquired into.

49,197. There are a large number of companies which die of inanition and never do any work?—Those are the companies that I allude to.

49,198. As I understand, if they do no work for 12 months they can then be struck off the list?—That is so. If they cease to carry on business for a certain period—12 months I think it is—they are struck off the list automatically.

49,199. (Mr. Coward.) You mean, make returns; if they do not make returns is the point?—No, that is an independent cause. If a company has ceased to carry on its business, it is a cause for winding up.

49,200. (Chairman.) The automatic striking off is for failing to make returns?—Yes, that is so; only if a company has not carried on business for 12 months, it has ceased to make returns.

49,201. The company might do no business but yet make returns. A company may remain as a shell, and it may be desired to retain it as a shell for some future use?—Yes, the company may be dormant for a time and may revive.

49,202. You have told us how the proceedings may be initiated by petition from a contributory, a creditor, or from the company itself?—Yes.

49,203. Does that petition come before the registrar?—No, only in the initial stages. It is my business to see that everything is in order before it comes before the judge in winding-up, that the statutory affidavit has been filed and notices sent, and the petition properly advertised.

49,204. Has every petition for winding-up to come before the judge personally?—Yes, every petition.

49,205. Then if he makes an order for winding-up, how does the case go on?—In that case the official receiver becomes, as a matter of course, the provisional liquidator. He becomes the official receiver and liquidator, which is his proper title, provisionally: that is subject to the power of creditors and contributories to choose a liquidator of their own for the purposes of the winding-up.

49,206. Then the liquidation proceeds?—Yes.

49,207. How far does the liquidation come under the control of the registrar?—The official receiver's first step is to summon meetings of the contributories and creditors to determine whether they will have him as the liquidator of the company or have a liquidator of their own. If the creditors and contributories at the meeting are unanimous in wishing a particular person to be the liquidator for the winding-up, then he is appointed, and the official receiver transfers the assets and hands over the books and everything to him. If there is a difference of opinion between the meetings of creditors and contributories, it is brought before me, and I have to decide on the appointment, subject, of course, always to the liquidator, who is the choice of the meeting, being a fit and proper person. When he is appointed he enters upon his regular duties, that is to say, of getting in the assets, ascertaining the creditors, and making calls on the contributories. Getting in the assets includes making calls upon the contributories for the purpose of satisfying the debts of the company. I ought to say that before that is done the official receiver calls upon the directors to submit a statement of affairs as to the company and its dealings generally and assets, and that is done before the meetings of the contributories and creditors are held, in order that they may be posted up in the state of the company's affairs and exercise their discretion wisely.

49,208. When the liquidation has proceeded and when the receiver has got in all the assets he can and disposed of all the claims he can, does the matter come before the registrar again on further stages?—It is continually coming before me on the question of claims made to prove in the winding-up by creditors, and also in the matter of sanctioning calls being made on the contributories.

49,209. Those matters come before you?—Those matters come before me. Then there are constantly debenture holders' actions.

49,210. In what cases do they go on from you to the judge? Can the parties claim that a matter be adjourned to the judge?—No, I have a discretion as to adjourning. If I think it is a case which is quite plain, I make the order that I consider the proper one, and I leave it to the dissatisfied suitor to move to discharge my order before the judge.

49,211. As a form of appeal from you to the judge?—Yes, it takes that form; they move to discharge my order. But if it is a case of difficulty which ought to be thoroughly discussed, or involves a large amount, and the parties wish it, I adjourn it to the judge to come on as an adjourned summons before him to be argued by counsel.

49,212. Are you present in court when the judge is sitting?—No, I do not go into court. Mr. Barnes attends the court. I am entirely occupied, I may say, as a sort of judge in chambers in making orders.

11 March 1915.] Mr. EDWARD MANSON. (Mr. THOMAS BARNES was in attendance.)

49,213. Are there two judges who deal with the work of companies' winding-up?—Yes. At present it is assigned to Mr. Justice Neville and Mr. Justice Astbury.

49,214. Do they ever sit at the same time?—No, they sit alternate terms, one taking the work one term and the other the next.

49,215. So there is never more than one clerk required to sit in court with the judge?—No.

49,216. (Mr. Coward.) They are the two linked judges?—Yes. Mr. Barnes always attends unless he is unwell, and then the first class clerk attends.

49,217. (Chairman.) You mentioned debenture holders' actions?—Yes, they form a very important part of the work in my jurisdiction. Immediately on a compulsory winding-up order being made, any debenture holders' action which is pending in the Chancery Division against the company ordered to be wound up, is transferred automatically to us. All the accounts and inquiries have to be taken and the costs taxed, and all the very elaborate procedure connected with a debenture holders' action takes place in my department.

49,218. But unless a winding-up order is made, the debenture holders' action remains in the Chancery Division?—Yes, it goes on in the ordinary way.

49,219. Do you think that a satisfactory system, or do you suggest any change?—I think it would be very desirable that those actions should be transferred, but, of course, it would involve a heavier burden, not so much on myself, but on the staff of clerks who take these accounts and inquiries and make certificates.

49,220. Are there considerable differences in procedure between a debenture holders' action dealt with in your department and dealt with in Chancery?—There is no difference to speak of.

49,221. Would the work in connection with them be done by officers of the same class?—Yes. They could be dealt with in exactly the same way. It would only mean that the volume of our business would be largely increased.

49,222. You would do what the master does when it is in Chancery, and your clerks would do what the master's clerks do if it is in Chancery?—Yes. My work in relation to debenture holders' actions is not heavy. Of course, difficult questions arise often between the debenture holders and the unsecured creditors, and between the landlord's rights and the debenture holders' rights—those sort of things involve difficulty—but, as a rule, the bulk of the work in debenture holders' actions is done by the principal clerk, Mr. Barnes, and the first and second class clerks. I ought to say, with regard to debenture holders' actions, that they are very numerous, for this reason: that hardly any company is compulsorily wound up, or goes into voluntary winding-up, without having issued debentures—that is, exhausted all its borrowing resources. The debenture holders may not have asserted their rights before the winding-up, but either before or after the winding-up they, of course, do so; and it is a matter of course to give them leave, even after winding-up, to pursue their proper remedies. If it is a voluntary winding-up, they get leave to commence or continue proceedings in the Chancery Division as a matter of course.

49,223. Your suggestion is that it would be more convenient if all debenture holders' actions were dealt with in the Companies Winding-up Department and not in the Chancery Division?—Yes, I think so. I do not know what Mr. Barnes thinks. (Mr. Barnes.) I think they should be limited to the supervision cases as well as the compulsory. We should be overwhelmed if we took all the debenture actions in voluntary cases. The question was discussed when the order for transfer was made, and it was felt that we could not take the debenture actions in supervision cases; and so the order was limited to those actions with which the official receiver was connected, simply because it would be convenient to have the winding-up and the debenture action proceeding in one office. It was felt that the staff was not sufficient to take more, and that we should diminish the work in the Chancery Division.

49,224. The question of staff is another matter which might be met by a transfer of staff. Apart from that question of staff, as a matter of organisation, would it be more convenient that all company matters should be dealt with in the same department?—I think so.

49,225. I suppose considerable inconvenience must be caused if an action has to be transferred when half-way through from the Chancery Division to your department?—Yes; it is a difficult thing to pick up the threads of it. (Mr. Manson.) I should say there are other proceedings which are not connected with winding-up at all, like petitions to alter companies' objects; petitions for the reduction of capital, and petitions for the sanction of the Court to schemes of arrangement—all of which are outside winding-up, but which come chiefly before our department, and can be most satisfactorily dealt with by it. Our staff has special experience in those matters.

49,226. Do applications of that kind make a substantial part of the work?—At the present moment there are a considerable number of those matters pending before me in the initial stages, but they have to go ultimately before the judge in winding-up for his sanction. I give directions as to the proceedings for bringing them before the Court, the holding of meetings, advertisements, and so on.

49,227. Has every application for altering the objects of a company to go before the judge before it is granted?—Yes.

49,228. And every application to alter the title?—The name of the company can be altered with the sanction of the Board of Trade without going before the judge. When you petition to alter the objects of a company, it is sometimes necessary to alter the title of the company, because that is involved in an alteration of its objects, and the Court sometimes gives directions. Apart from that the change of name is a matter for the Board of Trade.

49,229. That gives us a general idea of the nature of the registrar's duties?—Yes.

49,230. As I understand, the registrar's functions are mainly, if not entirely, judicial?—That is so.

49,231. They cannot be said to be administrative?—No.

49,232. The administrative side of companies' winding-up is done by the receivers?—By the official receiver, yes, and by the receivers in debenture holders' actions and by liquidators in windings-up.

49,233. Can you give us some description of the work of the office?—My course of procedure is to hear the summonses which come before me, averaging 9 or 10 a day, perhaps 12, and to make a note in the file of what I consider the proper order in the case. It is argued sometimes at length before me, and counsel often attend. I make this note, and that is taken upstairs to Mr. Barnes or the chief clerk or second class clerks, and the order is drafted in the presence of the solicitors.

49,234. Who drafts the order?—The parties bring in a minute of the proposed order and this is compared with my note, and it is settled by the second class or first class clerks, and sometimes by the third class clerks. When drawn it comes back to me for signature.

49,235. Do accounts and inquiries constitute a substantial part of the work?—Yes, it is a very important part of the work.

49,236. By which class is that dealt with?—I should prefer Mr. Barnes to deal with the details of the work. (Mr. Barnes.) The judge makes the order, and it is upon his judgment that these are directed. The judge makes an order in court for accounts and inquiries in a debenture holder's action. Then that goes to chambers, and a summons to proceed is taken out, which comes before the registrar. The registrar then sends it upstairs to the officer whose duty it is to deal with that particular case.

49,237. That would be either a first or second class clerk?—Yes. Then he has the affidavits. Then all the debentures are produced before this particular clerk—one of the three—and notice is given to the holders of all debentures to produce them in chambers, to see whether they are in proper form, that the seal of the company is on, and that they are properly stamped.

11 March 1915.] Mr. EDWARD MANSON. (Mr. THOMAS BARNES was in attendance.)

49,238. Who actually examines the debentures?—The clerk before whom the inquiry is proceeding.

49,239. A first or second class clerk?—Yes. When he has seen those debentures, and they are all in order, or if there is one doubtful with no stamp on it, or improperly sealed, or not properly executed according to the articles, a query is made, and the registrar will ultimately decide what is to be done with that particular debenture. Then the clerk proceeds with the inquiry. A list is brought in, and he answers the inquiry according to the terms of the judgment.

49,240. And he draws up a certificate upon the evidence?—Yes; according to the evidence.

49,241. Is the certificate ultimately signed by the registrar?—Yes.

49,242. Does the registrar go into the details of the matter at all?—Not as a rule. Supposing the clerk had a doubt, he would put a query upon it and ask the registrar to see it.

49,243. Unless the clerk queries it, the registrar, as a rule, would accept the certificate drafted by the clerk?—Yes, that is the practice.

49,244. Are there many other kinds of inquiries besides those inquiries into debentures?—In the case of reduction of capital, involving a return to shareholders, there is an inquiry as to who the creditors are. The Court does not sanction a reduction in such cases until it has inquired as to whether creditors are affected.

49,245. Would that be conducted by affidavit?—Yes.

49,246. Is there any actual examination of the parties in cases of that sort?—No, it is all done by affidavit.

49,247. The evidence given by affidavit is examined by the first or second class clerks?—Yes, one of the three clerks.

49,248. Is there any clear line of distinction between the work of the first and second class and the work of the third class?—No. Messrs. Bull, Johnson, and Marvin do the same work.

49,249. They are the first and second class clerks?—Yes.

49,250. Is there a clear distinction between their work and the work of the third class?—We have divided it as best we can. It is very important work that the third class clerks are doing now. In Chancery chambers a first class clerk will take a receiver's account, but our third class clerks, Wilson and Roper, take receivers' accounts, and they also draw up the registrar's orders, which is done in the Chancery chambers by a clerk in a superior class.

49,251. Are the registrars' orders ever of a complicated character, or are they simple?—Sometimes they are complicated.

49,252. Do they ever involve complicated matters affecting a number of different interests and the rights of a number of different parties?—Certainly. (Mr. Manson.) Yes; very complicated questions arise often with so many parties—secured and unsecured creditors, contributories, landlords, preferential creditors, and others.

49,253. And it is upon those orders that the receiver would pay out large sums of money?—(Mr. Barnes.) Not the receiver, because in a debenture holders' action the money is in court, and there is a printed order—what we call a registrar's order.

49,254. The paymaster would act upon it and pay out large sums of money?—Certainly, very large sums of money.

49,255. Are those orders drawn up by a third class clerk?—No; all those money orders either myself, Mr. Bull, Mr. Marvin, or Mr. Johnson draw up.

49,256. So the orders drawn up by third class clerks would not be orders for the paymaster?—No, they would not include those.

49,257. What else have the third class clerks to do?—There is the matter of taxation of costs: they vouch the bills, and take receivers' accounts.

49,258. Is not that done by the clerks specially attached to the taxing master?—The registrar is the taxing master officially.

49,259. Mr. Tanner does not do the taxing of your costs?—No. It is done in the department itself. There are a large number of taxations.

49,260. The detailed examination of bills is done by third class clerks?—They go through all the lengthy documents and vouch the bills as to those particular documents. The bill is taxed by Mr. Bull or myself or Mr. Marvin or Mr. Johnson, according to the division of the letters within which the matter comes, and after the bill is taxed it is sent up to one of the third class clerks to vouch the bill.

49,261. That is merely the verification of facts, and not the exercise of discretion?—Quite so.

49,262. The exercise of discretion is done by first or second class clerks?—By the clerk who taxes the bill subject to the right of the parties to go to the registrar if they think the clerks have gone wrong.

49,263. Is much work of a purely clerical character done by the third class—the keeping of books and registers, and filing of documents?—In the issuing room, where petitions are issued, all the books are kept, but we have only one clerk to do this class of work. One clerk attends to the public and one clerk is always keeping the books. There are two third class clerks in that particular room.

49,264. So the work of a third class clerk is partly of a clerical and routine character?—Yes, in the issuing room.

49,265. And partly work of a better kind?—Yes.

49,266. Such as verification of accounts, and so forth, but not work requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion. Is that a fair description of it?—Except, of course, that the men in the issuing room must have some knowledge as to what they are doing. They have to see that a petition is in order, and summonses issued in proper form. They have to have some knowledge of what they are doing. The judges say, "We will have a summons taken out in a particular form," and the issuing clerk has to see that the judge's directions as to practice are complied with.

49,267. They must have some knowledge of forms of procedure and practice?—Yes, in that way.

49,268. (To Mr. Manson.) Is the registrar appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

49,269. Is there a statutory qualification?—No.

49,270. The clerks are also appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

49,271. Are you satisfied with the class of clerks who are appointed?—I have every reason to be satisfied with the whole staff. I think they do their work admirably.

49,272. Have they, as a rule, had previous legal experience?—No, I think they have acquired it mostly in the office.

49,273. Do you consider that any previous legal experience in a solicitor's office is an advantage or not?—I think it is desirable for the posts of second and first class clerks.

49,274. At present new appointments are made to the third class?—Yes.

49,275. And the first and second class are filled by promotion from the third class?—Yes, that is how it works.

49,276. Would you say it was desirable that appointments to the third class should be made from among persons who have had some experience in a solicitor's office?—Yes, I think it ought to be a recommendation.

49,277. Would you make it a necessary qualification for promotion to the second and first class?—That is what I think, that it should be made a necessary qualification for promotion to second or first class clerkships that the candidate should have had some experience either in a solicitor's office, or obtained a certificate or diploma in some legal school.

49,278. Do you think there would be any advantage in recruiting for the office by competition?—Not certainly for the higher posts. I am not prepared to say that for the third class clerks open competition might not do very well, subject to that qualification for promotion that I suggested.

49,279. Then you would contemplate a third class recruited partly from persons with previous experience and partly not, but that those who had had previous experience should alone be qualified for further promotion?—Yes, I think so.

11 March 1915.] Mr. EDWARD MANSON. (Mr. THOMAS BARNES was in attendance.)

49,280. (To Mr. Barnes.) What is your opinion as to a system of that kind?—I think a man who comes into the third class to issue summonses and take in petitions ought to have some legal knowledge.

49,281. You think he would be the better for previous legal knowledge?—In our office he goes to room 66, the issuing room, first. It will be his duty in a few days to take in a petition, but before he can take it in he must know what he has to look for to see that it is in proper form. He cannot do it if he has no previous legal knowledge.

49,282. Would it take him long to learn that?—Not one petition, but he must have a general knowledge of company procedure.

49,283. If he had served in a solicitor's office, would he necessarily have learnt the particular points which he has to know in your office?—It all depends from what office he came.

49,284. (To Mr. Manson.) Does the Lord Chancellor consult you about appointments?—No.

49,285. Has there been an appointment since you have been the registrar?—No, I have not been consulted, Mr. Barnes has been consulted. (Mr. Barnes.) The last three appointed were sent up to me first of all, and all three had been in solicitors' offices.

49,286. They were sent to you to be inspected?—Yes.

49,287. And you were asked to give a report as to their qualifications?—Yes, and I gave a report.

49,288. Were other candidates sent as well?—No, only those three.

49,289. That is to say, they were sent, and you were asked if you thought them suitable?—Yes.

49,290. You were not sent several candidates and asked which you thought the most suitable?—No. Each of those three men had been in a solicitor's office.

49,291. The suggestion has been made that you might have competition among persons who had served a certain time in a solicitor's office. Do you think that that would be a useful system?—(Mr. Manson.) For the third class I think it would be, because a knowledge of law is undoubtedly of great assistance all through the department. The clerk is met at every turn with questions of law.

49,292. (Lord Mersey.) Do you mean a general knowledge of law?—Yes, I think I should be right in saying a knowledge of the general principles of law.

49,293. That is a very wide thing?—I should not expect it of a third class clerk.

49,294. What age are these boys?—Mr. Barnes says there is nobody under 24 or 25.

49,295. What books would you suggest that they ought to study?—I think they ought to have a good acquaintance with company law and practice and mortgages, for instance.

49,296. That I can understand, but you said a general knowledge of law, which seems to me a tremendous thing?—Yes; well, one can never tell where general principles will not come in. I should rather have said commercial law. I think that would be better.

49,297. That does not appeal to me at all. What sort of commercial law? Would they have to know something about charter-parties and bills of lading?—No, I do not think maritime law would come in.

(Mr. Coward.) Dock warrants?

49,298. (Chairman.) Bills of exchange?—Bills of exchange very likely might come in.

49,299. (Lord Mersey.) I am afraid you would find your choice very limited if you wanted your man to know all this, would not you?—I would not say it should be made a sine qua non at all, but if a man had a good knowledge of law—the elementary principles I mean—I think it would be a recommendation for his appointment.

49,300. (Chairman.) How is promotion made in the office?—By seniority, speaking generally, subject to competence.

49,301. The promotion is made by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

49,302. On the recommendation of the registrar?—At present I have not yet been consulted because no vacancy has occurred. I do not know what the practice is in that respect. (Mr. Barnes.) The candidate has to get a recommendation from the registrar that he is competent. Our difficulty in this office is that there are so few opportunities of promotion. It is in inverse ratio to the Chancery chambers; in the Chancery chambers there are more first class clerks at the top, whereas in the Company office there are only two first class clerks and so many third class clerks.

49,303. Do you suggest that promotion is unduly slow for that reason?—Yes. (Mr. Manson.) Yes. I think that is one of the difficulties of the department. There are several very deserving men who are clerks in the third class with very little hope of preferment. The result is that they seek preferment elsewhere and they are lost to the department.

49,304. Have many been transferred to other departments?—(Mr. Barnes.) Yes.

49,305. Because they found promotion slow?—They could not get it in our office, and so got transferred to Chancery chambers. I should think there have been about six or eight since the office has been opened—some of the best men we have had, two or three of these men are now the very best first class clerks in Chancery chambers.

49,306. Looking at it, not from the point of view of individuals, but of the work to be done, do you consider that there is work done by third class clerks in your office which is done by clerks of a higher class elsewhere?—Yes, there is no doubt about that.

49,307. That might cut in both directions; it may be that the work done elsewhere by second or first class ought to be done by third class clerks?—Quite so.

49,308. Do you think clerks of long experience would ever be suitable for appointment as registrars?—(Mr. Manson.) I think they very well might be. Mr. Barnes would be quite competent.

49,309. At present the statutory qualification would, as a rule, stand in the way?—Yes.

49,310. Apart from the statutory qualifications would you be inclined to make clerks eligible for promotion to registrarships, if there was one who had the personal qualifications necessary?—Yes, I see no objection to their being eligible.

49,311. Are the hours of attendance in term and in vacations similar to those in other legal departments, namely, 10 to 4 in term?—That is so. (Mr. Barnes.) Our office is open all the year round. It is not an office which closes in vacation like Chancery chambers.

49,312. Does the work go on without much change in vacation?—There is not very much work during vacation. The work decreases immediately the vacation commences.

49,313. (Mr. Coward.) The judge does not sit?—No.

49,314. (Chairman.) Are the hours in vacation the same as in term time?—No, shorter. They are from 11 to 2 in vacation.

49,315. And 10 to 4 in term time?—Yes, nominally, but we do not always get away at four. I am sitting with the judge till half-past four, and have work to do when I get back from court.

49,316. Have the staff in general to stop much beyond nominal office hours?—Very often, yes. There is a great pressure of business at times.

49,317. Do you consider that the staff is hard worked?—Not since 1912. There was a small committee, which was presided over by Lord Justice Swinfen Eady, which inquired into the staff, and we had the staff augmented by one or two I think, and since then we cannot complain.

49,318. Since then you have had enough staff?—Yes.

49,319. Is the work increasing?—The war has rather affected it. 1912 was about the high-water mark, as you will see by the returns. (Mr. Manson.) It shows a steady rise. The work has grown with the growth of joint-stock enterprise. As I dare say the Commission know, the number of companies registered has increased by leaps and bounds. In 1863 there were 700 companies registered; in 1880, 1,100; in 1890 it had risen to 2,470; and according to the last return, 1913, it was 6,782. That is nearly treble what it was when this department was first started. That is in England alone.

11 March 1915.] Mr. EDWARD MANSON. (Mr. THOMAS BARNES was in attendance.)

49,320. (Mr. Coward.) That is the number of companies registered?—Yes.

49,321. (Chairman.) I suppose it comes in waves; you get times of boom when you get a great increase in the number of companies registered?—Yes.

49,322. And probably shortly afterwards a great increase in your work?—Yes, but the tide is steadily advancing, though occasionally it recedes. If you look at the returns you will see it has risen steadily from 700 to 7,000 since the present company system has been in operation, and naturally that increase has involved a corresponding increase in the amount of business in our department. Then we have the Birkbeck Bank and Australian Bank failures, and crises like that.

49,323. (Mr. Coward.) The Australian Bank failures gave you an enormous amount to do?—Yes. (Mr. Barnes.) The judge was then sitting until 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening; it was tremendous work.

49,324. Schemes were carried out in all those cases?—(Mr. Manson.) Yes, and the Bank of Egypt and Law Guarantee Trust cases involved an immense amount of work.

49,325. (Chairman.) In fact, any big failure which carries with it a number of other concerns gives you a large amount of work?—Yes. I should say apropos of the increase of business, that in 1900 creditors were given the right to apply to the court in voluntary windings-up, which they had not had before. Before that time, only contributories in the company could apply. That opened a new channel of business, and a large amount of work comes in that way into the department. Before that time they commenced an action in the Chancery Division; now they come direct by summons.

49,326. Do you consider the organisation of the office is satisfactory, and suitable for the work to be done?—I think it is very satisfactory. The clerks have been trained under Mr. Barnes, who has invaluable experience in these matters. Certainly, personally, I have nothing but praise for the staff.

49,327. Have you any alterations in the organisation to suggest?—No; it is the question of promotion which chiefly presses me.

49,328. That you have already explained?—Yes, I have mentioned that. Barring that, I do not think I can suggest any improvements.

49,329. (To Mr. Barnes.) Have you any suggestions to make as regards the organisation?—No, I do not think so.

49,330. How is your scrivenery work done?—It is done by the scribes of the Royal Courts. There is a branch in our building.

49,331. Do you use typewriting at all?—No.

49,332. Do you use shorthand at all?—No.

49,333. Would shorthand be of assistance in your work?—No, I do not think so. I use it myself when I am with the judge sometimes, when he is giving a judgment, and I want to take down a phrase or particular words. I find it very useful then.

49,334. But you do not dictate to a shorthand writer?—No. (Mr. Manson.) It is used in private examinations. An important part of my work is holding private examinations under Section 174 of the Companies Act.

49,335. Is that examinations of directors?—Of directors and promoters, and any person who can give information to the liquidator as to the dealings of the company with its assets. There are a great many of those, not quite so many recently as there were, but they furnish me with almost every afternoon's occupation, and in those cases a shorthand writer is always employed. I take a note myself.

49,336. You have a professional shorthand writer?—Yes, always.

49,337. Is there much copying work required in the department?—(Mr. Barnes.) Yes; the drafts of the certificates and drafts of judge's orders are a considerable number.

49,338. Those are copied in the Scrivenery Department?—Yes.

49,339. Would it be an advantage to employ typewriting for them?—I think it might be.

49,340. Are there any cases in which the public get office copies of documents?—Yes.

49,341. Are those at present written in longhand?—Yes.

49,342. Could not those with advantage be typewritten?—Yes, they would be much better to read.

49,343. Typewriting is easier to read and easier to produce?—Yes. (Mr. Manson.) I think it would be an advantage.

49,344. What is your opinion, Mr. Manson, as regards fixing an age limit for retirement?—I think 70 for the registrars is a good age, and, perhaps, 65 for the clerks.

49,345. Is there any reason why the ordinary rule should not apply to the clerks, that is to say, that they may retire at 60 and claim their pension, and that they must retire at 65 except in very special cases, where there is power to prolong?—I think that is a very reasonable arrangement, and I see no reason why it should not apply to this department.

49,346. Do you think it would be advantageous to apply it?—I think it would.

49,347. (To Mr. Barnes.) What is your opinion?—Speaking for myself, I was appointed when I was 23, so that I should have served my full time at 65, and I think, generally speaking, it operates fairly; but there are one or two cases in which it might not. One clerk who was appointed when the office was opened with special qualifications, came in at the age of 36, and the difficulty with him would be that he would have to retire before he had earned his pension. There are such special cases.

49,348. Where a man is appointed at a somewhat advanced period of life?—One came in at 36 with a special qualification. He would feel that very much; but, as a rule, I think the general consensus of opinion amongst clerks in the department is that they should retire at that age.

49,349. The junior clerks think that because it would have some bearing on the question of promotion?—I dare say. So far as I am concerned I should welcome it rather.

49,350. You say in your précis of evidence that you have found the result of giving good work and more responsibility to the third class clerks very satisfactory as regards its effect on the clerks themselves?—(Mr. Manson.) I think so. I think it stimulates their intelligence, and the responsibility alone is an incentive for them to do their best.

49,351. A man who has had some work of that better kind to do is, probably, better qualified for promotion when his turn comes than a man employed solely on mechanical work?—I think so. I know they feel it keenly when they have been transferred to the Chancery Division and put to a lower class of work.

49,352. They feel the monotony of the work?—Yes, and a sort of degradation.

49,353. (Mr. Matheson.) (To Mr. Barnes.) You went in as a third class clerk?—Yes.

49,354. What was your previous experience?—I had been seven years with Messrs. Mackrell, Maton, and Godlee, solicitors, in Cannon Street.

49,355. Are there any of the present third class clerks who have not been with a solicitor?—Certainly, we have two or three, I think.

49,356. They did manage to learn the business in the office?—Yes, they did; but they have been there many years, and have been passed over for promotion once or twice because of that.

49,357. (Sir John Kempe.) I see you have two first class clerks; the Bankruptcy Department only has one. Is that due to the larger number of registrars in the Bankruptcy Department?—Yes, I suppose that is so, but I know that it is a great hardship in Bankruptcy. I happen to know the clerk to the judge in Bankruptcy well, Mr. Roper, and he is one of the most indefatigable workers in Bankruptcy, but he remains a second class clerk.

49,358. Do you know why you have two first class clerks appointed to you?—In Bankruptcy there are four or five registrars who are registrars to the judge, and go and sit with the judge in court now. In Companies Winding-up Mr. Manson never attends the judge; I attend as registrar. The first class clerks draw up the orders, and the registrar has nothing whatever to do with Court orders except to initial them.

49,359. The different classes of clerks in the two offices generally represent in all respects some distinction in the work?—No doubt. In Bankruptcy there is no debenture holders' action and the clerks do not do that sort of work at all. (Mr. Manson.) Bankruptcy is much more simple than Companies Winding-up—more cut and dried.

49,360. Why are four registrars required in Bankruptcy and only one in your department?—I am afraid I cannot answer that; I sit sometimes in Bankruptcy as well. I am taken away from Companies Winding up, that is to say, I attend the judge once a fortnight when sitting in Bankruptcy. Still that does not answer your question, but tends rather the other way. I do not think the Bankruptcy Department is overworked at all.

49,361. When you say you are satisfied with your organisation, you do not mean that you think the chances for promotion are sufficient in the office?—No, I think that is the one difficulty.

49,362. And you can see no way out of that?—I suggested a method of an annual increase of salary after a certain age of meritorious service in the third division, if there is no vacancy.

49,363. As I was asking the last witness, do you know the Service scale where a man comes in at the bottom and rises right through to the top, and is only cut off from rising to the top if inefficient. That is in what is called the Second Division?—I do not know that.

49,364. Might not that suit an office like this, that is to say, clerks come in at the bottom and rise if efficient, and I suppose as they get to the top you would have enough clerks at the higher salary to provide for the higher duties?—I think that might meet the difficulty rather well.

49,365. It is more expensive, and you would have to put up with a lower scale if you had men going right through?—I think that is a good suggestion.

49,366. (Mr. Coward.) (To Mr. Barnes.) You have been through a course of training that is very good I should have thought for your post of so many years in a solicitor's office of position, and since then in your present office. It has been suggested that competition for entry into the second or first classes would be desirable. You say that it would be desirable that the clerks should have legal training?—Yes.

49,367. Supposing a man has been in a solicitor's office for, say, five or seven years, and then he finds that there is a post vacant in your office and applies for it, how are you going to examine him?—I know the class of case you refer to, of course.

49,368. That is the class of case that ordinarily would come before you if you were going to have a man trained in a solicitor's office?—Yes.

49,369. How are you going to make those people compete. Supposing that, not I myself, but somebody in the legal profession, write to you and say, "Mr. Barnes, this clerk of mine has been in my office for seven years, and I can thoroughly recommend him for your post;" could you have anything better?—Not from such a firm as yours, certainly not.

49,370. I mean, if you knew who was writing to you and giving that kind of certificate, would not that be the very best thing?—I should think so, certainly. I recollect the case of three men who came in in 1881 when they were 36 years of age as managing clerks from eminent solicitors' firms. They came in apparently with some intimation that they might be called upon to pass some examination. Of course they found it difficult at that age to do anything of the sort, but they had had enormous experience in the legal profession and were invaluable men, and ultimately their Civil Service certificates were granted them without examination.

49,371. And they have done well since?—Yes, they were three of the very best men we ever had.

49,372. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) (To Mr. Manson.) Is yours a pensionable post?—Yes, I believe so. I have never gone into the question of pension.

49,373. You were appointed in 1912?—Yes.

49,374. At the age of 62?—Yes.

49,375. Do you know whether any years were added to your service?—I believe it is 15 years for a registrar.

49,376. Are you under the 80ths scheme or the 60ths scheme?—I cannot tell you.

49,377. You do not know at what age, having been appointed at the age of 62, you will reach your full pension?—No, I am afraid I cannot tell you.

49,378. Was it necessary for you to get a Civil Service certificate?—No, I furnished no certificate.

49,379. You have here under your department certain messengers and book ushers?—(Mr. Barnes.) Yes.

49,380. One is J. Pike, who was appointed in 1911 at the age of 47?—He came in 1892. I should think he came to the office before the office was opened.

49,381. (Mr. Matheson.) He may have been temporarily employed before?—I only know that when the office was opened Pike was there in 1892.

49,382. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Is he pensionable?—No.

49,383. (To Mr. Manson.) You state, in your notes of evidence, that in the case of the personal patronage of the Lord Chancellor the opinion of the profession is a sufficient safeguard?—Yes. I ought to have added to that, that the high status of the Lord Chancellor himself is a sufficient guarantee, but I think, coupled with the criticism of the profession, it is sufficient for the purpose.

49,384. The profession is a very ancient one?—It is very jealous, really, as to the appointment of properly qualified men to important positions.

49,385. That criticism of the profession has been in existence very many hundreds of years?—Yes.

49,386. Has it always been during those many centuries a sufficient safeguard?—I suppose jobs have been perpetrated, but I think they were less conspicuous in the old days.

49,387. Less conspicuous?—No doubt the profession is independent, but I think it was less disposed to be critical then than it is to-day. Patronage was looked on in former times as a personal perquisite of office rather than as a public trust.

49,388. (Mr. Boutwood.) (To Mr. Barnes.) Apparently the two first class clerks and the two second class clerks do very much the same sort of work?—Yes, to a certain extent.

49,389. The impression your evidence gave me was that they were rather the seniors and juniors of one class than two classes, if you judge them by their work?—Really it is this. There is so much to do that, for general purposes, we divide the letters A to F, G to N, and O to Z. Mr. Johnson takes A to F, Mr. Bull takes the middle letters, and Mr. Marvin the last batch.

49,390. But there is nothing in their work that really corresponds to the difference, for instance, between 280*l.* and 540*l.* in the salaries?—No, not so far as the ordinary work is concerned. I do not do that class of work. I do the same class of work as the registrar in Chancery.

49,391. You spoke of the Scrivenery Department in your office. Is that in any sense under your control?—Not at all. We simply send work down. They call three or four times a day for the work.

49,392. If you wished you could not say to them, This shall be done in typewriting and this in longhand?—I do not know. I might say that, and probably they would do it because they are reasonable people. I believe they have typewriters at the Courts now, but I have never requested it to be done. I have no control over them really.

49,393. But their whole method rests with themselves and not with you?—Yes.

49,394. (Chairman.) If you wished to make a change you would go and discuss the matter with the head of the Scrivenery Department, and see if arrangements could be made to introduce the change?—Certainly, I should go to Mr. Stringer.

Mr. EDWARD STANLEY ROSCOE, called and examined.

49,395. (Chairman.) What is the office that you hold?—That of Admiralty Registrar; or it used to be called Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty.

49,396. How long have you held the office?—Since 1904. I was assistant registrar from 1890 to 1904.

49,397. What had been your experience before that?—I had practised in the Admiralty Court, and had written a book on Admiralty law and practice. I had been reporter, first of all, for the Law Journal and then for the Law Reports in the Admiralty Court.

49,398. How did the present Court of Admiralty arise? It is the successor of the old High Court of Admiralty, is it not?—Yes. When the Judicature Act, 1873, was passed it was absorbed into the High Court as part of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

49,399. So that in its present form it dates from the Judicature Act?—Yes.

49,400. The organisation with a registrar, an assistant registrar, and a certain number of clerks, has been the same since the time of the Judicature Act?—Yes, it was altered in 1896 when the Admiralty Marshal's Department, which was a separate department, became part of the Admiralty Registry. At that time the Marshal's Department was quite separate. There were a marshal and two clerks. He had nothing whatever to do with the Registry, so to speak, but considered himself quite separate and outside the purview of the Admiralty Registry.

49,401. Will you tell us briefly the nature of the work that comes before the Admiralty Court?—It consists in trying cases of collision, cases of salvage, sometimes of wages, sometimes of necessities, and occasionally what are called co-ownership cases.

49,402. (Mr. Coward.) Bottomry?—Hardly any bottomry cases now. I do not think there has been a bottomry case for five years.

49,403. (Chairman.) I gather from the judicial statistics that salvage and collision are the two principal classes of case?—Yes, more especially collision. A large number of salvage services go to arbitration under what are called Lloyd's Agreements, or by agreement of the parties.

49,404. Do the cases of claims to seize ships by mortgagees come before the Admiralty Court?—Occasionally, but not very often.

49,405. Those cases are not common?—No, not common.

49,406. What are the duties of a registrar with reference to the business of the Court?—The registrar's principal and most important work is adjudicating on references; that is to say, assessing the damages. He has also to hear the summonses.

49,407. A case comes before the judge, and the judge refers the case to the registrar to determine the exact amount of damage, or the exact amount to be paid for salvage?—In a collision case, where a vessel has been found to blame, it is referred to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages; and all the damages, of whatever sort, whether of injury to the vessel or the resulting loss to the owners, are then assessed by the registrar and merchants. In a large number of cases the actual cause never comes before the Court at all; it is settled by the parties, who agree that one vessel is to blame, or that both are to blame, and ask for a reference to the registrar and merchants.

49,408. Is there an appeal from that assessment to the judge?—Yes; but it is more usually upon a point of law, or something involving a point of law; as a rule, parties do not appeal upon questions of fact.

49,409. In salvage cases does the registrar assess the amount of the salvage?—No; that is assessed by the Court.

49,410. Is that always done by the judge?—Always.

49,411. With the assistance of his assessors?—He is supposed to do it himself, and only to ask the assessors' advice on nautical points.

49,412. Besides references, what other work does the registrar do?—The hearing of the summonses for time; for examination of witnesses; for discovery of documents; and all the various interlocutory applications which take place in the course of an action.

49,413. All those are dealt with by the registrar?—By the registrar or the assistant registrar.

49,414. Does that give a complete account of his duties?—There are various other things. There is correspondence, questions as to fees of the Trinity Masters, arranging for the attendance of nautical assessors, and various points of that kind, and the supervision of the staff. Various points crop up from time to time on which he is consulted.

49,415. You also tax the bills?—Yes; all the bills of costs are taxed usually by the assistant registrar, and if the registrar has taken a reference in which there is any special point, and the parties ask him to tax the bills of costs, he does it himself.

49,416. There is an entirely separate division of the work relating to prizes?—I should not say it is separate. The Admiralty Registry is the Prize Registry, but the work, of course, only exists in war time.

49,417. Will you tell us what that work is?—It consists of the same sort of work as there is in an Admiralty suit. Most of the interlocutory work is settling the amount at which bail shall be given for release of cargo. That has been most of the interlocutory work at present. There are also orders for restitution, and there are other interlocutory proceedings. The marshal, of course, has the control, subject to the registrar, of the sale of the ships and cargoes, and their care; but that is abnormal work.

49,418. That is work which only occurs in war time?—Yes.

49,419. I do not quite follow what the functions of the registrars are in relation to that. Who is it who decides whether a prize is a proper prize or not?—That is for the Court to decide.

49,420. That is decided by the judge?—Certainly. There has also been a great deal of correspondence with all sorts of people asking that they shall be entrusted with the sale of the vessels, and inquiries from foreigners and from different embassies as to what was going on in regard to cargoes and ships.

49,421. The registrar deals with that correspondence?—Yes.

49,422. If the Court decides that the vessel or the cargo is to be sold, who has charge of the proceedings for selling?—That is the marshal's business. He instructs an ordinary shipbroker to sell them.

49,423. Is that under the control of the registrar, or is the marshal independent of the registrar in respect of those duties?—Prima facie he has to arrange for the sale, but if there is any question of difficulty, or as to charges, he consults the registrar about it.

49,424. Are the accounts of the sales kept in the Registrar's Office?—There is an Accountant's Department now, a separate department of the Prize Registry.

49,425. That has been created specially for the purpose?—Yes. It was quite clear that we had no staff for that purpose at all, so a chartered accountant was obtained, and clerks were appointed. The Treasury are very anxious that the whole thing should be carried out in that sort of way.

49,426. (Mr. Coward.) It is done under the Treasury in connection with the Procurator-General?—We have nothing to do with the Procurator-General.

49,427. But the Treasury have?—The financial part of the Treasury considers itself quite separate from the Procurator-General, and the authorities are sometimes annoyed when he releases cargo. The Treasury, as the Treasury, do not trouble themselves about anything except the financial part of prize work.

49,428. (Chairman.) Who is the Procurator-General?—Sir John Mellor.

49,429. What is his office?—He is the representative of the Crown—the Treasury Solicitor. I have never been able to find out yet where the term "Procurator-General" comes from. He is the Treasury Solicitor.

49,430. "Procurator-General" is the name used for the Treasury Solicitor, in respect of dealings with prize cargoes and ships?—Yes.

49,431. Is this Accountant's Department which has been created for dealing with prize money under your directions?—Yes; I should not venture to interfere with its work; but, generally speaking, I am responsible for it, and the accountant consults me from time to time about matters brought before him.

11 March 1915.]

Mr. EDWARD STANLEY ROSCOE.

49,432. Is it part of your duty to sit in court when the judge is sitting?—Yes; that used to be done more than it is now. I find now there is not time to sit in court. I go once or twice a week. I always go on the morning when summonses and motions are heard. When I am not present the assistant registrar will go sometimes, providing his bills of costs and other work is not taking up his time, and at other times we arrange for one of the clerks to be there.

49,433. (Lord Mersey.) Can you tell us how the connection between the Admiralty Court and the Probate and Divorce Courts arose?—They were both courts which sat at Doctors' Commons in former times, and the practitioners in them were Doctors of Civil Law. I suppose, in the desire for uniformity, they were thrown into one.

49,434. When did that happen?—That was at the time of the Judicature Act, 1873.

49,435. Before that they were separate courts?—Before that they were absolutely separate courts. The same judge always tried Admiralty cases, and the same judge always tried Probate and Divorce cases.

49,436. That is before 1875?—Yes. Sir Robert Phillimore was the Admiralty judge when they were amalgamated, and Sir James Hannen, I think, was the Probate and Divorce judge.

49,437. (Chairman.) By whom is the registrar appointed?—By the President of the Division.

49,438. Is there a statutory qualification?—Yes; I think it is ten years at the Bar, or ten years as a solicitor.

49,439. Are the clerks in the office appointed in the same way?—Yes, subject to the approval of the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor, if they are appointed before the lapse of a month after the vacancy occurs.

49,440. That is to say, the approval of the Treasury and Lord Chancellor is required to the filling of a vacancy, but not to the nomination of the individual?—Not to the nomination of the individual.

49,441. The assistant registrar is also appointed by the President of the Division?—Yes.

49,442. Does the statutory qualification also apply to him?—Yes.

49,443. The present assistant registrar, I see, was appointed in 1904?—Yes.

49,444. Had he practised at the Bar before that?—Yes. He had been in practice at the Admiralty Bar.

49,445. Your staff consists of two first class clerks, three second class clerks, and four third class clerks?—Yes.

49,446. Is promotion usually from the lower class to the higher classes?—Yes; it goes by seniority, unless there is any reason to the contrary.

49,447. Has promotion by seniority often been departed from?—Twice that I know of; once on account of health, and once because a man was inefficient to do the higher and more responsible work.

49,448. Have the persons appointed to the third class generally had any previous legal experience?—No, never. They are appointed between the ages of 20 and 23.

49,449. Do you consider that legal experience would be desirable?—No.

49,450. It is not necessary?—No, I do not think so.

49,451. Any law that they have to know they can learn in the office?—Yes. I think it would be a good thing if, at the end of 18 months or a year, they passed an elementary examination in procedure, which would induce them to read about procedure, and know perhaps sooner a little more about the work they were doing, such as drawing up orders, and matters of that sort.

49,452. At present they have to obtain a Civil Service certificate, and they have to pass an elementary examination?—They have to pass a qualifying examination.

49,453. And that is of a very elementary character?—Very elementary, and not very suitable in some ways.

49,454. Do you suggest that the examination should be made more of a test?—No, I do not think so. I think the present examination proves that they are fairly well educated, and a little bit more would not make very much difference. They are well educated and intelligent, and they come to us generally from a public school; two, I think, were at Westminster and two at St. Paul's.

49,455. Do you find that the men who have been appointed are suitable for the work?—Quite.

49,456. But you suggest that it would be desirable to have an examination in legal procedure, which they should pass after they had been a certain time in the office?—Yes; I think it would make them get to know their work quicker, and they would pick it up, perhaps, more intelligently at first.

49,457. Can you describe generally the nature of the work done by the clerks?—It is what you would call clerk's work; it is receiving the affidavits, looking after the stamps, drawing up orders, sending out notices, and collecting the fees for the bills of costs. In the Marshal's Department it is doing the subsidiary work of the marshal—writing to the brokers, and looking after his fees—all what you might call the minutiae of the office.

49,458. It is clerical work, but not work requiring great discretion or judgment?—No. The clerks require to be industrious and fairly intelligent.

49,459. The suggestion has been made that open competition should be applied to the recruitment of the various legal departments. What would you say to that suggestion as regards your department?—I do not know why the legal departments should be omitted from the system of public competition.

49,460. You want men of good education and intelligence, but without special legal qualifications?—Yes.

49,461. And they could be obtained as well by open competition as by other ways?—Certainly. I do not know that you would get more satisfactory material, because my experience of my particular department is that the men we have got there are satisfactory. Of course, we take some trouble to find out and get, if possible, a satisfactory young man.

49,462. What are the hours of attendance in the office?—The normal hours are from 10 to 4, except in vacations, when they are 10 to 2.

49,463. Does the work go on much in vacations?—No, there is very little work in vacation.

49,464. What holidays do the clerks get?—They are supposed to have six weeks' holiday.

49,465. Do they, as a matter of fact, get more owing to the slackness of the work in vacations?—No, we arrange it so that there is always somebody there, and it works out at about six weeks' holiday for each of them.

49,466. But they have the easier hours of attendance in vacation?—Yes, they have that.

49,467. Do they often have to stop beyond the regular office hours?—Not in normal times.

49,468. Has the war given rise to additional work?—Yes, the clerks have been at the office till 8 and 9, and sometimes 10 o'clock at night in August and September, and sometimes on Sundays.

49,469. Was that on prize work?—Only on prize work.

49,470. In normal times the work can be done in office hours?—Yes, from 10 to 4.

49,471. The taxation is done in the office?—Yes, generally by the assistant registrar, unless there is some special request that the registrar shall tax a bill of costs, either because he has taken the reference or made various orders which have got complicated, and with regard to the costs of which the parties would like him to adjudicate.

49,472. A question has been raised as to whether the taxation work ought to be transferred to the Central Taxing Office. What is your opinion on that point?—I think that would be a mistake. I do not think it would be nearly so convenient for the solicitors' clerks, and I do not think it would be so satisfactory for the suitors. The assistant registrar is acquainted with the progress of the case from the beginning to the end. He can consult the judge if there is a question in respect of a witness. As regards the reference costs he can ask the registrar whether a witness was necessary. There would not be work enough for the assistant registrar unless he did have the costs to tax. Very often there is what they call a query standing in a bill—some point upon which they want further information, and the assistant registrar will say: "I will take that after the summonses 'when you are up here.'" So that it works in with all the other work very satisfactorily. All the papers are in the registry and would have to be sent across backwards and forwards to the Central Office. The taxing officers of the Central Office are not acquainted with the particular Admiralty work, and if specialisation is of any value I should think it would be applicable to the taxation of costs.

Mr. EDWARD STANLEY ROSCOE.

49,473. The bills are of rather a special character?—Yes. The most important part of them are the costs of the witnesses. They are seafaring witnesses coming from all parts, who have to be detained sometimes. Many of those bills come to very large sums in respect of the charges of witnesses—men brought, for instance, from Greece.

49,474. So you are decidedly of opinion that the taxation work had better remain where it is?—Yes. I think it is efficiently done now, and conveniently, as far as I know, and I cannot see any advantage in transferring it, certainly not from the point of view of the suitor, who is the person to be kept in view.

49,475. At present there is no limit of age for retirement either for the registrars or the clerks?—None.

49,476. Do you think there ought to be a limit?—I should think it probably would be desirable.

49,477. In the case of the clerks, do you see any reason why the ordinary Civil Service rules should not apply as regards the age for retirement. A man may retire at 60, and must retire at 65, roughly?—Yes, I should think that that is reasonable. Certainly, if you have a very old clerk—we, fortunately, have not any—it might be very disagreeable, and it would not tend to efficiency.

49,478. As regards the registrars themselves, it has generally been considered that if a limit was fixed for officers whose work was of a judicial character, it should be a higher limit than in the case of the higher clerical staff. What limit do you think should be established in the case of registrars?—I should think probably 70.

49,479. Do you find the present organisation of your office satisfactory?—Yes.

49,480. You have no alterations to suggest?—I do not see that any alteration is required. We endeavour to make everybody know something about the work; we move them about, and we give the two first class clerks the most responsible part of the work. One has to look after the references, and the other looks after the work connected with the court and judge's summonses, and attends the judge from time to time in his rooms. The others we change about from one room to the other, so that they may all know something of the work that is going on.

49,481. (Mr. Shipley.) If a candidate for the post of clerk fails in the examination, can he sit again?—I believe he can sit as many times as he likes, but I have never known of any case of sitting more than twice. They generally fail on their handwriting, and then they go to Clark's College, or some place of that sort, and go through a course of handwriting, and then they pass the second time.

49,482. If they fail in one subject, I believe they only take that single subject when they sit again?—I believe that is so.

49,483. The age of entry, I gather, is from 20 to 30, which just cuts out the ordinary boy who has left school at 17 or 18?—Yes.

49,484. Would there be an improvement if the age was lowered?—I do not think so. Before boys get to 20 the details of business or work connected with law and that sort of thing would be almost incomprehensible to them.

49,485. At the age of 30 you would hardly expect to get a good man coming in at the salary of 100*l.*?—We should not think of allowing anybody of an age as high as 30 to sit for examination.

49,486. I thought they could sit from 20 to 30?—Very likely; but it has always been a rule, I think, that nobody above 23 would be nominated by the President.

We have had numbers of applications from people of the age of 30; generally, they have been solicitors who have not succeeded.

49,487. Is promotion in your office almost entirely by seniority, or is it ever tempered by merit?—It is always seniority, unless a man is not fit to be promoted. There was one man who was not fit to be promoted because he suffered from fits, and as he would have had to attend the judge in his room we thought it undesirable to promote him, and, therefore, he was not promoted.

49,488. Am I right in thinking that clerks on the staff are not eligible to be promoted to registrars?—Yes.

49,489. But in the Probate and Divorce Registry they are, I think?—I believe they are.

49,490. Do you see any objection to it?—I think it would be better for them to be either barristers or solicitors. I think they would understand and manage the work of summonses and references better.

49,491. But could not one of your clerks become a barrister whilst he was still a clerk?—No; the Inns of Court will not allow any clerk at the Law Courts to enter as a student. One of our clerks was very anxious to be a barrister; in fact, he entered with the view of learning the work there, earning his livelihood and working for the Bar by reading after hours, but they would not admit him. I think, probably, the staff of the Law Courts would be improved if young men who had some idea of going to the Bar could become clerks. I think a young man of fairly good ability, who was a clerk, and thought he saw his way to getting on at the Bar afterwards, ought to be able to become a student.

49,492. (Lord Mersey.) We heard this morning that some of the clerks—I think second class clerks in the Bankruptcy Department—had become barristers while they were clerks?—I am surprised to hear it.

49,493. I was surprised to hear it?—I think they could not have said they were clerks.

49,494. I thought by the rules of the Inns of Court they were precluded?—There is no question about that. Lord Justice Buckley took up the case of one of our clerks and tried very hard personally to get the rule altered or some exception made for him, but nothing could be done.

49,495. (Mr. Shipley.) When you take a prize like the Kronprinzessin Cecilie what do you do with the mail?—You mean if there are some letters on board? I should think there was no writ issued against them, and that they were handed to the Post Office. There must be a writ against a particular article if it is going to be adjudicated upon, and I should think probably the mails were never seized at all.

49,496. (Sir John Kempe.) In your précis you say: "The officers of customs are the marshal's substitutes, and they receive one half of the fees for such work as they perform for him." They do not keep those fees, I think, but they are handed over to the Treasury?—I suppose they are, but I am not sure about that. What they do with the fees is outside our purview altogether. It was an arrangement between the Treasury and the Customs that for doing this work they should get some advantage. They do not get the fees in prize matters, certainly, but they expected to.

49,497. The clerks in the marshal's office are interchangeable with your office?—They are practically entirely one office. When the marshal's office was absorbed in the registry he had two separate clerks. One of those would in the ordinary course have become marshal, and as a solatium he was made a redundant first class clerk, and when he retired his place was not filled up. There was a reduction both of the marshal and a clerk.

49,498. When you have extra work, as you have now, you bring in men from outside temporarily?—We applied to the Treasury for leave to appoint a temporary clerk, and they settled what salary he was to receive, and then we got one.

49,499. Do you find temporary clerks pick up the work quite sufficiently for you?—It is mercantile work chiefly, and we arranged for the accountant or some gentleman in the city to find a clerk.

11 March 1915.]

Mr. EDWARD STANLEY ROSCOE.

49,500. Shipping clerks?—Yes; we have had one temporary clerk, a young man who had just left Cambridge, who had a good head for figures. He has been put under the gentleman who looks after the insurance, and he has done very well; in fact, he has done so well that this gentleman would like to get him a place in the City when the war is over.

49,501. You are satisfied with the organisation of your office?—Yes, it is a small office, and I think it is well organised and does the work satisfactorily, so far as I know.

49,502. You say, "The present organisation secures a rapid and convenient despatch of business, which is essential if the shipping work is to be kept in the Law Courts." What do you mean by that exactly?—I mean by that, that if you take a long time over a case and let the thing drag on, the parties will go to arbitration. There are a certain number of arbitrators well known in the City, both legal and lay, to whom matters are referred, and the London Chamber of Commerce has its arbitrators; so that there is a kind of competition, and unless the work is done rapidly and satisfactorily, people will go then to business people in the City. I know our work is done satisfactorily. There was a case called the "Berlin," in which the Great Eastern Railway Company's steamer was sunk. They limited their liability, and all their claims were brought into the Admiralty Registry. A certain number of the loss of life claims were tried by juries, but many of them, 20 or 30, we tried, and 200 or 300 claims for personal injuries, and hundreds of claims for goods. The Great Eastern Railway Company sent us a letter at the end of it thanking us for our efficiency and the economical manner in which we had disposed of the business.

49,503. Those arbitrators are not official?—No, but they are efficient, and are always ready to take the work.

49,504. But if the people can get the work done outside, does it matter to you whether they go outside or not?—No, it does not matter to us, only we should like to keep the work. If the Law Courts exist for the purposes of litigation we should like to have it.

49,505. You think it necessary to keep up a practice even if it is more expensive to the public?—No, I do not think it is more expensive.

49,506. (Mr. Coward.) The questions most referred to private arbitration are those relating to salvage?—Certainly.

49,507. And there has been a very great deal of work taken from the court to go to private arbitration in that way?—Yes, a great deal.

49,508. A large proportion?—I do not think there are as many cases of salvage tried in the courts now as there used to be, but I could not say offhand. At the present time there are a large number in court, which is rather a curious feature. I do not understand why it is. Many cases go to arbitration on Lloyd's Agreements, in which there is a special clause that the amount of salvage shall be referred to arbitration.

49,509. That is quite right; but can you tell the Commission why that is? Have you any idea how it has come about that underwriters should prefer to have a decision of an arbitrator?—I think one reason is that they think they get better awards from arbitrators than from the Court.

49,510. (Lord Mersey.) By better you mean bigger?—I should have said larger.

49,511. (Mr. Coward.) But both of them agree—both the person against whom the claim is made and he who has to pay it?—Yes. That is what I have always understood is one of the reasons; and another is that it is—I will not say less prolonged, because it is not prolonged, but there is less trouble. The case is tried upon documents; each side gives the master's statement, and the award is thereupon made upon it.

49,512. I should have thought myself that the want of uniformity in the decisions as to the amount awarded in different cases makes the difficulty, and that is why to a very large extent the lay tribunal is selected?—I think in awarding salvage you ought, so to speak, to feel the atmosphere of the salvage case, which, perhaps, is not so easy unless you have been acquainted with commercial litigation for a long time.

49,513. I think you have hardly done your own particular court justice with regard to references. References involve most serious questions?—Yes, there are a good many difficult questions in relation to the law of damages that come up.

49,514. You may instance the case of the "Parana" which your predecessor dealt with?—Yes. There are many cases which come up involving questions of law, or questions partly of law and partly of fact.

49,515. And you are assisted by two gentlemen who call themselves merchants, who have had mercantile training and who are able men, selected for their ability?—Yes.

49,516. And who are most competent in cases of this kind?—Yes, I think they are, certainly.

49,517. They have been in the past?—I think they are now. They are not so easy to get now as they used to be, because a man in the City who has a certain amount of leisure, and at the same time is anxious to do some work, can get on to a board of a company, perhaps.

49,518. You have practiced at the Bar, and you have been, as I have been myself, before the late Mr. Rothery with two of his mercantile assessors, and I should think you would say that there was no more competent tribunal?—I should think it a competent tribunal. I should think that the small number of arbitrations in regard to damages is due to the fact that people find it a satisfactory tribunal. There is no doubt that the foreigners prefer rather to go there for assessment of damages than to go anywhere else in their own country.

49,519. Is such a tribunal one of the best that you could get under any ordinary circumstances if you have to have disputes settled?—I think it is a satisfactory tribunal, certainly.

49,520. You were speaking about the necessity for skill and learning on the part of your third class clerks in drawing up orders?—I do not think I said skill and learning in reference to drawing up orders.

49,521. Do not understand me as disparaging your office, but you would say that drawing up one of your orders is one of the simplest things that could be done?—Certainly. I do not think I used the words "skill and intelligence in drawing up orders." You want to be careful how you do it.

49,522. You want to be careful at anything?—Yes.

49,523. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) The registrar has a considerable correspondence, and does a good deal of his work by letter?—No, I should not say so.

49,524. Does he keep a regular register of letters?—No. We file all letters connected with each case and put them with the case, and we have a letter-book, but nothing more special than that.

49,525. Do you use shorthand in the office?—We have a young man who can write shorthand and type.

49,526. Which one is that?—I do not think he is down on the permanent staff, but only engaged by the week, and we can discharge him by the week if we wish.

49,527. You have a young man engaged by the week?—Yes, he is always there.

49,528. How much do you pay him?—35s. or 2l. a week now.

49,529. Do you use typewriting in your office?—Yes, we use it as much as we can. There is also a man who is called a writer, I believe the last, or very nearly the last, of the old copyists, and whenever he retires his place will not be filled up.

49,530. With regard to your young man who comes in by the week, you would not dismiss him unless he misbehaved?—No.

49,531. He will remain there for the rest of his life?—He will be much more likely to leave us and get to a better place where the pay is higher, because 3l. or 2l. 10s. is frequently paid for a good shorthand typist in an office.

49,532. Does the fact that you have to employ such a permanent temporary clerk as that indicate to you that it would be wise to have an ordinary assistant clerk or one of the lower grades of the Civil Service working in your office?—If he could do the work as well I should have no objection to that.

11 March 1915.]

Mr. EDWARD STANLEY ROSCOE.

49,533. Is there any work which the third class clerks do now which could, as a matter of fact, be done by a cheaper type of official who is not on the rota to go up?—No, I do not know that there is.

49,534. I see there is one third class clerk of the name of C. S. Roscoe. Is he any relation of yours?—Yes, he is my son.

49,535. What was his experience when he came into your department?—He had been in an office in the City first, and then he was in the Guardian Insurance Office.

49,536. Was the existence of the vacancy made widely known at the time?—It is never published in any way. The people who want to have their sons' names put down for it apply to me, and I put them down in a book, and the President's secretary also keeps a book for the Probate and Divorce Division, which is practically the same as for the Admiralty. If there is not a suitable name down on my book I go and speak to him. In some cases, if he has got a name on his book, it would come before the names in my book, but at this moment I have no name on my book.

49,537. At the time your son's name was down in the book with some other names, you thought that your son, on the whole, was the best candidate?—I do not remember that there was any other candidate at the moment.

49,538. (Chairman.) There are some ship-keepers under the marshal?—Yes, the ship-keeper and the superintendent ship-keeper. The present marshal was appointed a month after the outbreak of the war, and both he and I think that whenever there is a vacancy the posts ought not to be filled up, because the work can be done quite well by the Collector of Customs, and it would save some money, and there is no advantage in having them that I can see.

49,539. The Admiralty work in the provinces is in some cases done at the district registries?—Always in the provinces, unless it is County Court work. In Liverpool there is probably more County Court Admiralty work and Passage Court Admiralty work than in the district registry of the High Court itself.

49,540. At Liverpool, for instance, is there the option of bringing a case before the district registry or in the County Court?—No, but in Liverpool they will in a case which perhaps is a little above the County Court limit agree to try it in the County Court as if it was under 300*l.* In that way a good many small Admiralty cases are tried there. Then they have the Passage Court, too, there, which has Admiralty jurisdiction higher, I think, than the County Court jurisdiction.

49,541. You are speaking of the district registry of the High Court?—Yes.

49,542. In the case of those that go before the district registry, if the case turns out to be an important one, is it transferred to London?—Not if both parties are willing it should go on there, but it is tried up here.

49,543. But the whole of the preliminary proceedings may take place in the district registry?—Yes.

49,544. Is the district registrar in the performance of those functions in any way under you?—No, quite separate.

49,545. You cannot give him instructions?—The only way we have to deal with him is with regard to the appointment of days; then he consults us. If there is an application for a day he telegraphs, telephones, or communicates with us as to particular days which are vacant, and we let him know what days there are. When once the action is down for trial we look after it.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIRST DAY.

Wednesday, 17th March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. ARTHUR BOUTWOOD.
Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.
Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER, called and examined.

49,546. (Chairman.) Mr. Stringer, you are a first class clerk in the Central Office of the High Court of Justice?—I am.

49,547. The department of the Central Office with which you are particularly concerned is the Writ, Appearance, Judgment, and Execution Department?—That is so.

49,548. You are the senior of the first class clerks in that department?—I am.

49,549. And you also have charge of the sub-department dealing with Letters of Request to and from foreign countries for mutual service of legal process and obtaining evidence?—Yes.

49,550. You are also Superintendent of Scrivenery for all the departments of the Royal Courts of Justice, including the Bankruptcy Department?—Yes. And Companies' Winding-up.

49,551. We have had evidence from the senior master as regards the work of the office generally; but we should like to have from you some observations as to the nature of the work?—The work of the department is divided into three rooms from A to K, and three rooms from L to Z.

49,552. You are speaking now of the Writ, Appearance, Judgment, and Execution Department?—And of the sub-department with regard to Letters of Request; that is a matter which is worked inside that department, as part of it. The three divisions on each side of the alphabet are divided into the Judgment and execution room, the writ room, where all commencement of actions takes place, and the appearance and search room in the centre, where the cause books are kept. It is arranged that the search room is in between the writ room and the judgment room, so that each of those rooms has access into the search room to get to the cause books, where everything is entered. That is the general system on which we work in the two divisions of the alphabet on the two sides of the corridor.

49,553. The work of the department consists, does it not, of receiving from the public documents of various kinds; writs, judgments, and so forth?—Yes, a very large number of documents.

17 March 1915.]

MR. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,554. Examining whether those documents are correct in form?—Yes.

49,555. And filing or making such record of them as is necessary for the system of the office?—That applies to the Writ Department particularly, and it applies to the Appearance Department also, and also when searches are allowed, and when certificates of non-appearance are given, and all matters leading up to judgment; and in the Judgment Department, of course, receiving the documents; the parties bring them prepared; but, of course, a judgment has very often to be redrawn; it has to be settled, and the terms of it have to be very carefully scanned to see that they are in proper operative form in accordance with the authority for the judgment which is brought with it—that is, the associate's certificate, or the evidence of non-appearance, or the pleadings; and it has to be seen there before judgment is entered that it is in accordance with the rules and decisions, and various matters affecting the entry of judgment, of which there are a very great number.

49,556. Then do you consider the work relating to judgments the most difficult part of the work of your department?—Yes, that and executions; there again, there are a whole number of decisions affecting writs of execution.

49,557. In the case of judgments the department is responsible for seeing that the substance of the document is in accordance with the authority?—Yes, and that it is in proper operative form, and that there is nothing in the judgment which in any way is not absolutely justified by the authority under which it is signed, whether it is a Rule of Court or an Act of Parliament, or whatever the authority may be; there are a great many authorities for it, and it has to be put into that form; and the importance of that lies in this fact, that any error in a judgment would vitiate the execution, in which case very serious results follow, because if anything is wrong with a judgment and it is acted upon, then the execution is wrong, and then there is an action for trespass, and all kinds of penalties apply, and it can never be rectified. When a judgment is once signed it cannot be altered.

49,558. (Mr. Coward.) But a mistake never does occur?—Well, I would not say that; sometimes the judgments are very difficult to enter, and sometimes there are questions in court as to whether we have done right or wrong on the terms of the judgment as drawn. We do have cases of that sort sometimes.

49,559. But it is a very rare thing?—They do not often upset us. They sometimes try to upset us—I do not say very often, but they do sometimes. I have had two cases within the last month in which they tried; they went before the judge about it. In such cases they have to apply to alter the judgment, so that if anything goes wrong it causes expense.

49,560. (Chairman.) The judgment is almost always drawn up by the solicitor, is it not?—Yes, the judgment is drafted by the solicitor. I am speaking now not of ordinary default judgments, but other judgments, of which there are a great many after trial, or on the official referee's report; all judgments of that sort require to be drafted in operative form, and must be right, otherwise consequences follow.

49,561. If you find something wrong, is it your business to redraft the judgment and put it right; or do you simply tell the solicitor that it is wrong, and he must bring something else?—We do it; we put it in the form we think is right. We do not issue a judgment until then. We might possibly find out afterwards that there is something wrong.

49,562. I am not talking about afterwards. When a solicitor brings a draft and you find there is something wrong in that draft, do you correct it in the department, or do you tell the solicitor that there is something wrong and he must correct it?—We should correct it. If, after a judgment had been complete and sealed, an error was discovered, and he had done nothing whatever under the judgment, we should consider that we had a right to correct it. Sometimes in a judgment you have to go into the pleadings, or into the statement of claim and the statement of defence, because the terms in which the direction for judgment is given throw you back upon the pleadings; in those cases it has always been my practice, ever since I have been at the head of the department, when they are sent in to me, to make an appointment with representatives of both sides to settle the form of the judgment.

49,563. That is the practice in cases of difficulty?—Yes, as a rule.

49,564. Does it often occur that the solicitor's draft of a judgment has to be modified?—Yes, very often; they are very often altered. We often alter them; in fact, in a great number of cases, we put them right according to our method which we have got by use and by keeping precedents and by forms in certain cases.

49,565. By which class of clerks is that work of scrutinising draft judgments done?—In the department as they sit there, there is a first class clerk, a second class clerk, and a third class clerk, and they all do judgments; the third class clerk would be under the supervision of the others, but some of them become extremely good at the judgment work, and we are always trying to get good men from the third class to come in and take their share of judgment work. A judgment like that would go to the senior clerk in the room, and if there were any case of doubt about it, he would consult me upon it; then if there was any further doubt and I thought it desirable, I would say to the solicitor's clerk who came with it that it was desirable that we should have an appointment with the other side, that there were one or two questions which I considered not quite clear enough to put into the judgment without the other side being present, and in those cases we would make an appointment and settle it.

49,566. (Mr. Coward.) Might we not ask for an illustration to be given to us of this. I personally do not follow it. Might I ask you whether you could give us an illustration of what you mean?—Yes. It arises in various ways; it depends upon the documents on which we are entering judgment. Supposing we are entering judgment on a verdict for the defendant, then, say, the judge directs that judgment be entered for the defendant on paragraph 5 of the plaintiff's statement of claim, and for the plaintiff on paragraph 6 of the plaintiff's statement of claim, we should go to his statement of claim to see the pleadings, because naturally the pleading is not put in the form of the judgment.

49,567. But that is all you would say, is it not: "Judgment be entered for plaintiff upon such and such issue"?—No, that would not be operative; it would be a useless judgment which could not be executed. When the judge directs that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff on a certain paragraph, say, of one of the pleadings, that paragraph sets out the full claim, not in amount merely, but it may be title, it may be something to do with possession of property, or whatever it is; but when we are entering that judgment we should have to put it into such form that, supposing it were for recovery of property, land for instance, the sheriff could act upon it under a writ of execution, which he could not do if we merely say: "Judgment in accordance with something in some other document." The sheriff would not act upon that.

49,568. (Chairman.) The judgment has to contain a statement of the substance of the points on which a decision is given one way or the other, and not simply a reference to those points in the statement of claim?—That is so, because whatever we put into the judgment must go into the writ of execution as the sheriff's authority. If it says that he is to do it in accordance with something in the statement of claim, the sheriff will say: "I have nothing to do with that." You must put in the judgment: "Therefore it is this day adjudged" (and then it goes as the judgment of the Court) "that the plaintiff recover possession of" this, that, or the other, or a declaration of rights, or specific performance of a contract, for instance—that would take the regular recognised form that you find

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

in Seaton or Daniel, or any of the books; but it has to be put in a form in which it can be executed. That is the point.

49,569. (Lord Mersey.) In fact, the judgment is a self-contained document?—Yes.

49,570. And it is not to be read by reference to other documents?—No.

49,571. (Chairman.) If a case of special difficulty arises, do you often refer it to higher authority, to the master or the judge?—In case a difficulty occurs with regard to a judgment after trial in court, it cannot be referred to a master or to any judge except the judge who tried the case. In case of special difficulty, if there is such obscurity that we feel that we cannot deal with it—supposing the solicitor has come to the conclusion that he cannot put it into proper form on the direction that has been given, then he would ask: "What do you think; what can we do?" In that case I say: "The proper course for you is to see the judge's clerk and ask if it may go before him, and get a "more specific direction from the judge with regard "to this particular point," and, perhaps, I would put the point down in writing where the difficulty arose. In such a case the judge always gives a direction.

49,572. In fact, the work in relation to judgments is similar to the work done by the registrars in the Chancery Division, only the work of that kind in the King's Bench Division is of a much simpler character than that in Chancery?—Some of the judgments are quite as complicated, but the bulk of the judgments are of a much simpler character. The very great bulk of the judgments in the King's Bench Division are in default of appearance and in default of defence, and under Order XIV.

49,573. (Mr. Coward.) Ninety-nine out of a hundred would they not be?—Not nearly as much as that, but there are a great number of simple cases. Cases tried in court are not nearly so simple, and they all have to be put into an operative form of words to give effect to the judge's direction for judgment.

49,574. (Lord Mersey.) Most of the judgments are for a sum of money?—Yes, a great many.

49,575. And those are quite simple?—Yes; they require care, of course.

49,576. They have a horrible simplicity about them?—I quite agree.

49,577. (Chairman.) The work of that department and of the Central Office generally is governed largely by the rules of court?—Yes.

49,578. And they are continually being altered, added to, and modified?—They are.

49,579. Do you find that in practice the rules of court are clear and ready of application?—No, sometimes they are not, undoubtedly.

49,580. Do you find that sometimes confusion arises in consequence?—Yes. The principles, of course, in the rules are clear, but sometimes there is evidence that they are made without sufficient knowledge of the machinery which will have to give effect to them. I think, if I might be allowed to make a suggestion with regard to it, that it would very much avoid any rules being issued which are not workable without amendment almost immediately after they are issued, which very often happens, if there were on the Rule Committee, say, a master from the King's Bench Division, a master from the Chancery Division, and one of the registrars of the Probate Division, and possibly it might be thought desirable to add a taxing master also; if they were added to the Rule Committee, I think the rules would be more practical and workable after they left the Rule Committee.

49,581. Speaking of judgments, you mentioned that in those cases the matter does not come within the view of the master at all, you never refer to a master?—Of course, if there were any question of doubt which a master could settle it would be referred to him, but those questions that arise on a judgment are generally only referable back to the judge who gave the direction.

49,582. My point is this: You suggested that the Rule Committee would be improved by the addition of a master?—Yes.

49,583. My question was whether in all the matters that arise out of the application of the rules, the masters have the detailed experience of the working of the system which would be necessary in order to enable them usefully to assist the Rule Committee?—They certainly would in the King's Bench Division, and, I think, in the Chancery Division, too. The masters know how to carry out the rules; the masters are carrying out the rules, and the masters who control the departments would know with regard to the practice.

49,584. You think the experience of the masters would enable them to give very valuable assistance in framing the rules?—Yes, I think it would be a very great improvement in the Rule Committee.

49,585. Does the Rule Committee at present consist entirely of judges?—No, there are solicitors on the Rule Committee, and the Bar is represented.

49,586. (Mr. Coward.) One solicitor, I think?—Is that so? That is Mr. Winterbotham.

49,587. Yes, and Mr. Morton of Liverpool?—Yes, but is not the President of the Law Society a member?

49,588. No, I do not think so?—Then there are two, and the Bar is represented also. But there is no one representing the official machinery which has to give effect to the rules, and to provide that I think it would be necessary to take, as I have suggested, a master from the King's Bench Division, a master from the Chancery Division, and a registrar from the Probate and Admiralty Division.

49,589. (Chairman.) Have you any further suggestion to make as regards the detailed working out of the rules?—Yes, I have. Even then I think, when the masters were added to the Rule Committee, it must always be possible at the moment when a rule comes to be put into operation to find that there are certain details connected with the machinery, and with giving effect to it, in which amendment is immediately required, and lately it has been very urgently so under the Courts Emergency Powers Act, the rules for which are very difficult. I think the masters and registrar who are added to the Rule Committee should form a sub-committee with power to make practice regulations, if required, to give effect to the rules after they have been issued.

49,590. (Lord Mersey.) But is this sub-committee to have power to alter the rules?—No.

49,591. What is it to do if it is not to alter the rules?—It is not to alter the rules, but the committee might make just the same rules that you find the practice masters have made pages and pages of.

49,592. I do not understand what you mean; are there such things now?—Yes, there are pages of them that are acted upon every day in every part of the building, at least in every part of the Central Office, and they have been very valuable. Under Order LXI., Rule 33, they have power to make forms.

49,593. That I can understand?—And they make regulations. They also naturally make regulations for the control of the Central Office, and that is really adjusting the rules. They never can change a rule, of course.

49,594. Nor can they make additions to the rules?—No, they cannot make any rules; that is quite right.

49,595. Do you suggest that there ought to be an alteration giving to the masters power either to make additional rules or to alter existing rules?—No, I suggest that they should have power to make regulations for giving effect to the rules.

49,596. (Chairman.) Those would be purely internal regulations for the guidance of the office?—Yes, and it would be very valuable in the Chancery Division, as well as in the King's Bench Division, if there was a committee like that to make regulations in order to give effect to the rules—never touching the principle of a rule, but to give effect to the rule.

49,597. (Lord Mersey.) Could you give me an illustration so that I may understand what you mean?—I think I can give one that has occurred only just recently. Under the Courts Emergency Powers Act an application has to be made before any execution can be issued on a judgment. There were certain difficulties

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

that immediately arose and gave trouble. One was where the defendant was in default of appearance—had not entered any appearance. If he did not appear the plaintiff would have the right to enter judgment against him in default. Then when it came to enforcing that judgment the defendant was not before the Court, and could not be heard under the Courts Emergency Powers Act. He could not employ a solicitor, because he did not wish to appear, he did not wish to dispute the judgment against him, but he wanted to get the relief under the Courts Emergency Powers Act. There was a deadlock. Had there been a rule sub-committee the new rule that has been made just recently to deal with that might have easily been made unnecessary and the existing rules workable by a regulation.

49,598. But do you not know that the relief contemplated has been given by the rule?—Yes, but after there had been great difficulty and a great deal of delay.

49,599. Do you want some body constituted who can make that rule without going to the Rule Committee?—No, any required alteration of the rule would be sent to the Rule Committee for its sanction. I think myself it would be a very great assistance always to the working of the rules if there were some sub-committee which had special authority, not to make rules, but to make regulations for giving effect to the rules.

49,600. (Chairman.) Is there any authority at present which can do that?—Not to the extent that is needed.

49,601. Cannot the senior master give directions for the conduct of business?—In a case like the one I have just been citing there is nothing in the rule that authorises it. It does not say what is to happen when a person is in default.

49,602. (Lord Mersey.) Do not you think that is the fault of the rule itself?—I agree.

49,603. And that it should go back to the Rule Committee and they should be told to do the business properly?—I think it takes a good deal of time to get a thing through the Rule Committee.

49,604. I was going to ask you how often is the Rule Committee summoned?—I should like information with regard to that to be taken from some one else. I do not know. I have not looked into the matter.

49,605. Who summons the Rule Committee?—Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, the Lord Chancellor's permanent secretary; he is secretary to the Rule Committee.

49,606. (Chairman.) He sets it in motion?—Yes.

49,607. (Lord Mersey.) I thought the Lord Chief Justice summoned the committee?—If the Lord Chief Justice expressed a wish to have a meeting of the committee, it would go to Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, and he would call the committee together, I imagine; but it is outside my sphere altogether.

49,608. My recollection is that there was always great difficulty in getting the Rule Committee together, and the consequence was that rules waited, that rules that ought to be made did not come to the birth.

(Chairman.) If you found in daily practice in your department that there was some point in the rules that was difficult or impossible of application, what steps would you take; to whose notice would you bring it?—To the notice of the master. But those difficulties are often of such a kind that they would have no power to deal with them as practice masters. If there was something that a rule was obviously intended to cover, but it did not cover, if a sub-committee could make a regulation, and it came back with the formal sanction of the Lord Chancellor given to it, it could be put into operation. The Lord Chancellor is President of the Rule Committee. If there was nothing put in that touched the principle in any way, but merely gave effect to the intention of the rule, I feel sure that it would be an enormous assistance to procedure.

49,609. You spoke of the practice masters—what are they?—One master sits every day to take ex parte applications, and any matter in which a difficulty arises in the department has to be referred to the practice master to decide, and he decides it.

49,610. Is that work taken by the masters in rotation?—Yes.

49,611. You have given us in your précis a statement of the duties of the different departments; we have already dealt with the work of the Writ, Appearance, Judgment, and Execution Department, and we have already had in evidence from the senior master something about the duties of the other departments, but I should like to ask you something further about the Associates Department. What exactly is the work of that Department?—They enter the trial.

49,612. What does that mean?—It means when notice of trial has been served that the entry of trial, as it is called, is made out in the Associates Office; they enter it upon the list. They receive papers for the Court, and the action is entered for trial.

49,613. And on the entry on that list depends the order in which cases come forward for trial?—Yes. Then they attend the courts, they sit as associates to the courts in the King's Bench Division, and they take down and make out the associates' certificates of the result of trial, and those associates' certificates are brought to the Judgment Department for judgment to be entered upon them.

49,614. Does their work, apart from entry for trial, consist entirely in court work?—Yes, mainly.

49,615. How many clerks are there in that department?—I think there are 12.

49,616. How are they distributed among the different classes?—There are one first class, five second, and six third class clerks.

49,617. So that a substantial part of the work, sitting in court and taking down and drawing up the associates' certificates, is done by third class clerks?—Yes, it must be.

49,618. When a man enters the department, how does he learn that work?—I am afraid I cannot answer that question. I do not know how he learns it.

49,619. In many cases he has not had any previous legal experience?—No, I suppose the head of the department probably will arrange for him to sit with one of the others, but that I do not know. I think that very often they want rather more experience than they have had before they take a court alone, I mean judging from the associates' certificates, they are not always very good, and they are very difficult. The juniors in the department sit in court with the seniors to start with.

49,620. While they are learning their work they sit with the seniors?—Yes.

49,621. Will you tell us—we have not yet got it upon the notes—the number of the different classes in each of the departments of the Central Office?—The numbers are as follows:—

Department.	First Class Clerks.	Second Class Clerks.	Third Class Clerks.	Total.
Writ, &c.	2	10	6	18
Filing	1	3	8	12
Associates	1	5	6	12
Summons and Orders	1	4	4	9
Crown Office	3	2	2	7
Bills of Sale	1	2	3	6
King's Remembrancer	1	1	1	3
Masters' Secretary	1	1	0	2

I may say that in the Crown Office Department the arrangement of the first class clerks is not quite right at present, it has got off the proper arrangement; it has three first class clerks and only four other clerks.

49,622. What would be the proper arrangement?—They ought to have only one first class clerk, and one of the present first class clerks ought to be in the Writ Department.

17 March 1915.]

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,623. How has that arisen?—It has arisen on promotion, owing to the difficulty of promoting by seniority someone who could do the work, for seniority is necessarily a governing feature in putting them up. It was very difficult to alter it, and that promotion was made as a temporary arrangement.

49,624. There appears to be a very considerable difference in the proportion of the three classes in the different departments; does that arise out of personal difficulties connected with promotion, or does it arise out of some difference in the work of the different departments?—I do not think it arises anywhere but in the Crown Office, and that is a temporary arrangement. In the Writ Department there should be one first class clerk in each of the two judgment departments.

49,625. In each of the two halves of the alphabet?—Yes, in each of the two halves of the alphabet, specially reserved for the Judgment and Execution Department, there should be a first class clerk in each of those two rooms; there has always been so till recently.

49,626. Otherwise you consider that the distribution of the different classes is satisfactory and corresponds to the work?—Yes.

49,627. Do you consider that there is much difference in the difficulty of the work in the different departments; for instance, in the Crown Office, is the work of a more difficult character than that in the Filing Department?—Yes, it is more difficult than in the Filing Department. I am not very much versed in the Crown Office work, but I know that some of it is very important work.

49,628. If that were so it would justify some difference in the proportion?—Yes, it would, but that is not how it has arisen, nor is the present arrangement permanent.

49,629. You have a system, I think, of moving clerks about from one department to another?—Yes.

49,630. Will you tell us how that works?—It does not work at present. One has felt that rather a difficulty, and it is very difficult to manage, because sometimes the departments are very busy, and to have a new man in to teach makes a great deal of difference in the working of the department. It is a thing which the masters always have in view; but I think it ought to be more regularly carried out throughout, so as to let the third class men—it especially applies to them—when they come in, learn the work of the different departments, and not let them be tied to only one department; because, if they are so tied when there is a chance of promotion, it makes them less useful, and they do not get the full chance of learning the whole of the work of the office.

49,631. It would also cause difficulty, as regards promotion, if you had to consider the particular work for which a man was capable, as well as his general fitness for promotion?—Yes. I think it would assist promotion very much if that system of moving men from one department to another was more thoroughly carried out.

49,632. Would you say also that it is much better for the man himself to have to turn his mind to different kinds of work, and not simply to go on with one particular kind of work year after year?—Much better.

49,633. If he goes on with one particular kind of work year after year, especially if it is work of a somewhat routine and mechanical character, it has a tendency to make a man narrow, I should suppose?—Yes, he gets restricted to a particular kind of work. Some departments, of course, are in themselves rather narrow; the filing department, for instance, it is all filing.

49,634. And a man who had been doing that work for a great number of years would become incapable of doing better work?—Unless he kept his intellect bright by something outside the office he might be a very good man and yet not have a chance. But he ought to have his chance.

49,635. It would be much better for his prospects of future usefulness if he were moved about and made to learn different kinds of work?—Certainly.

49,636. Would you apply that also to the second class clerks?—Yes, I would certainly apply it to them as well; they have to qualify for first class clerkships, and a vacancy in the first class may occur in any department, and they ought to have the opportunity of learning the work of all departments.

49,637. And would you say that the work of all the departments is not of greater scope than one man can have sufficient knowledge of if he is moved about?—If he sets himself to work there is nothing in the work that a man could not acquire, of course; there is no work in any department of the Central Office which a man of good intelligence and industry in the way of reading and picking up knowledge could not learn to do.

49,638. Turning now to the question of appointment, do you consider that the present system works well?—No, I do not think it does work well. I do not think it works quite satisfactorily.

49,639. What defects do you find in it?—We get sometimes very good men, but at other times we get men who do not do well, who have not sufficient capability really to learn the work.

49,640. At present do you get men with legal experience or without legal experience?—Without legal experience.

49,641. Generally without legal experience?—Yes, nearly always, but I do not think legal experience is quite what we want.

49,642. At what age may men be appointed to the third class?—The age, I think, is one of the great defects of the present arrangement under which you appoint a man between the ages of 20 and 30 to a class with a salary of 100*l.*, rising to 200*l.*, so that if he is appointed at 30 and is 12 years in the class, he is 42 before he can reach his maximum of 200*l.*

49,643. Have you often men appointed near the upper age limit?—We have had them up to 26 and 28, and we have had one appointed at 29. I think that is not such a good age for learning or anything; I would have them earlier. I would have them from 18. I think that in the two years between 18 and 20 a man does not improve, but he deteriorates, in fact, when he is on the look out for work.

49,644. Do you suggest 18 as the lower limit?—From 18 to 25, I think, are the best ages, and not to have anyone over 25.

49,645. You do not think that previous experience in a solicitor's office, or other previous legal experience is necessary or desirable?—I do not. Experience in a solicitor's office is gained in a whole lot of matters of law. Experience gained in my office is entirely in procedure, and a clerk can learn it better if he comes in young, and he can learn it better inside the office, in my opinion, than he possibly could in a solicitor's office.

49,646. You would like to get young men of good general intelligence and education?—And address.

49,647. And teach them their work inside the office?—Yes, and we want the class of man that you would naturally select for attending to the public, because it must be borne in mind that all our work is attending to the public, dealing with the public across the table.

49,648. (Mr. Coward.) The public being solicitors' clerks?—Yes, the public being solicitors' clerks that we are always dealing with, and we want men of a type who will be able to help them and give them information with regard to any questions of practice, or anything there may be. The procedure in the English Courts is a very complicated procedure, and that complication shows itself in all kinds of details of practice in the departments undoubtedly, and we want men who can help the solicitors, and, more than that, not keep them too long; time is always of great value to the public, so that we must have no delays, and they may know that they will not be kept waiting more than can possibly be avoided, and that they will be given all the information and assistance that we can give them.

49,649. (Chairman.) The suggestion has been made to us that solicitors' clerks are, as a class, so astute (I do not use the word in a bad sense) and so capable, that a man would have no chance of coping with them unless he had been a solicitor's clerk himself. Do you agree with that suggestion?—I think it is possible for a man within the department to develop such capability that he should be able to take them on. As a matter of fact, the general attitude is that solicitors' clerks come to us for information and assistance about things.

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,650. The type you have in view is what may be described as the public school type?—Yes, that is what we want, young fellows who have done well at a public school who come in to learn.

49,651. In comparing your requirements with those of the Civil Service in general, what class in the Civil Service would you say represents the kind of man you would like to get for your office?—I do not know the Civil Service in general enough to enable me to make a comparison.

49,652. Do you think that open competition would be a satisfactory method of recruitment for your office?—I do not think that open competition would be so good as selection by a committee. I should like to see a committee appointed to receive recommendations, and to select candidates for appointment, and to nominate them.

49,653. On what do you base that opinion?—I think that if there were a small committee of two or three acting together for the purpose, with a definite knowledge of the class that is wanted, they would arrive at a better judgment on the man to be selected than if he is merely nominated by one person. I think that is bad.

49,654. I was not at the moment putting the question as between a selection committee and appointment by one person; I was putting the question as between selection either by a committee or by one person and open competition. Would you agree that competition is more effectual than selection of that kind for testing educational and intellectual qualifications?—Well, I do not know; I cannot say. I do not think that the type of man who is good at passing examinations is necessarily on that account the type that we want. We want the right class of man, and we can make them what we want if we adopt proper methods for encouraging efficiency. I am going to suggest the method that I think should be employed in that case for increasing efficiency, and for giving inducements for every man to increase his own efficiency.

49,655. What I want to get at is, what qualities you think are not sufficiently tested by a competitive examination. Is it the more personal qualities of address and the power of dealing with men?—Yes, I think it is a very important thing that men of address and men of the proper type should come into an office like ours. In the hurry and rush of business all manner of points are possible to occur which might cause a certain amount of friction, and you want a type of man who will hold the department quite clear from anything but a desire to assist.

49,656. Then what do you suggest as the best method of selection?—I suggest a committee, say, of three, or some small committee who should be appointed to select candidates whose names should be received by them, and they should see the candidates and make their selection, and then the candidates should pass an examination.

49,657. What kind of committee do you suggest?—It is difficult to say. It is the joint action more than the personality that I am thinking of in my mind. An individual person gets pressure put upon him (I am sure it applies everywhere, high and low) for philanthropic reasons to get a post for somebody, and that would not apply to a committee of three people.

49,658. (Lord Mersey.) What would you say to a committee composed of a judge, a nominee of the Incorporated Law Society, and one of the high officials of the Court?—I think that would make a most excellent committee.

49,659. I suggest a man like yourself, for instance?—Well, that might be, but that of course is only purely personal. I would suggest a master, a solicitor appointed by the Incorporated Law Society, and one of the judges.

49,660. (Chairman.) Do you suggest that a committee of that kind should appoint or should submit the names to the Lord Chancellor?—I think that when they have nominated, the clerk should be sent to the department to which he was to be appointed, as is done at present, and he should go to the head of the department, as in our office they go to the senior master. If the senior master saw any reason for in any way calling the nomination in question, I mean for referring it back to the committee, he should write to the principal member of the committee if he had any objection.

49,661. Would it not be more convenient that the senior master should be a member of the committee rather than that he should subsequently scrutinise the committee's recommendation?—I think if the committee were so constituted as has been proposed, there would be no necessity for anything more; it would be quite satisfactory, and whoever was appointed I should have great confidence in the appointment.

49,662. At present the appointment is made in rotation by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls?—Yes.

49,663. Do you find that as a result of that system of rotation you get an absence of continuity in the principles applied to the selection?—That is rather a delicate matter for me to express an opinion upon—it becomes almost a personal matter—but we may get one appointed of a fairly good class, we may get quite the class we want, but we may get another not of the class we want.

49,664. At present the candidates have to pass a Civil Service examination of a simple character, and to obtain a Civil Service certificate after giving the usual evidence as regards health, character, and so forth?—Yes, that is so.

49,665. Do you suggest any modification in the examination?—One of the subjects in the present qualifying Civil Service examination is what is called Digesting Returns, and we have had quite a curious experience with regard to it; it throws out about every other man; then he goes and gets a coach to get it up, and studies it, and then he is allowed to sit again. We have had men rejected on it twice, and they have been allowed to go in a third time and get through. Some of those men who are thrown out are really most excellent men, and our experience has been that they have been floored over it, while it is a subject of no possible use to them in our department; they would never be required to do anything approaching to it during the whole of their service in our department. What I would suggest is that, instead of that Digesting of Returns, we should have quite an elementary subject called Legal Procedure, which would just teach them the most elementary things about Writs, Appearances and Affidavits, what is a valid oath, what is a good service, for instance, as to which there are hundreds and hundreds of cases, deciding what is good service, but still very much simplified for the purposes of examination; I think if we were to give them that, every one of the men who came to us would be able to pass it.

49,666. You suggest that that should be included in lieu of the digesting of returns?—Yes.

49,667. Do you suggest that that should be a qualifying examination, or a probationary examination after the man has been in the office a certain time?—I suggest that it should be a preliminary examination before they come in. I have something to say with regard to examination after they have been in the office, but they could easily learn that subject before coming in, because you have only to announce the subject and give the scope of it, and the people who teach these men, who have classes for passing these people through examinations, would immediately get the whole details of it and be able to educate them quite easily, and show them the elements, so as to let them know what they were dealing with when they first came into the office.

49,668. Would that shorten the time for learning the work after they had gone into the office?—Yes. They would not have to be taught the most elementary things.

49,669. Would knowledge of that kind, learnt, not by actual contact with the work, but out of text-books, be of much value?—Yes, because they will have learnt the forms. Nearly all our forms are prescribed forms by rules under Act of Parliament. They would get accustomed to seeing them filled up, and would soon learn to know what they want to know with regard to them. They would learn to know what an affidavit is. They would be told, for example, what a guardian ad litem is, which they would have to know at once when they entered an appearance, and various other things which would just give them the general knowledge which would be useful to them in the work of the department, and make them useful directly they came on to the staff.

MR. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,670. Do you suggest that the standard of the general educational part of the examination should also be raised?—No; I think that the present examination is quite sufficient to pass in for our purposes, if they had this subject of legal procedure which I have suggested on page 4 of my précis in my suggested scheme of examination.

49,671. The present examination consists purely of handwriting, spelling, arithmetic, and English composition?—Yes, and then I would have what I call legal procedure instead of digesting of returns.

49,672. That as an educational examination is of the most elementary character?—Quite; but if you have a boy who comes in from the ordinary public school I think if you make the examination too stiff you may shut out some very good men who would develop into excellent clerks as long as they have had a fairly good education and can pass that test. If you had that and some system of a committee constituted as suggested I should put much more faith in it.

49,673. You would not rely on this examination in any way as a sieve; you do not think it would be needed to sift out the less highly-qualified candidates from the educational and intellectual point of view?—No, I would rely upon the committee to do that.

49,674. You would rely upon the examination merely to keep out men who had not had the ordinary elementary examination?—Yes.

49,675. What do you suggest as regards an examination to be passed subsequently after entering the Service?—There, I think, something is required for two reasons. I think in the first place that we labour under a great difficulty at present when we come to promote by merit. The Committee of Control Masters, that is the three masters who compose the committee for controlling the Central Office, have to look after all matters with regard to promotion and discipline. I think it is a very difficult matter indeed for them with a scattered department like ours working at long distances from the different departments over a great big building, many of them separate in their work, and the men being so scattered that they are very rarely brought into contact with the masters. A few of them naturally are brought into contact, and the masters may form an opinion as to the varying degrees of capability of the men who are brought into immediate contact with them; but of course the difficulty which I think exists is that the masters feel because they are always just, I mean that they are working with the idea of justice in their minds to all the staff, that if they appoint one of those whom they happen to know while a great number are doing good work elsewhere whom they do not know, they cannot select very well without fear of doing injustice. I think there should be something that would enable them to get a class of men, and a growing class of men, in every department who have qualified for promotion. Accordingly I would propose a scheme by which all men who enter in the third class should have six years in that class, and then I would have certain subjects under a certain syllabus given to them in which within the six years they may attend the Civil Service Commission and pass the examination in certain sections of procedure.

49,676. They would not be qualified for promotion unless they passed that examination?—They would not be qualified for promotion unless they passed that examination, but if they passed it at any time within six years, and within the limit of time, they should rank according to the original date of appointment and not according to the time at which they passed it, there should not be any requirement of qualifying for promotion by passing any other examination. If one man passed before the end of the six years and another passed within the six years but later, they should rank relatively according to seniority of their original appointment.

49,677. We have the syllabus you suggest before us, and perhaps it is unnecessary to go into the details of it?—Yes. Then in the second class I should propose the same thing for qualifying for the first class.

49,678. You suggest a further examination of a more advanced character to be passed by clerks in the second class before they are eligible for promotion to the first class?—Yes, and that they should pass in the same way. I have given roughly a sketch of the class of subjects that I think it would be useful for them to pass in in the different departments, so that they should really know the procedure before they come to be promoted to the first class; have a real knowledge of it I mean.

49,679. We have been told by the chief Civil Service Commissioner that he does not consider that examination is a method of test that can be conveniently applied to men after a certain age—that men cease to be examinable after a certain age. Do you think that that difficulty would arise with regard to the examination that you suggest for clerks of the second class?—I should not have thought so, because all the time they will be having more or less opportunities of learning. I should not make that examination a competitive examination at all.

49,680. No, I understand that. You suggest that if the examination relates to subjects which they are dealing with every day, that objection applies at any rate with less force?—Yes. Not only are the subjects useful for the work they are dealing with, some in one department and some in another, but they are all subjects that all clerks ought to know for their work generally.

49,681. The Commission have received a statement from a number of clerks in the Central Office making a request for certain modifications in the scales of pay. Have you seen that statement?—Yes, I have.

49,682. We should like to know your opinion as to the request made there. You will remember that the suggestion was that the scale of the third class should be from 120*l.* to 250*l.*; for the second class from 300*l.* to 450*l.*; for the first class from 500*l.* to 600*l.*; and that there should be four principal clerks on a scale of salary rising from 640*l.* to 700*l.*?—Yes, I agree that that is a reasonable proposition, and that it would be an advantage to have it.

49,683. On what do you base your opinion?—I think 100*l.* to 200*l.* is very poor pay, considering that if one looks back before 1880 a clerk would enter the service at 16 years of age and commence at 120*l.* (but that is rather an exceptional case) until at the age of 25 he would be receiving, assuming that he entered at 17, 200*l.* a year. Under the present scale, and entering at the age of 20, he would receive 150*l.* In some of the old offices from which we were taken, the scales were very much more advantageous than they are now, and that was in 1880.

49,684. (Lord Mersey.) And the work is not less, I suppose?—No, the work is more; we are very much fewer in number.

49,685. (Chairman.) When were the present scales fixed?—In 1880.

49,686. It was in 1880 that the scales of the three classes as they at present exist were laid down?—Yes; I think that a scale of 120*l.*, rising by annual increments to 250*l.*, is a very good scale.

49,687. The scales of pay in the Central Office are similar to the scales in most of the other offices of the Courts?—That is so.

49,689. Have you made any comparison of those scales of pay with the pay that is usual in solicitors' offices?—No; I do not know what the pay in solicitors' offices is; I think it varies very much.

49,690. You have no knowledge of the pay in a solicitor's office?—No, I have none.

49,691. Would it not be reasonable, in deciding whether the scales of pay are suitable, to ascertain what the rate of pay outside the Government service is for similar work?—I think it is a very different thing. What we want to get is a particular type of man, and he is going into a department where he has certain rights and privileges in the way of promotion and pension, and all those things which prevail in the Service. I do not know whether there is such a thing as a market price for labour of that kind outside.

49,692. Are you acquainted generally with the nature of the work of a managing clerk in a big firm of solicitors?—I see a great number of them and have dealings with them.

49,693. How would you compare their work with the work of, say, a first class clerk in your office?—I was not thinking of managing clerks. Managing clerks in some large firms are thoroughly capable men.

49,694. And their work would be at least as difficult as the work of first class clerks in your office, would it not?—I think it would.

49,695. With a wider scope, and in some ways more responsible, possibly?—I do not know about more responsible, I should not have thought that; but certainly wider in its scope and some of it very difficult work, and work requiring considerable legal knowledge.

49,696. How would the two compare as regards hours and holidays; their hours would be very much longer?—No doubt; probably a good deal too long as we should think.

49,697. Possibly; and their holidays very much less?—That I do not know. It might be so in some offices, and it might not in others.

49,698. And they have no assured system of pension?—That, again, is what I should consider very wrong.

49,699. (Mr. Coward.) What?—Wrong to think of as an official thing for an official department. I am not saying that it is wrong for anyone outside.

49,700. (Chairman.) I was not asking you whether it was right or wrong; I was asking, is it a fact that they have no assured system of pension?—I take it that it is so; I do not know.

49,701. They may receive a pension in some cases as a matter of grace, but there is no regular pension system?—Naturally, because they are not under any Government; they are not under any Pension Act of Parliament. When you have a department you are looking at the matter from a different point of view; you come under the Pension Acts, and various other Acts.

49,702. So that you would agree that the work is at least as difficult and important, and the conditions, as regards hours, holidays, and pensions, decidedly worse than in your office?—I should have thought so, but I am not speaking from actual information, and it is rather difficult for me to answer.

49,703. And, as regards pay, you have no knowledge of what the pay of a managing clerk in an important firm of solicitors would be?—No, I have not.

49,704. Would you be surprised to hear that it is seldom more than 300*l.* a year, and hardly ever more than 400*l.*?—No, I should not be surprised to hear it.

49,705. If those figures are correct, would it modify, in any way, your opinion as to the scales that are suitable for the Central Office?—I do not think so; I think you are dealing with a totally different kind of thing. If you are making a department, and you are considering whether you have an official department, of course, if you could take other branches of the Civil Service and compare them, there would be more comparison there; but in the case of solicitors, all those matters depend on the individual contract between the two individuals, and the whole arrangement exists only between the two individuals in each separate case; each has its system of employment for employing a large body of people.

49,706. Do not the conditions of employment in the outside profession, in solicitors' offices, show what may be regarded as the current market value for work of that character?—Yes, I suppose you could say that. That means that a solicitor's clerk can only be obtained on those terms; that those are the usual terms prevailing in the profession, just as in the case of wages of domestic servants.

49,707. But good men are commanded by solicitors as managing clerks on those terms?—Yes, that may be so.

49,708. Have you any reason to think that there is any lack of candidates for the Central Office, or the other offices of the courts under the present system?—No, I should certainly think not; there are sure to be candidates. I do not know whether these figures in the clerks' petition might be of use, but in the Post Office the second class clerks rise to 500*l.*

49,709. Are you speaking now of clerks who enter by the higher division examination?—I am speaking of clerks in the Secretary's department; it probably would be so.

49,710. That is to say, clerks who enter what the Commission has proposed to call in future the administrative class, from which the highest offices in the Civil Service will be filled?—Yes. Then in the Ecclesiastical Commission they are all entered on a higher scale, but they go on on a higher grade and a higher examination.

49,711. The classes of which you are speaking now consist of men who enter by the highest examination for the Civil Service?—Yes; but the principal clerks in the Ecclesiastical Commission get 700*l.*

49,712. That is to say, men who may be said to be generally of a university honours standard?—That is so.

49,713. Do you suggest that candidates entering with an examination which represents probably the standard attained by an elementary school-boy at the age of 13 are qualified for a similar scale of pay to that of men who enter with a university honours standard?—No, I do not say that. I am merely instancing the classes that are better paid. But there is another class; in the Principal Probate Registry the principal clerks get 800*l.* a year, and we have no such salary.

49,714. You would agree that the offices which you cited just now are not fairly comparable with the Central Office?—Then there is the Inland Revenue Estate Duty Office, which certainly would be; the salary there is 700*l.*

49,715. How is that office recruited?—That I do not know; it is probably by the higher division examination, I am told.

49,716. You mentioned the Probate Registry; the scale there for the different classes is, I think, apart from the principal clerks, the same as the scale for the Central Office, though they have a higher scale up to 800*l.* for principal clerks. You suggest that there is an additional grade there—namely, principal clerks—who have a higher scale?—That is so. But there is one point I think I might mention with regard to the scale of our third class clerks, from 100*l.* to 200*l.*, namely, that the second division, formerly the lower division, which is equal to our third class clerks, has a maximum scale of 350*l.* It is the 200*l.* which, I think, it is so hard to keep a man to.

49,717. But the maximum salary of 350*l.* for second class clerks applies, does it not, to the whole of the service of those clerks; in the regular line of promotion there is no opportunity of rising to a higher salary than that?—No.

49,718. Therefore, it is hardly fair to compare it with the salary of third class clerks who have definite opportunities of rising to a higher salary. Would it not be fairer to compare it with the salary of the three classes, including the first class? Turning now to the question of organisation, do you consider that there could be any further devolution of work than at present takes place?—If you mean devolution of work from the masters, I think there are one or two cases of devolution of work that I should very much like to suggest with deference. I think there is considerable waste of power in not utilising our masters, who have the same qualification, practically, as a county court judge, in trying out actions in the High Court. They should have power to try actions in court, such as actions under Order XIV., which are remitted constantly, with great delay and loss, to the County Court.

49,719. That is rather a point of judicial procedure which is outside the scope of our reference,

17 March 1915.]

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

and, therefore, we need not go into it in more detail; we note your opinion. But, taking the work which is at present done by the masters, where further devolution would be a matter of internal arrangement rather than of judicial procedure, do you consider that any further devolution could take place there?—To my mind, of course, the whole thing rather hangs together. If the masters' work were to be somewhat extended in the way I have suggested, then I think it would be possible to relieve the masters of various matters, such as garnishee orders nisi, ex parte applications, charging orders nisi, orders for substituted service, orders for leave to enter conditional appearance and for leave to amend writs of summons, and originating summonses before service, applications for leave to issue execution after the lapse of six years—practical questions of that kind. I think those might, if it was thought necessary, be devolved upon qualified principal clerks.

49,720. Would that amount to a considerable volume of work?—It would relieve the masters of a good deal of work.

49,721. And that you consider is work of a character that might be done by officers of lower grade than masters?—Yes, I think it might be. If any question of doubt arose on a particular case they would be able to refer to the master.

49,722. Would an alteration of the rules be required for those changes, or would it be merely a matter of internal arrangement?—There would have to be, I should think, a general rule giving the masters power to delegate that work to the clerks, namely, the particular types of work.

49,723. (Lord Mersey.) Who does that work at present?—The master.

49,724. Does he do it under some statutory authority?—He does it because the master is the "Court or a Judge" in the Rules of Court. Where the term "Court or a Judge" is used, the master has jurisdiction to do any of the work to be done by the Court or a judge, with the exception of the few things mentioned in Order LIV., Rule 12.

49,725. (Chairman.) So that what would be required would be authority by rule for first class clerks to do in certain cases work which is required by rule to be done by "Court or a Judge"?—Yes, in certain cases that would be so. There would be, I mean, no difficulty in adjusting it by rule, so far as that was concerned; but, of course, if you took that work alone from the masters, unless the masters had further jurisdiction given to them to try certain actions in Court, instead of remitting them to the County Court, then I do not know whether the necessity for that devolution would arise.

49,726. Unless it resulted in a reduction of the number of masters?—There would not be enough to do that; there would not be nearly the work of one master.

49,727. The discipline of the Central Office and the details of administration are under the review of a committee of masters?—The Committee of Control, the control masters, as we call them. There are three masters nominated by the Lord Chancellor who form the Committee of Control for all matters of discipline and promotion.

49,728. How are matters brought before that committee; are they brought before it by the heads of different departments?—By the chief clerks in the different departments.

49,729. The suggestion has been made to the Commission that it would be advantageous in an office like the Central Office to have one officer who, where he exists, is generally called chief clerk, who should be responsible for the duties of discipline, distribution of work, and so on throughout the office. Do you consider that it would be advantageous to have an officer of that kind in the Central Office?—I think it would. I think it would be an assistance to the Committee of Control in the matter of promotion if there were some responsible person who could share the responsibility with regard to the selection of men for promotion by merit and matters of that sort, who was more in touch with the men than the masters can possibly be.

49,730. (Mr. Coward.) They are not at all in touch with the men, are they?—No, not in a general way.

49,731. (Chairman.) At present their information about the men comes through eight or nine different channels, the heads of each department?—Yes, I think that if one of the head clerks, who would naturally represent the whole staff of clerks in the department, could be taken into council, it would assist the masters.

49,732. How are the details of discipline and leave arranged now. Does each department of the Central Office arrange its own leave?—That is all according to the regulations. Each of the heads of the different departments has power to arrange the leave for the different clerks, and they arrange so as to have them go away when it is convenient for the work, of course, to a large extent.

49,733. And as regards the details of discipline, irregular attendance, and so forth, is that in the hands of the head of each department?—That is in the hands of the head of each department, undoubtedly.

49,734. If a point is one that he cannot deal with himself, does he refer it to the Committee of Control?—He would report it to the senior master, and the senior master would bring it to the Committee of Control if there was any necessity; but we have an attendance-book.

49,735. Is the head of each department responsible for examining the attendance-book and taking any action that is required?—He initials it every day.

49,736. Would it not be a convenience if for all matters of that kind there was one officer responsible to the Committee of Control, and charged with the supervision of discipline, leave, distribution of work, and so forth?—There would be some advantages in it, no doubt, but I think that the existing system works very well for discipline.

49,737. Under the present system, do you get uniformity as regards the administration of discipline in the different departments of the Central Office?—I think so now; it is all administered very well by the heads of the different departments, I think.

49,738. Is it not your experience that the administration of discipline depends a good deal upon the personality of the individual who has to administer it?—Yes, I think it does to some extent.

49,739. And if you have in one office discipline administered by nine different heads of departments, you are likely to get differences between those departments?—I suppose that must occur.

49,740. The question has also been raised with regard to other departments of the Supreme Court offices, whether the present system of admission to the third class and promotion to the two higher classes is the right system, or whether it would not be preferable to have a lower grade entirely separate from the upper grade. The men in that grade would correspond, roughly, to the present third class clerks. They would do the more mechanical work and would not expect to rise to anything above the mechanical work. The second and first classes would be recruited from outside, with men capable of doing more responsible work. Do you prefer the present system, or do you think that a system of that kind would be an improvement upon it?—That would mean, as I understand it, that the third class clerks would be quite a separate class from the rest of the office; they would not rise naturally.

49,741. Yes?—They would stay in the third class, as a rule?

49,742. Yes. The suggestion was that you might allow promotion of men of exceptional capacity, but the regular system should be that they should remain in the third class and not rise above it?—Then up to what age would they come into that new third class?

49,743. The suggestion was that they should be recruited for the third class at an early age—18, or something of that sort?—The same as at present?

49,744. Well, younger than at present. At present the lower limit of age is 20?—Yes, 18 is the same as I have suggested.

49,745. But that you should recruit for that class men not of a high standard of education, but capable of doing all the work of filing, keeping books and lists and documents, and so forth; who would not expect to rise to better work, or to higher pay than the maximum of the scale which is 200*l*. The men appointed direct to the second class would be men who had had some experience in a solicitor's office, and you would endeavour to get men capable of doing the better kind of work that is done by first and second class clerks?—I do not think that would work so well. I think there is a great strength and a great advantage in the oneness of a department, every man who is in it belonging to the department as a whole, and all of them colleagues, placed on a footing of equality. What you have put to me would really mean that the third class clerk would be a lower grade of clerk.

17 March 1915.]

MR. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,746. Quite so?—Then I do not think it would work so well, because from the very first our idea is to train the third class clerks when they come in to begin to learn all kinds of work; as soon as they have been there a little while and have learned the less important work, to get them on to doing all the work generally. It is a very great advantage in many ways, because if you get illness and suddenly someone is away ill, they have been trained to do the more important part of the business, and if they are careful and show signs of ability, it is a great advantage to let them learn as soon as they come how the business in all the departments is dealt with as a whole.

49,747. You find that you are able to give third class clerks work which is not of a purely mechanical nature, but to give them some work of a better kind?—At once.

49,748. To train them for higher work?—I do not see why you should limit a particular portion of the men. They would be only a lower division of clerks, and they might be equally good with the men who are not in the lower division, but the fact of the matter is that they would be a different grade, and it might be said that you cannot give that class of work to that grade of clerks, whereas now we can get all the usefulness out of our men just as soon as we get them; we are educating them so that they can do the different classes of work, the important parts as well as the other, by degrees, and get accustomed to it. They are homogeneous, a whole department, and I think there is great strength in that and much greater advantage than if they were a mixed department made up half of a lower grade, because that is what it would be.

49,749. One argument that has been put forward in favour of a system of that kind was that the work of a third class clerk was of so mechanical a nature, that if a man had been solely engaged upon it for 10 or 15 years he was not much good for any work of a better character. I gather from what you say that you do not consider that that argument would apply to the Central Office?—Not as our third class is constituted now. Every one is keen to make himself fit so far as he can for promotion.

49,750. Your system of moving them about from one department to another would, to some extent, be an answer to that argument?—Yes. We have mechanical work to do in our office, of course, as all offices have, but we also have very important work to do.

49,751. On the whole, you distinctly prefer the system of admission to the third class with promotion from the third class to the higher classes?—Certainly.

49,752. The hours of attendance are from 10 till 4, generally speaking?—Yes.

49,753. In vacation what are they?—In vacation the work decreases in all the departments, except the Bills of Sale Department. The hours of attendance are fixed by Order LXIII. Rule 9 of the Orders of the Supreme Court. In all the offices except the Summons and Order Department, the Crown Office, and the Associates' Department, the hours are from 10 till 4, except on Saturdays, when they close at 1 p.m., and during vacations when they close at 2 p.m., except on Saturdays, when they close at 1 p.m. In the Summons and Order Department the hours are from 10.30 to 4.30.

49,754. And in vacation from 10 till 2?—Yes.

49,755. Does that apply to the short vacations as well as the Long Vacation?—With limited numbers.

From the 24th December to the 6th January we have short hours, and in the Easter Vacation we do not have any short hours, we close on Easter Monday and Tuesday.

49,756. With no short hours?—No, not shorter hours; that only applies to the Long Vacation.

49,757. And what about the Whitsuntide Vacation?—One short day.

49,758. The hours of office work for clerks are the same as the hours during which the office is open to the public?—Not necessarily; if there is work to do they have to stop and do it, of course, after the office closes.

49,759. Taking the Writ Department, that is open to the public from 10 till 4?—Yes.

49,760. Is there any work to be done after it is closed to the public, after 4 o'clock?—Yes, sometimes.

49,761. What kind of work?—Entering. Perhaps you have not quite realised what we are engaged upon. We are always working in the King's Bench Division with the whole staff attending to the public, who are all common law practitioners, and who require their work to be done for them with the least possible delay, for very good reasons, because they get their costs taxed and cut, and various things done like that. The one thing they have the right to demand and that they do demand, is that when their work is brought up we should be there to do it on the spot at once. It is everything while you wait; this is different from the Chancery Division; it is not making an appointment and getting it done, it must be done during the time they are waiting. The clerks are working and taking in things and entering, and some have to be entered while they wait, and sealed and returned finished and completed. The whole staff is fixed upon the idea that there should not be delay, and in the case even of a long judgment, a man will go through the judgment, and take some considerable time and thus put pressure upon other men; but it is not deferred till the next day; "We will leave it, and look it through and consider it," that is not the sort of connection between the department and the public in the King's Bench Division.

49,762. The result is that there is very little work to be done after the office is closed to the public?—There is not very much.

49,763. Does that apply to all the departments of the Central Office?—No, it does not apply to all; there is work to be done; every day's work is completed, entry and all, in its day, and if there are entries to be made, or anything required to be done after 4 o'clock, the men stay to do it.

49,764. Does that often happen?—It does sometimes happen. Sometimes they are left with some work to do after the office is closed to the public.

49,765. What sort of work would that be?—They might have postponed something from the day before. They would say, "This must be looked into," and it cannot be done under pressure then because there are a great number of the public waiting; then they would stop and do it.

49,766. In the case of a complicated judgment, for instance?—Yes.

49,767. And in the Crown Office. I presume the work there does not depend upon the public?—That I do not know about. I cannot answer for the Crown Office; I know very little about the work in it.

49,768. In the Filing Department it depends chiefly on the public?—Everything is done there straight as it comes in.

49,769. (Lord Mersey.) Is there very much work in the Crown Office?—I do not like to express any opinion about it, because it is a department quite apart, almost by itself.

49,770. (Chairman.) My point was this: It has been suggested that the hours of work are short, and at the same time that solicitors do not want them made longer because solicitors do not want to have to come to the courts after 4 o'clock; and a suggestion has been made that the hours might be made longer for the work of the office without lengthening the hours for opening to the public. The question there evidently is whether there is work of a kind that does not depend upon the presence of the public, which could be done after the office has been closed to the public. I gather from what you say that there is very little work of that kind?—There is none; every bit of work is done each day in its day. For instance, we have a slack time every morning until past 11. We wind up the previous day with a certain number of documents, and then the next morning we are doing very little, and the whole of those documents are entered up in the cause book. We keep a cause book with a record of everything that is done in every action, and those are entered in the morning, numbered, put in bundles, and put away before the work of the day itself has come in; but from the time that the work of the day itself has come in up to 4 o'clock, and especially during the last hour from 3 to 4, it is just as much as the staff can do well to get through without keeping the solicitors' clerks waiting. And as to the question of hours, it is one that affects the solicitors' clerks particularly; they cannot close if we are open; if we are an hour later, or keep open late, they have to keep open an hour later also.

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,771. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You told us, I think, that you want in the office for your third class young men of good education?—Yes, we do.

49,772. And you said that you had no change to propose in the existing examination into their general education?—That is so.

49,773. That examination, I think, consists of writing and arithmetic up to fractions?—Yes.

49,774. And you told the Chairman that that corresponded to the attainments of an elementary school boy at the age of 13?—That has been the best examination so far as it goes at present, but I am not relying at all upon that examination; I am relying on getting a boy who has done well at a public school.

49,775. Would you not agree that that corresponds rather to the stage of a boy of nine than a boy of 13? Then you want to follow that by an optional examination of a technical kind, which can be passed in some cases five, or six, or seven years after he comes into the office, by the third class clerk?—That is so; for practical reasons I would like him to pass an elementary knowledge of practice and something just about what documents are, before he comes into the office—for practical purposes of usefulness.

49,776. Without going into the technicalities, that later examination would be an examination in procedure?—Yes, quite elementary.

49,777. And it would be on points of procedure that prevail in the office?—Yes, because every man ought to know a little more than he has to do; he wants knowledge round about his subject.

49,778. The subjects in the main that a man would want to know are those that he would pick up by taking an interest in his work in the office?—Yes, and by reading.

49,779. You did not tell us whether, with regard to the clerks in your office, you think there should be an age limit for retirement; have you any view on that point?—There is no age limit, of course, at present; a man goes on as long as he is thoroughly capable of doing his work.

49,780. Do you think it would be more satisfactory to follow the ordinary practice of the Civil Service, and have an age limit?—I do not know. I must say that in the legal departments I do not know of anything more valuable than the experience that a man gets. If a man keeps his health, and keeps his capability, I think he becomes more useful instead of less useful when he grows older.

49,781. But are there not other considerations on the other side? On the balance of considerations, do you think it desirable that there should be or should not be an age limit?—Personally, I should say that a hard and fast age limit would be a mistake; you might lose someone whom it would be extremely useful to keep.

49,782. But ought there to be a loose rule?—The rule (if any) should be that a man is always liable to be asked to resign after a certain age.

49,783. After what age?—After 65.

49,784. Now I want to ask you some questions as to the list of clerks in the office, and perhaps the secretary will hand you the printed list. If you look at the list of second class clerks you will find the name of Mr. F. R. Stringer second from the bottom?—Yes.

49,785. Is he your son?—Yes.

49,786. He came in apparently in the year 1904 and is now 30 years of age, so that he must have come in at about the age of 20?—Almost directly after he was 20.

49,787. Would you mind telling me what his experience was before he came into the office?—He was at King's College School, and he had no other experience of official work until he came to the office. #

49,788. But he was appointed at 20 years of age?—Yes.

49,789. You would not say that he was at school till he was 20?—I kept him there till he was 18 and then started him on a course at King's College, London. I kept him at school as long as I could, and as soon as he left school I got the Lord Chief Justice to promise him his nomination so that he would get it when he was 20, and he did get it when he was 20, and in the meantime I got him preparing, so far as I could, for passing whatever examination he required.

49,790. He had no other occupation except passing this examination between leaving school at the age of 18 and 20?—No.

49,791. Will you tell me what form he was in at King's College School when he left at 18, and what place he was in in the ordinary school list?—When he had been for some time in the fifth form on the classical side and had done well, I had him removed over to the commercial side, as I thought it would be well for him to be grounded also in that class of work. I then sent him to King's College, London.

49,792. You told us that there was no lack of candidates for these posts. When Mr. F. R. Stringer was appointed were there other candidates for that post?—I do not know; the judges keep their own lists. All I know is that I went to Lord Alverstone and asked him if he would give me the appointment for my boy, and he said he certainly would.

49,793. Does he work in the same department of your office as yourself?—He is in my department now.

49,794. Would you mind looking a little higher in that list, and you will see the name of Mr. G. W. Townesend?—Yes.

49,795. Is he a son of Mr. J. F. Townesend?—Yes.

49,796. Was there a son of Mr. F. H. Short in the office until a short time ago?—Yes, he is now in the Poor Persons Department; he was transferred from the Central Office, and he is in the Criminal Appeal Office.

49,797. The three first names of first class clerks are Mr. F. H. Short, Mr. F. A. Stringer, and Mr. J. F. Townesend?—Yes.

49,798. And they all three have, or have had, sons in the office?—Yes, when a man has served long and done well in the office it is always considered a recommendation to appoint one of his sons; that is one of the ideas—they think there is something in heredity.

49,799. I see by this document that Mr. A. J. Johnston has entered the office?—He is the son of a clerk, too.

49,800. He is the son of another first class clerk?—Yes.

49,801. Looking down through that list, taking the list only of second class clerks, can you see any other names which are those of sons of first class clerks, or clerks who have left the office, or died?—Not that I know. I may say that I can trace my own name back to 150 years, so far as relationship goes, to ancestors holding positions in the Court. Right back to one of the ancient "Six Clerks of the King's Chancery," generations of us have been in the Law Courts.

49,802. You have told us that about half of those who submit themselves to the Civil Service Commissioners for examination are rejected at present on the subject called digesting returns?—Did I say as many as half? I said that many are rejected, undoubtedly.

49,803. And when they are rejected they are sent to a crammer to be re-prepared?—I do not know about being sent; they always do go themselves.

17 March 1915.]

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,804. Looking back, do you remember cases who have sat more than twice and been rejected?—I cannot identify a case, but I feel sure there was one case who failed a second time, and they let him sit a third time.

49,805. In those cases where a man sits twice or three times, is the vacancy held up meanwhile?—Oh, yes, he is considered still to have it; he comes to the office.

49,806–8. Is pay given to him?—The Treasury allow him to be paid as a temporary clerk up to the time he gets his certificate, from which date his appointment really counts. He does get his pay, but he is paid simply as a temporary clerk up to the time that he passes, but he is given his chance to pass.

49,809. Is it invariably the case that all persons who are nominated by the high authorities concerned come in at once into the office whether they pass the examination or not?—Not absolutely so; they might not come, but the authorities cannot make the appointment until a vacancy occurs and we want the man.

49,810. I only want to know the facts. The fact is that in all cases, when one of the high authorities concerned gives a nomination to a candidate, that candidate comes into the office for temporary work and has up to three shots at his examination?—There may have been an exceptional reason for the three shots, but I may say anyhow up to the second shot, undoubtedly.

49,811. Therefore, in all cases where a boy was ultimately rejected you would know it. Can you tell us how many have been so rejected?—There have been two in my recollection.

49,812. Do you remember what they were rejected for?—I cannot remember that; I did not take much notice at the time.

49,813. You told us that your third class clerks are keen to get promotion; do you mean promotion according to order of ability or seniority?—If I used the word get, it was not the word I intended to use. I say they are very keen on promotion; that is to say, that they wish to prepare themselves for their promotion, and to do everything in their power.

49,814. But, in fact, judging from this list, they always are promoted, with only a few slight exceptions, by seniority?—They are mostly by seniority from third class to the second.

49,815. The difference in degree of keenness does not, as a rule, alter the actual date of the man's promotion?—No, unless a man is clearly not competent, in which case the masters might pass him over.

49,816. In your division of the office, which I think is the Writ and Appearance Office, you have two first class, 10 second class, and six third class clerks, have you not?—Yes.

49,817. Is not that a rather unusually large proportion of second class clerks?—In the Writ Department we have at present two first class clerks; we ought to have another first class clerk when the arrangement I spoke of with regard to the three Crown Office first class clerks has been settled. We have nine second class clerks.

49,818. Is not that an unusually large proportion of second class clerks?—I did not know that there was any recognised proportion between second and third class in any department.

49,819. I did not say recognised; I said unusually large as compared with other departments?—Yes, it might be.

49,820. Why is that?—Because the work requires so many second class clerks in the Writ Department in the judgment room, and that has always been considered a staff on which the office is worked; they do not want so many in the other departments.

49,821. Is it not the case that a man remains within the watertight compartment of his department whether he is promoted or not?—I do not know. If a man is promoted to the first class he has got to go and do the duties wherever they are.

49,822. And from the third to the second class?—He might do so, but it is not always so; he is moved if there is reason.

49,823. But the reason must be one of discipline?—Not one of discipline; one of requirement only.

49,824. But he remains normally in the same department?—Not necessarily. If he succeeded from the third class to the second, he would not necessarily leave the department; it would only be if there were reasons for such an arrangement.

49,825. Then is it not really the case that, while the number of second and third class clerks is fixed in accordance with the needs of the particular sub-department, the proportion of them between the second and third class depends upon the accident of which clerk reaches promotion first?—No, pardon me, it is not so; if we had a man now who was promoted from the third class to the second, there would be some place where there was a vacancy in the second class, and the new second class man would go and fill that vacancy.

49,826. Then there must have been some exceptional reason several times why there should be 10 second class clerks in your office?—Yes; they are all accounted for.

49,827. You told us that in your office there is a time-book that has to be signed?—Yes.

49,828. Is there any custom as to signing a statement that you are there at 10 o'clock, when, in fact, you are somewhat later?—I do not know whether that is a charge against the honesty of the staff, because I should call that an iniquitous thing, a monstrous thing.

49,829. But we have been told by several witnesses that in other departments there is a custom, and one witness said it was universal in the Civil Service, by which, if a man arrives at 10.20, he signs the book 10. Is there anything of that kind in your office?—No.

49,830. Are you sure?—I am not only sure, but the attendance-book is handed to me every morning, and I initial it each day, and such a thing as that could not occur without my knowing it. If it did I should report it instantly, and visit it with most severe penalties. I never heard of such a thing.

49,831. Then, as far as your office is concerned, there is no recognised custom that a man should sign the time-book as being one minute earlier than he is?—Although I know there is no such thought in your mind, I can only consider that it would be almost like insulting a man to ask him if he has put a lie down in the book against his name.

49,832. (Sir John Kempe.) Do you not draw a line at a certain time, say, a quarter past 10, and as long as the man arrives before that time, he does not put down the exact time of his arrival?—Whatever time he arrives, every man puts the time down opposite his name, and those who come after time have to put the reason. And they sign just as they come, not by seniority or anything of that kind, but in order of arrival, and they begin to sign about 9.40 or 9.45, because the men come early in order to get their entries over.

49,833. (Chairman.) Are you speaking now of the Writ and Judgment Department, or of all the departments of the Central Office?—So far as I know, that has been the practice in all the departments. I did hear of a book being kept in one department in an irregular way, and I came to the conclusion that it was very likely. I was extremely angry about it, and immediately called the attention of the senior master to the matter, because I did not consider that a thing like that ought to pass on any account.

49,834. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) I have only one more question to ask you. You say in your statement that boys designed for the Service do not improve by having to wait till they are 20. You could not speak of a boy as designed for a Treasury clerkship could you, because you would not know whether, when the time came, he would get a Treasury clerkship?—You get an answer to that very largely from what you have been asking me about the relationship of clerks to one another. You will find in almost all the departments that the families of a great many of the men have been in the legal offices for very many years, for several generations. If a man has done good work and has a good record it is always considered that it would be rather a help to him to get a post in his office for his son.

17 March 1915.]

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

49,835. And these boys designed for the Service then are very often boys who have at an age earlier than 20 received the promise of a nomination?—Not necessarily a promise; they simply go on the chance; they say we are going to try for it and a trial is made.

49,836. But in your case you had a definite promise from the Lord Chief Justice of the next nomination?—Yes.

49,837. And a vacancy did occur exactly in the very month when your son reached 20?—Yes, it did, very soon after. I think he was appointed in August, and he became 20 in the middle of July.

49,838. Was it a pure accident that the vacancy happened to arise at that moment?—Yes, quite an accident.

49,839. (Mr. Coward.) There are a great many employees in these offices in the courts, nearly 500—473?—In the whole of the courts, you mean?

49,840. Yes?—Very likely, I should think.

49,841. You would regard it as essential that there should be regularity and order and method in their appointment, and in performing the duties they have to perform, would you not?—Certainly.

49,842. I should like to know who is the individual who would determine whether, for instance, in any one class there are too many or too few clerks; is there anybody?—You mean to say whether there is a chance of their becoming overmanned or undermanned?

49,843. No, just let me give you the sort of illustration. In times gone by you and I remember perfectly well when you used to have writs upon a policy of insurance, perhaps you had a hundred or more in a day on one policy?—We often do, now.

49,844. You do not do it now?—Yes, we do.

49,845. I beg your pardon, I think you are not right there?—As a matter of fact, when there was that great catastrophe in the Atlantic—

49,846. That was another thing; that was an action against shipowners, not on a policy?—But just the same thing occurs, whenever there is a great catastrophe.

49,847. I was meaning this. You no longer issue writs for actions upon policies of insurance against each underwriter?—No.

49,848. Therefore you can understand that you might not have so much necessity for a number of clerks as you would if that kind of thing were going on constantly?—Yes, if it did; but on the other hand there are very often things that increase the numbers; there are a great many other things that increase the writs.

49,849. There is no doubt that the business of the Courts has decreased?—Not very much.

49,850. Certainly the number of writs has decreased?—Not very much; we have had a slight decrease, but it has not been very much. We look upon our average that we issue about 40,000 writs a year, and commencing actions and originating summonses as well. I think our return is now about 44,000 for last year, and I think 46,000 has been about the highest level for a great number of years.

49,851. I am only upon this point. Is there anybody who would determine whether the office is overstaffed or whether it is understaffed?—I suppose if the Committee of Control Masters saw any sign of the office being overstaffed they might be able to tell. We should know if we were undermanned of course. I suppose each department would best know for itself. The head of the department would know whether he was overstaffed.

49,852. Would you not agree with me, that in order to ensure efficiency, the business of the Law Courts should be conducted on the same kind of principle that ordinary business establishments should be conducted?—If there is any analogy between the two that would no doubt apply, but I do not see that the analogy comes in. The business of an ordinary establishment is selling goods, or it may be in a solicitor's office doing all kind of miscellaneous work on a very limited scale, compared with the work of a department like ours.

49,853. There is no reason, is there, why the clerks should not be appointed and graded on the same sort of principles in their employment as would obtain in a solicitor's office?—Do you mean that they should be paid the same salary?

49,854. No, I did not mean that. I meant that you appoint all these people right up the tree by seniority?—Or by merit.

49,855. No, not by merit. You get a man in your third class, and you have no opportunity of determining before he is there whether he will be a good clerk or not?—Nobody can ever tell what a man will develop into in 20 years or 12 years.

49,856. But I may tell you that I have got another sort of theory about it. When you get a man and appoint him in the third class, do you not often find that it is rather a mistake that you have made, and that it would have been a better thing had you not done it?—We do not put him into the third class; the patron of the appointment puts him into the third class.

49,857. But when he is once there, there he is settled, and unless he does something wrong he never goes out?—He goes out by promotion.

49,858. Well, he never goes out of the office; he goes up, but it is always on an ascending scale. You never do what is done in other offices, dismiss him unless he does something heinously wrong?—If he does anything which is officially disgraceful, or if he is so incompetent that it is impossible to go on with him, he might be dismissed.

49,859. The thing is, is he dismissed?—He is.

49,860. How many have you known in the course of your long experience to have been turned out in that kind of way?—I have never known a man who you could say was absolutely incompetent to do anything. If I had I think he would have been turned out. We have had one or two cases of men dismissed for misconduct, but you are not speaking of that; you are talking of incapacity.

49,861. That is so?—I have never known a case.

49,862. So that the result is that every man you get in your third class remains there for his life, if he choose to stay?—Yes, if he choose to stay; he remains there as long as he does his work—you must put that qualification in.

49,863. But then he always does?—As long as he does his work well, he is entitled to stay. That is one of his rights as a member of the public service.

49,864. Merit has absolutely nothing to do with his promotion?—Pardon me, that is not so. We have very recently had a case where a clerk has been passed over.

49,865. But I understood you to say that that happens very rarely?—Because really, as a matter of fact as regards promotion to the second class, the men as a rule who come to us have been, with certain exceptions, of a class who have done well. The men are keen and try their best. We have not got such a very gigantic staff after all, and we have not got any of those men who come in and are turned away because they are no good.

49,866. You have not? The man keeps up to the standard?—To what standard?

49,867. To the standard necessary to be retained there?—Yes, if you put him on simple work.

49,868. And the man keeps there well or ill; and, provided he does not do so badly as to be kicked out, he gets an increase every year, irrespective of merit?—Yes, that is part of the arrangement when he came in, that he should rise 10*l.* a year till he reaches 200*l.*; that is part of the arrangement.

49,869. Yes, I know, but is it a good one? I am only asking you whether you think it is an advantageous arrangement?—That involves, of course, considering the whole scale. You would have to say, "You are to be engaged at 100*l.* a year, and if you deserve it you will get 10*l.* increase each year, and if you do not qualify and do well as you get older you will have to stick to this 100*l.*" That would be rather a curious way of conducting the department.

49,870. Would it? It would in a Government department—that is exactly the point. A Government department is conducted on lines that are wholly different from those on which an ordinary business is conducted, and I am questioning with you whether it is expedient. However, I am much obliged to you.

17 March 1915.]

Mr. FRANCIS AUGUSTUS STRINGER.

(Chairman.) I should like to ask you one question with regard to that. Is any certificate of efficiency required before each increment is allowed?—The master has to write to the Lord Chancellor and say that So-and-so is appointed.

49,871. But before each increment is allowed?—No, not before each increment.

49,872. Are you aware that in many offices in the Civil Service that is required?—I did not know that; I never knew that that existed at all; it never has been so in our office.

49,873. Do you think it is a good plan?—I do not see any harm in it; I do not see what harm it could do. I think it would be a good plan.

49,874. (Miss Haldane.) I gather that you want to get into your office a secondary school boy of fair education?—Yes.

49,875. In Scotland you have an examination at the end of the school career, and a certificate is given on passing that examination which is called a leaving certificate, which admits to the university and to certain occupations and professions. If a boy passed that examination and got that certificate would it not be rather a good test for those coming in as third class clerks?—Yes, it would.

49,876. Supposing an examination of that kind was established throughout the United Kingdom, which has been discussed, that would form a good entry?—I should think it would be a very great recommendation to the patron who was going to appoint, because the candidate would pass it so as to qualify him for his recommendation.

49,877. Showing that he had got a good secondary education?—Yes, if the examination was of that kind it might be possible to dispense with a further examination on appointment.

49,878. The idea is that it should not be a cramming examination, as I gather the other one is?—If such a scheme were to be adopted it might be possible to consider whether the holding of that qualification might not exempt the man from the ordinary Civil Service entrance examination.

49,879. (Sir John Kempe.) We have had a great deal of evidence to the effect that professional qualifications are necessary. You do not think they are necessary for your office, but can you speak about the other offices—the Chancery Office for instance?—I know the work that they do in the Chancery Office, but I think a master would be better able to tell you than I can. You mean whether the qualification of a solicitor's clerk would be a good one for a clerkship in the Chancery Division?

49,880. Is it necessary in the Chancery Division?—So far as my knowledge goes, I should think it was very much more probable that the qualification of having been a good and successful solicitor's clerk would be a better qualification in the Chancery Division than in the King's Bench Division.

49,881. You say that you rather agree with the proposal of selection by a committee?—Yes.

49,882. On what ground do you think that a committee would be able to select men with qualifications for your office, better than could be done by open competition. You have had no experience of open competition?—No, I know some of the men who have gone in. I have never had any experience of it, but what I really think and what is in my mind is that really and truly to get the man we want he has got to be the right type of man. After his appointment he has to acquire all he has got to learn to make him valuable so as to be of use to us. We are on one side of the dividing line, and we have, as it were, to administer all the practice and procedure and so on within the limits of the different departments where the machinery is required by the public, and the thing is that it is learning inside, and the whole of the practice involves a knowledge of outside procedure, but it does not extend to the same area as a solicitor's knowledge of law at all. Our men know no law, but when a solicitor is doing work he has to know the law, that is the substantial law regulating rights and property and everything. But there is a law of procedure which is extremely complicated law, and a man in our department ought to become more or less experienced in procedure.

49,883. I am afraid you have misunderstood my question. What I want to know is, what reason have you for supposing that a committee to select third class clerks would get better men for your purposes than open competition would. As a matter of fact it is a question of experience, and you have not had actual experience which would show you that we get by open competition men adaptable for anything. This system of open competition is perfectly successful; what reason have you for thinking that selection by a committee in your case would be better than open competition?—I cannot say more. I cannot say that it would be better. Personally I should prefer it; I should trust more to a committee choosing the right type of young fellows to come in than I should like to trust to open competition, but I cannot say that I do so with great knowledge of open competition.

49,884. If it can be shown that at any rate open competition does produce good men, one would rather argue that it might succeed with you too?—It might, but the personality of the man is sunk in the open competition. There may be men of quite different personalities, and it is the personality of the man that we want to some extent for selection.

49,885. You think, on the whole, that selection by a committee would produce a better class of man than you get now?—Yes.

49,886. But you cannot say that open competition would not do so?—No.

Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD WINTERBOTHAM (Official Solicitor), called and examined, accompanied by Mr. EDWARD SANT (a member of his staff).

49,887. (Chairman.) Have you held the post of Official Solicitor of the Supreme Court since 1895?—Yes.

49,888. You were appointed by the then Lord Chancellor?—Yes, Lord Herschell.

49,889. What had been your previous experience before appointment?—I had been for 25 years partner in the firm of Messrs. Waterhouse & Co., and I had been senior partner since Mr. Waterhouse's death.

49,890. Does the work of the post which you occupy require your whole time?—I am entitled to practise privately, and for a good many years I did do a good deal of work outside. I was only bound to do all the work that had to be done; but for some years the work has so much increased that, for all practical purposes, I do not practise privately. I am entitled to do so, and I see clients occasionally, but practically my whole time is taken up with my official work in the courts.

49,891. That has enabled you to keep in some touch with the outside profession?—Yes, I have always kept in touch with the outside profession. I have been a practising solicitor, and have been elected on the Council and have been President of the Law Society, which, of course, I could not be if I were not a practising solicitor.

49,892. It is necessary, I presume, for your post that the occupant of it should be in touch with the profession?—It has been always thought so, and I have found it of great assistance in the conduct of my work to be recognised as a member of the profession rather than as an official.

49,893. Generally, what is the nature of the work?—My work is about as varied as any human being's can be. I have strictly official work to do that takes a certain amount of my time. I have to visit prisons, and see that persons who are committed for contempt are not overlooked, and that their cases are properly dealt with. I have to deal with all sorts of people who are referred to me by the judges and by the officials in the courts. A great many applications are often made to the courts in person, interrupting business, and which cannot be dealt with by the judges at the moment. Then those people are sent to my office, and I make inquiries, and look into the matters. The Lord Chancellor has a vast number of communications made to him by letter, and those are usually sent on to me to look into. I have many other duties. For instance, if a girl of 20 wants to get married, and her parents are lunatics, or cannot be got at, she has to get an order of the Court allowing her to marry, and that is sent to me from the Lord Chancellor, and I see the judges, and communicate with the parties, and get the necessary order. I advise the various departments, for instance, on questions as to court fees; if necessary, pressing a solicitor to pay court fees which he has not paid, advising, for example, the Paymaster-General whether certain orders should be amended, or whether he should pay moneys out. I think I could go on for the rest of the afternoon if I were to try to describe all my duties.

49,894. Would the case you mentioned of a young lady about to be married be the case of a ward of Court?—No: if they are under age they must have the consent of their parent or guardian, and if they have no parent or guardian, or the parent is a lunatic, they have to go to the Lord Chancellor, and his jurisdiction is exercised by the senior judge. That is sent to me, and I have to carry it through.

49,895. Would that be the case if the young lady had a solicitor acting for her?—Yes, if she had no parent or guardian.

49,896. The Court would request you to make independent inquiry?—Probably I should have to. The applications are generally, I admit, from poor people. I do not recollect having had a case where they had means. In those cases they generally have guardians.

49,897. Those are specimens of the kind of work which you describe as your official work, properly so called?—Yes. In such cases I act for the Court, and I have no client.

49,898. There is also a large branch of your work which may be described as work for clients?—Yes. I do not act for anyone who is not under disability. I act for infants and persons of unsound mind. I am appointed either by the Court direct, or on the application of the parties. Frequently there is no suitable person to represent the interests of an infant or a lunatic when there is litigation, and I am appointed guardian ad litem, or next friend of the infant or lunatic; or I am appointed by the Lunacy Department Receiver or committee of the estate or person, and I am appointed also by the Court guardian of the person and estate of infants, and have to take personal charge of them.

49,899. Those are all cases where there is no suitable relation or other person to act as guardian or committee?—Yes. Sometimes the Court thinks that their affairs are not being properly looked after, and places them in my hands for the purpose of putting them right.

49,900. For that purpose you are at the disposal of all the divisions of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

49,901. And also of the masters in Lunacy?—Yes. A very large proportion of my work is looking after the persons and estates of lunatics.

49,902. For the first class of work, which you describe as official work proper, I think you are remunerated by salary?—Yes, I am paid a salary of 500*l.* a year for what is called strictly official work, in which I have no client. My chief assistant has 350*l.* a year for his assistance. Those are the two payments made in respect of the post.

49,903. For the other work, for clients, your remuneration is derived from the fees paid out of the estates or by the clients?—Yes. Of course I am usually acting for people who have funds—infants and lunatics—and the Court directs that they shall pay the expenses incurred, and that means costs, which are taxed in every case and certified.

49,904. What happens in the case of poor persons?—If they have no funds I sometimes act for them by direction of the Court. The new rules, recently made, provide for litigation by poor persons, but there are a great many cases in which I have to act for them and assist the Court, and in those cases, of course, I do not get any fees.

49,905. What is the arrangement as regards the disposal of the fees?—The arrangement, which has been in force for a good many years—I cannot say it was the arrangement which I understood when I was appointed—is, that I take half those fees up to 1,300*l.*, the Treasury taking the other half, making my total remuneration 1,800*l.* The balance is paid over to the Treasury. They audit my accounts and examine them from time to time, and I send them in particulars.

49,906. At present the total of the fees is considerably more than double 1,300*l.*?—Yes, a great deal more.

49,907. So that, in effect, now your remuneration for both classes of duty is a fixed remuneration of 1,800*l.* a year?—It becomes in effect that. The fees have always largely exceeded that maximum, and my limit has been 1,800*l.*, including the official salary, and everything else has gone to the Treasury.

49,908. Before the division the expenses of the staff are deducted?—Yes, all salaries, except the 350*l.* I have mentioned, and all office expenses are deducted.

49,909. What is included in office expenses?—Not very much, because I have my office in the Law Courts, and I do not pay for cleaning, lighting, warming, and office stationery.

49,910. Nor, of course, rent or taxes?—No. Practically it is almost entirely law stationers' charges for copying.

49,911. So that, if it was desired to make an estimate of what the net proceeds for the public purse were, it would be necessary to take into account fixed charges of that kind?—It would, certainly. There would be no difficulty; I can pretty accurately estimate what they would be.

49,912. What is the arrangement as regards the salaries of your staff?—The salaries of my clerks are paid by me out of the profits, but the Treasury have claimed the right of fixing a lump sum, beyond which I am not to go; and since my appointment I have had constant correspondence, and I might say trouble, because they do not always recognise the rights of my staff as I put them, and I have constantly had questions with them. Of course I am under the Lord Chancellor, and it is my duty to refer questions direct to the Lord Chancellor, and, therefore, my correspondence with the Treasury is through his office.

49,913. How many members of your staff are there?—At the present time I have 12 members on my staff.

49,914. Are they appointed entirely by yourself?—Yes, I select them.

49,915. At present, I understand, they have no rights of pension?—They have no pension, and my point is almost stronger than that—that I have no right out of the profits that I earn to pay them any remuneration that I think is right, or to give them any pension or any allowance of any kind on leaving.

49,916. The Treasury have not agreed to your making any allowance of that kind?—On the contrary, they have refused it on the one occasion that has arisen. I have only lost one member of my staff through retirement on account of ill-health and age at present.

49,917. On what terms are they appointed as regards notice? Are you at liberty to send any of them away on short notice?—Yes, they are engaged subject to a month's notice.

49,918. Practically, are they more or less permanent, or does the staff change much?—In the whole 20 years I have only dismissed one clerk, and that was a young man for dishonesty years ago. They are permanent in effect.

49,919. Do they often leave you?—Yes, I am sorry to say they do, because they find they are in a blind road. They have no prospects. The result is that they not infrequently get appointments in the legal offices on the permanent staff, and I lose my best men, because they are rather sought after in the other departments. The fact is, my office becomes a sort of training ground for them, and when a man has become thoroughly useful to me and I cannot increase his salary as I should like to do, he tries to get on to the establishment. They are sought after by the masters and by other departments, who know their work because they are constantly before them, and the result is I lose them.

49,920. Have many men passed on from you in that way?—Those I have lost have mostly gone in that way. Five have entered the Civil Service. Two have obtained outside appointments.

49,921. By the Civil Service, do you mean the offices of the Supreme Court?—Not all in the Supreme Court. One has gone to the Privy Council Office, and one has gone to the office of the Public Trustee—I have called that the Civil Service, because I gather that that is what is now suggested. The others are in the building; one is in the Bankruptcy Department, and two in the masters' offices—in Chancery and in the Taxing Office. Before I came one had gone into the Lunacy Department. I have only lost two others; one was the young clerk who was dismissed, as I said, and one has retired. With those exceptions there has been no change in my staff, except additions from below.

49,922. Some of your staff have been with you for a considerable number of years?—Mr. Toone has been there for 42 years.

49,923. Mr. Toone is the senior member of your staff?—Yes.

49,924. There are others who have been with you over 20 years?—Yes, over 20 years.

49,925. Is it your suggestion that that system is an unsatisfactory one?—I think it is unsatisfactory to everybody. It is very unsatisfactory to me. If I were running this business as my own business—and in a certain sense it is; that is to say, I am earning these profits—I should pay my clerks in a different way. I should certainly increase their salaries, and I should certainly promise them a retiring allowance, because the profits are such as would perfectly well allow that, without any kind of charge upon public funds. The result is that they have neither one thing nor the other. They have not got that amount of consideration which I should show them if I was free to show it to them, and they have not got the benefit of being on the establishment.

49,926. The Commission have before them a representation from some of your staff which I think you have seen?—They were good enough to show it to me before they sent it in. Of course, I made no remarks upon it and did not suggest any amendment of it. Speaking generally I agree with it.

49,927. In that representation the clerks who sign it say that they do not express any discontent with their present salaries; the two points which they specially raise are the question of security of tenure of their posts and the question of superannuation allowance. They also raise a question which they describe as "recognition by the authorities of the nature and extent of the work carried out by the department." That seems not to have a very definite or direct bearing on their pay or conditions of service?—I am not quite certain what was meant by that.

49,928. The two practical points are security of tenure and superannuation allowance?—Yes. I should like to say on the question of salary that I have been literally fighting, if I may say so, for these salaries ever since I was appointed. When I have wanted to increase them the Treasury have objected. I have asked the Lord Chancellor to let me have a committee to inquire into the matter, and that has been postponed from time to time. Then the Treasury have given way, but grudgingly. The Lord Chancellor promised when the next question arose that I should have a committee. I reminded him of it, but he then said that this Commission was sitting and I should have an opportunity of putting my case before it, so that it has rather stood over. What I feel is this: The profits have very largely increased; the last few years' profits have been very large, and the work of the staff has been remarkably good. Many of my staff work overtime, and they certainly ought to be paid for this. Personally I should increase their salaries. I am glad to hear they are satisfied with what they get, and I dare say, comparing it with an outside office, they are not badly paid.

49,929. What should you take as your basis or standard for fixing the salaries of your office? Would it be fair to take the practice in the profession in general?—Not entirely. Moreover, in the case of a solicitor practising alone, especially if his profits are large, I think you would find his salaries would be considerably higher than they would in other large offices. Take a large agency house with half a dozen partners: Very much of the work is done by the partners, and the staff would not be paid in equal proportion; but when a solicitor is working alone and has important work which he must depute, or a great deal of it, to others, especially such work as I have of attending before the masters and being at the beck and call of the judges, you must have a staff that are thoroughly competent and are very well paid. I should not think, if I were in practice alone, of maintaining these salaries and putting into my own pocket the amount of profits that are earned.

49,930. Comparing your office with the office of your firm, should you say that the senior members of your official staff are doing better work and more important work than the managing clerks who work for Messrs. Waterhouse?—Yes, I think so, and I say so for this reason: We have seven partners in my firm, and the junior partners would do the work that my senior clerks are doing, undoubtedly.

49,931. But the work of the principal managing clerks working for your firm is very important and responsible work?—Not so responsible as if there were not so many partners.

49,932. That I appreciate?—A partner would attend where I have to send a clerk. I do not quite know what is paid to them. I know one of my clerks who is now a partner had 500*l.* a year before he was a partner. I think there are one or two who have something like that.

49,933. Would not that be a somewhat exceptional and unusual figure for a managing clerk?—I think it would be. I think solicitors' clerks, taken all round, are not well paid.

49,934. Would not it be the case that managing clerks, as a rule, would have from 300*l.* to 400*l.* a year?—Possibly. I am afraid it is a subject on which I have not found out much, because solicitors do not talk much about these things to one another. I should think very likely that would be the case, but my answer would be that a great many solicitors' businesses are not as large as they were, and I do not think clerks are paid as well as they used to be. I think in the old days when a very large firm had important Chancery work going on they would have paid their clerks quite as much as that, but now the work is not what it was, and I do not think they are paid so much. But I am rather surmising. I do not know that I can speak with sufficient knowledge of what other people do.

49,935. What, in your experience, is the practice of private firms of good standing as regards pensions?—That, again, I believe, very much varies. I have known private firms who are most generous in that respect, and I think there are others who do not give retiring allowances. I think it would depend altogether on the circumstances. I cannot recall, in the case of my own firm, more than one clerk (who retired through ill health) who has been pensioned; I think one or two have been pensioned, but it is not general I should think.

49,936. At any rate the clerks would have no right to a pension?—No.

49,937. And it would be given as a matter of grace in cases of specially good service?—Yes.

49,938. Would you say generally that the position of your staff now, taking into account the hours of work, the salaries, the prospects as to pension, and the whole conditions of their service, is less favourable than the position of corresponding persons in the general profession?—I think I should for this reason, that I think their work is exceptional. The official solicitor is expected to have his work done in the very best style possible. He must not send to a master anybody except a person who is thoroughly competent to do the work. The judges expect when they send for me or for somebody that that person will be a person who is able to deal with the case. I am afraid that that might not be said of all the staffs of solicitors who attend in chambers. Certainly I do feel that my staff are rather exceptional, and that my position is somewhat exceptional.

17 March 1915.]

49,939. You have mentioned that your senior assistant receives in all a salary of 500*l.* a year?—Yes, the 350*l.* paid by the Treasury direct and another 150*l.* which I add.

49,940. Are there two other members of your staff who are solicitors?—Yes.

49,941. One of those receives a salary of 520*l.* a year and the other receives a salary of 315*l.*?—Yes.

49,942. And with the rest of the staff the salaries vary between a maximum of 260*l.* and a minimum of 32*l.* 10*s.* for beginners?—Yes. I should like to say that one of the two solicitors serving me is 49 and the other 47 years of age, and they have been very many years in the profession. The gentleman who gets the highest salary other than those—Mr. Simpson—has been with me 21 years, and I had a hint only the other day that he was going to be captured by another department if they could get him and put forward as a second class clerk; it would be a serious loss to my department if he went.

49,943. Is the staff we are speaking of employed entirely on your work as official solicitor?—Absolutely.

49,944. Not on private work?—They are in a different building and in a different office, and have nothing whatever to do with my private work.

49,945. If it was in your hands to organise the office on an entirely fresh basis, what system do you consider would be the best?—I feel that the most important thing is the selection of the men at the outset. My plan has generally been to select quite young men of 16 or about that age. I select them from what I know of them and of their families or their belongings.

49,946. You do not find it necessary for them to have had previous experience as solicitors' clerks?—No, not for these appointments. Of course, if I lost one of my seniors I should have to take one from outside, undoubtedly. As a general rule, these men whose names are before you all began in that way. Then, when they have been with me four or five years and are 21 years of age, by that time they have had considerable experience, and have begun to do work of some considerable consequence and importance. I should personally like, after four or five years' experience of that kind, to have the opportunity of recommending them to be put upon the establishment as permanent clerks with the right to a proper pension. I do not think any difficulty would be likely to arise in that case, because I am bound to select men who are competent for my work, and although I should have no kind of objection to a suggestion which has been made that a committee should have something to say to it before they are appointed, I do feel that in a solicitor's office the principal must not only be consulted, but must have the chief voice in saying who are to be put upon his staff.

49,947. Your suggestion would be a committee of selection, of which you should be a member?—Yes, and something more than a member.

49,948. (Mr. Coward.) With a right of veto?—Yes, I could not have a man foisted upon me as a clerk whom I did not want and did not think was at all suitable; it would never do.

49,949. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Would you give the committee a veto upon appointments suggested by yourself?—I would be perfectly willing to do that.

49,950. (Chairman.) I understood your suggestion to be rather the other way round, that the official solicitor should have a veto on the appointments recommended by the committee?—I should like to have the initiative to put forward a man for the post and let the committee say if he is suitable or not, and then, when he has had a good time on probation, to say that such a man should go upon the establishment. Of course, then he would have to be examined as to his physical health and general suitability, but not by any examination as to his book learning.

49,951. You suggest that he should then get a Civil Service certificate without examination?—Yes. It would be impossible for a man who had been five years in my office learning this work to go in for a competitive examination, or in fact any examination in classics or mathematics or anything of that kind.

49,952. What would your suggestion be as regards salaries?—Then, I think, they would come in probably as third class clerks at 20 or 21, and, if they were meritorious, in due course would go to a higher grade, if they were fit for it.

49,953. You suggest that there should be clerks of the three classes into which the legal offices in general are divided?—I would not tie myself to three classes, but I mean there should be an opportunity for them (without their having any right) to be put forward to the higher grades to get from the third or lower grade into the higher grades if competent, and if their work was being done well. I am thinking of my own staff and of the men I know, and they are men who began with 10*s.* a week. The gentleman who now gets about 260*l.* a year began at that, and he is perfectly competent to undertake any work that is done by a first or second class clerk in the Law Courts now.

49,954. You have no fixed age limit for their retirement at present?—No. That is another point. My senior clerk is 71. He is perfectly able to do his work, I am thankful to say, but he would not have a penny piece if he were to retire. The Treasury have gone out of their way to say that under no circumstances is the fact that he receives 350*l.* a year from the Treasury for official work to entitle him to any retiring allowance of any sort or kind, although I pay it out of my own profits. He has had 41 years in the Service, and is known to every judge and to every one in the building.

49,955. Do you consider that you might find the absence of any age limit embarrassing as regards dispensing with the services of a man whose powers began to fail?—I do. I should feel it terribly hard to dismiss this gentleman; in fact, I have no right to. The Lord Chancellor intervened when I was appointed, and said, I must not dismiss him without reference to him; but, of course, that is an exceptional case. I had a cashier who had served me for 30 years, and who retired in ill-health at the age of 59, and I made a special appeal to the Treasury to allow me to give him out of the profits a retiring allowance, but they refused. I know the Lord Chancellor supported my application.

49,956. If the staff were established in the way you suggest, do you anticipate any drawback arising from the absence of the complete control that you have over them at present?—I am not afraid of it. My past experience has shown me that if you are careful in your selection of men, and make them comfortable, and give them a secure position, there is an esprit de corps among those men, and I should trust them entirely. I have never had any difficulty, and I do not anticipate any.

49,957. You do not think that their zeal and efficiency arises to any extent from the fact that they know their position is not so absolutely secure as if they were on the establishment, and, therefore, they have to justify their position?—I do not think so. I am very well served, I am bound to say, and always have been all through my life. Perhaps that may have something to do with the way I treat them.

49,958. And you think you would be just as well served if their position were entirely secure?—I think so; if you were careful in their selection in the first instance and gave them a sufficient time on probation.

49,959. If I understand you rightly, your argument in favour of establishment and pension for your clerks is that, in the first place, their positions are practically permanent, and, so far as they are not permanent, it is because they leave to better themselves?—Yes.

49,960. And, in the second place, you find and anticipate practical inconvenience from the difficulty

17 March 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD WINTERBOTHAM, accompanied by
Mr. EDWARD SANT.

of dispensing with the services of clerks who have served you well and efficiently for a number of years when they reach an advanced age, if no pension is available?—Yes.

49,961. Does that represent the argument completely, or is there anything further you wish to add?—Yes, only I hope I have made it clear to the Commission that I think I am in a doubly difficult position. If I am to be treated as a solicitor in practice, as in one sense I am, earning costs, that solicitor ought to have full authority to deal with his profits, so far as the staff are concerned.

49,962. On that point is there not this difference, that in the case of an ordinary solicitor in practice anything he paid to the staff would come out of his own pocket, whereas in this case it would come entirely out of the public pocket?—It would be the case of a sleeping partner. I certainly should not do all the work for a sleeping partner if he were to put his finger into the pie and object to the salaries I was paying my staff. I could not have that.

49,963. In the present case, as it works now, the sleeping partner is, in fact, the sole partner as regards any addition to or diminution of profits?—That is because of a term which has been introduced since my appointment. The original arrangement made with me was that I was to receive half the profits. I never agreed to have a maximum fixed.

49,964. But that is the arrangement which exists at the present moment?—I gave way on that point and make no complaint of it, but that is the reason why I claim that half of it would have come out of my pocket.

49,965. But as things are at present, that arrangement having been introduced, though somewhat against your will, any increase of salaries would come out of the Exchequer?—That is perfectly true, and that shows the impossibility of the present position, if I may say so. The Treasury cannot know what my staff require. One gentleman in the Treasury told me that it was not the practice of solicitors to give regular increments of salaries to their clerks. I can assure you that I begged for an inquiry by a practical body, and have not had it. I am sorry if I speak too warmly about the Treasury, but they have been the only anxiety that I have had in the 20 years. I believe I have done my work to the satisfaction of every human being in the building, but I have been constantly worried over this question.

49,966. The Commission are only anxious to arrive at a full statement of your argument, and, as we have not got the Treasury to speak for itself at present, I am representing to you the points which occur to me as, perhaps, representing the case of the Treasury?—Of course I understand it comes out of the pocket of the Treasury in that sense; that is to say, it comes out of the profits I am earning for the Treasury.

49,967. The Treasury might say that a system would not be satisfactory under which the individual head of an office had complete power of increasing the salaries of his clerks if that increase falls on the Exchequer?—That forces me to the conclusion that the system of having established clerks with fixed salaries would be very much more satisfactory.

49,968. In fact there is a certain incompatibility in the present system between the individual control which you are supposed to exercise and the fact that the net profits of the office as it stands at present go entirely to the Treasury?—Yes; and therefore, as I am working for the profit of the State, those who are earning the profits should be on the establishment. That is my point.

49,969. I should like to ask you a few questions not relating to your own department, but relating to your experience of other departments. You have constant contact with the Chancery offices and the Lunacy office?—Yes. More with the Lunacy office than with the Chancery offices. I know the Lunacy Department, I think, down to the ground. I have 500 or 600 cases of persons of unsound mind under my care, and I am there every day.

49,970. The majority of the estates under your care are those of persons of unsound mind?—Yes.

49,971. Do you find that as organised at present the Lunacy offices work satisfactorily?—Yes, I should like to say that I think the office works exceedingly well. I did not realize until yesterday that the nominations to the posts in the Lunacy Department are practically in the hands of the masters. I am told that they suggest, and that the Lord Chancellor appoints, and he always appoints on the recommendations of the masters. I have always noticed that the staff of the Lunacy Department work more together; that there is more esprit de corps in that department; and, taking it all round, I think they do their work as well as any department in the building, and they have an excellent staff. I am inclined to put that down a good deal to the fact that the masters, who are in close touch with their staff there, have practically, at any rate, the initiative in the appointment of men who are working under them.

49,972. The masters being the persons who have most interest in the work of the office being properly performed?—Yes. Then the masters there are in far closer touch with their department than a judge is with his department in Chancery; they are in close touch with their staff. The staff see them; they sit in an adjoining room, they are there all day, can be consulted and are consulted at any moment. The whole department works, I think, most satisfactorily. Perhaps I may add one more point: It is a department the work of which is not very familiar to the public or to the solicitors. A great many solicitors have very little Lunacy work, but they will always find there every possible help in carrying through their work; the staff pride themselves, I think, on giving personal help there. The result of it is that, speaking generally, I think the work is exceedingly well done and done with great satisfaction to the profession.

49,973. It has been stated that inconvenience arises from the fact that the two masters in Lunacy are co-ordinate officers, each acting independently, and that differences of practice arise between them. It has been suggested that that might be remedied by having two masters, of whom one should be the chief and the other more or less subordinate to him, so as to secure uniformity of practice. Have you experienced any such inconvenience?—There are variations of practice, and there have been in the past. We have had masters with strong individual views of their own. I am not saying anything disrespectful to Master Theobald, but he has very strong opinions of his own on reforms on various subjects, and he does not always carry the other master with him. There have been differences, but I do not think they are serious ones.

49,974. Do you think the suggested remedy would be a desirable one?—I doubt it. I should have thought the best thing was that the two masters should confer on these matters and agree to act together. I should have thought there was no serious difficulty in that. They are not differences on very important matters. For instance, one master says: "You must swear an affidavit"; the other says: "You must sign a document and certify it." One says you must have only one medical man's evidence, and the other thinks there should be two. You have to learn the differences, undoubtedly; but it would be very much better that they should agree, and I think they might, without any serious difficulty. Possibly they will now there is a new master.

49,975. It might be easier to arrive at an agreement if one had the ultimate voice?—It might not be the best result.

[49,976. Would not it be better to have agreement, even if not the ideally best decision?—If I were one of the masters, and the other master would not agree, I should go to the Lord Justice and ask him to settle the question, because the masters are under the Lords Justices. I do not think it is really a serious question. I should be sorry to see one master under the other. It would be only like putting in a senior clerk.

49,977. You have not in practice found any serious inconvenience owing to that?—No.

49,978. You say you have not so much contact with the Chancery offices?—I have a good deal, but not such

17 March 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD WINTERBOTHAM, accompanied by
Mr. EDWARD SANT.

an intimate relation. I know all the different masters and their work.

49,979. Do you find the work there done in a satisfactory manner?—I think so generally, certainly. Of course, there is a great deal in personality. Some men are better workers than others; but, speaking generally, I think the work is well done.

49,980. Before you became official solicitor had you much contact with the Chancery offices?—Yes; perhaps more even than now, personally.

49,981. Since that time the work of the Chancery Division has very considerably decreased?—Yes, in my judgment it has decreased considerably.

49,982. Judging by the statistics, it has decreased somewhere between one-third and one-half in the last 25 or 30 years?—Yes; and, judging also from what I know of practising solicitors, most solicitors will tell you that their Chancery business is not what it used to be 20 or 30 years ago.

49,983. There has not been a corresponding diminution in the number of masters or their staff?—There has not.

49,984. Do you consider that, as things stand at present, that office is somewhat overstaffed?—I feel great difficulty in answering that. I can speak of my own department, but I cannot speak with certainty with regard to theirs. I know one or two of the masters exceedingly well who think that they have a full day's work. I know others who think the reverse. I cannot help thinking that, having regard both to the statistics and to my knowledge of the changes in Chancery work that have taken place in the last 40 years, they are not fully occupied.

49,985. Have you much contact with the Registrars Office?—Yes. In 1907 I was on a committee, of which Mr. Justice Kekewich was chairman, which went into the whole organisation of that department. Then three out of the six members—I was one of them—were of opinion that that office should be merged in the Chancery Masters Office entirely; in other words, that all orders made by Chancery judges, and by masters in Chancery, should be drawn up in their own department.

49,986. Is there any insuperable difficulty in carrying out that change?—No. That was in accordance with the recommendations of a committee presided over by Lord Esher some 20 years before, and in accordance with a unanimous resolution of the Chancery judges in 1892; but in 1907 they had changed their minds, and said it would not do.

49,987. The Commission have before them the Report of the Committee of 1907, but that report does not indicate the considerations which made the judges change their opinion. It does not state why the judges thought it necessary that the registrars should remain on the present footing. Can you enlighten us on that point?—I cannot in the slightest. We on that committee unanimously came to the opinion that the sitting of a registrar in court every day was quite unnecessary. For instance, the Court of Appeal is dealing with a legal question, and legal arguments are put before them all day, and even when they are dealing with evidence they have no fresh evidence put in; they have merely to refer to the evidence in the Court below. Why a gentleman of that eminence should sit below the three judges to assist them, I cannot myself conceive. We recommended that a senior clerk should do the work. Then the same applies to Chancery judges when they are taking cases which are mere arguments by counsel.

49,988. (Lord Mersey.) Can you tell us what the work of the gentleman who sits below the three Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal is?—I am afraid I cannot say what he does.

49,989. I have seen him very often, and I do not know what he does?—I cannot conceive what they want him for, because he does not help them with the law. I was told that that was one of the objects in old days.

49,990. A magistrate's clerk sits below the magistrate and he helps the magistrate with his law, but I do not think the gentleman in the Court of Appeal helps the Court of Appeal very much with the law?—I should be sorry to suggest that his presence was necessary on that account. There is another point with regard to the Registrars Department, that if the judges who make the orders, and the masters who make the orders, cannot draw up their own orders, or cannot have a proper officer in their department who is capable of drawing up the orders, I confess I do not see why you should form an entirely fresh department to draw them up.

49,991. (Chairman.) It has been suggested to the Commission by some witnesses that the Chancery orders are of such a complicated and difficult nature in many cases that it is necessary to have a number of gentlemen of eminence and long experience in that particular work in order to draw them up; in fact, that this work is so difficult and complicated that it is impossible to combine it with any other functions. Is that your opinion?—No, I may say that it is a very common thing for a judge in Chancery, when an order is complicated, to direct counsel to draw the minutes. The result of it is that parties have to pay their two counsel fees for settling minutes, and the minutes are drawn up and settled between them, and they are sent to the registrar, and the registrar does what counsel has drawn for him. Then if there is any difficulty it goes back to the Court, and counsel are instructed upon the minutes and there is another fee, and they have to ask the judge what he meant. All this goes on at the expense of the suitor. I am bound to say that I think it ridiculous.

49,992. The result of the present system is that a great deal of the work has to be done twice over?—Yes.

49,993. The judge or the master becomes familiar with the facts in arriving at a decision, and then the registrar, or his clerk, has to familiarise himself with the facts in order to draw the order?—Yes.

49,994. That duplication of work would be saved if the master drew up his own order?—I think it is perfectly obvious. A great many orders are made by masters in chambers, and those orders, of course, they know all about. If the judge sits in chambers, as it is called, the master is with him once a week, and then he knows all about those orders. The only orders the master does not know anything about are those made by the judge in court, and those can be dealt with, and if necessary a senior clerk could sit in court and take whatever note is necessary. But it cannot be necessary for registrars to sit there to take a note of the judge's order. Moreover, they have the counsel's briefs. Counsel endorse their briefs with the order, and ought to endorse them quite sufficiently to enable the clerk to draw up the order.

49,995. You have, of course, some contact with the Taxing Office?—Yes.

49,996. Your bills, as between yourself and the client, are frequently taxed?—Always, because I act only for people who are under disability. Nobody can agree a bill of costs that I send in; they are all infants or lunatics, and they cannot agree, so all my bills of costs are taxed by the Taxing Office. Occasionally, when an infant comes of age or a lunatic dies, their representatives may agree the bill if they like.

49,997. Do you find that that office works in a thoroughly satisfactory manner?—I think it works very well. I certainly think that that is work specially suited to solicitors. I saw it suggested that solicitors would be lenient towards their brother professional men, but I am sure that is not the rule in the Taxing Office. I think they know—if I may use the expression—the tricks of the trade, and know when a bill is an honest bill and when it is not.

49,998. (Lord Mersey.) Surely there are no dishonest bills, are there?—It is a strong expression, perhaps, but I know perfectly well that there are people who can make out a bill which comes to a great deal more money than they have earned—there are such people.

49,999. Are there?—Yes, I think so. At any rate it is necessary to have people to see to it. There are smugglers, and they are prevented from smuggling by the fact that you have your coastguards.

50,000. (Mr. Shipley.) Your office is in the Law Courts?—Yes.

50,001. Are the rooms well ventilated and well cared for?—Very well indeed. My predecessor was on the committee which appropriated the rooms, and I think he chose some of the best for himself.

50,002. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) There are others which are not so well ventilated?—I do not think any of them are overcrowded at all, so far as I know. The only place where I saw rooms overcrowded was the Public Trustee's Office. I was on a committee to deal with his department, but I believe he is moving into more palatial premises.

50,003. (Sir John Kempe.) The lump sum arrangement made by the Treasury is the same with you as with other solicitors of Government departments, but I understand you to say that you are on rather a different footing, because your arrangement is made with a view to your being a practising solicitor concerned with the actual earning of costs?—I am practising as a solicitor outside the building nominally, but practically not. My business in the Law Courts is, of course, different in this respect, that clients are sent to me by the Court, or I am appointed to represent clients—infants and lunatics—and then I am paid proper costs out of their estates.

50,004. Do you mean you really are on exactly the same footing now as other solicitors of departments in respect of the lump-sum clerks?—Yes. I have a lump sum fixed by the Treasury. That is a thing which I objected to in the first instance.

50,005. Of course that system was instituted by the Treasury with the direct object of enabling the solicitors to place their offices more or less on the same footing as a large private solicitor's office, and to get all the advantages of being able to dismiss their men, and enlarge or reduce their staff as the work altered?—Yes.

50,006. Is not that of importance? Have not you found that useful?—My experience has been that I have never dismissed a clerk and never had any difficulty. If they had been on the establishment things would have gone on just the same, only I should not have lost some very good men.

50,007. Your work does not fluctuate; you have not to reduce your office one year and increase it another? No; I do not think many solicitors' offices are of that kind; they are either growing or diminishing.

50,008. A private solicitor's office would, I suppose have to be altered like that to suit circumstances?—In my own private office we have never had occasion to vary; our clerks were all permanent clerks. It was the rarest thing to dismiss a clerk or to change one.

50,009. How do the clerks you appoint compare with the other clerks in the Law Courts? Are they the same class of men, or do you find they are better because you have chosen them yourself?—I do not say they are better because I chose them, but I think they are better because I have trained them. I mean the work that they do in my office is of a very varied kind. There is nothing in the way of mechanical work in my office; there is no copying; that goes outside. There is nothing of the really mechanical kind. Every clerk almost from the first has a certain amount of responsibility. The clerk I have been mentioning more than once has to prepare accounts to be passed by the masters in Chancery and the masters in Lunacy. He has to settle the bills of costs; he has to attend appointments, and has to draft affidavits and settle them, and that sort of work. The result is that the experience they get in that way makes them exceedingly useful for appointments in the building.

50,010. But you have no difficulty in training them. What class of men do you draw them from—solicitors' clerks?—Yes. I should say that, except those who are professional men, they are taken from the sons of working men or tradesmen.

50,011. They are not trained up in legal qualifications in any way?—No. If I select the younger men, they are not. I have had one or two who have been a few years in a solicitor's office, but I like to train them from the first if I possibly can.

50,012. You have found no difficulty in the training of a man from outside who has not been in a solicitor's office?—No, but not for the higher posts.

50,013. But they grow to the higher posts?—It depends. I have got two solicitors of good standing, both of them University men, who are doing my principal work, and Mr. Toone, who is rather an exceptional clerk, who is not a solicitor.

50,014. You say you would wish to retain to yourself the selection of clerks. Supposing your clerks were established, you would still wish to retain a voice in the selection of them?—Certainly.

50,015. Why should your office be different from other public offices in that respect? Other public offices find that they can get the right men without selecting them themselves?—I do not think legal departments do. I read only last night the evidence of the solicitor to the Treasury given before this Commission, and I agree with every word he said. I think his evidence was very much to the point. I think in solicitors' departments you do want men who, at any rate, if not of your own selection, are men you have a considerable voice in the selection of.

50,016. (Miss Haldane.) I was very much interested in your account of the miscellaneous character of your duties. Do you personally visit the prisons or do you have to have a staff which does that?—I visit the prisons myself, and I visit the lunatics myself, though at times I employ others. I employ a medical man, and ladies sometimes, to visit.

50,017. Do you employ women at all?—Yes, sometimes.

50,018. Whom do you employ? Are they persons whom you select personally?—Yes, I sometimes select a lady relative whom I know well. I need not mention names, but I have a case at Norwich that I have to see, and I ask a lady there, the wife of a solicitor, who is a very well known man, to visit in that case and report to me.

50,019. But that is privately?—Officially, I pay her a fee.

50,020. You simply select somebody you are acquainted with personally. You do not require any particular qualifications?—No.

50,021. Excepting that you think he or she is qualified?—I know the patient and I know the lady I ask to visit.

50,022. What sort of fee is paid for this work?—It depends whether they have to travel or not. If they are in the same town I would pay them a guinea or two guineas, as the case might be, for the visit and the report.

50,023. They would visit the individuals in prison?—I am speaking now of lunatics. Those in prison I have to visit myself.

50,024. You do not delegate that duty to anybody?—No.

50,025. Even in the case of female prisoners it is just the same?—Yes; but I am thankful to say that I have very few female prisoners. It is contempt of court cases that I visit, and I have not had a female prisoner to visit now for a long time.

50,026. Supposing they were overlooked in any way, would they remain in prison?—There is a little danger. One of the judges once summoned me to his room very suddenly and said he had committed to prison at Gloucester, six weeks before, somebody for contempt, and he had forgotten all about it and he asked me what had happened. I was able to tell him that every governor in the country makes me a report the moment he gets a prisoner for contempt, and I keep a register, and look through it at intervals, and if I find that somebody has been there any length of time, and I do not know anything about the case, I communicate with the governor or with the solicitor, or sometimes with the judge.

50,027. But supposing if, by any mischance, you also forgot about a case, would the individual go on being in prison for ever until you happened to remember about it?—I am afraid that would be so, and that is the object of my keeping a record. The Lord Chancellor has a notice also which he sends on to me. But there is no chance of an oversight if a proper register is kept. The difference is that most people are committed for a term; but if a person is committed for contempt of court

Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD WINTERBOTHAM, accompanied by
Mr. EDWARD SANT.

it is for an indefinite term, and unless there is somebody to look after him he might be overlooked.

50,028. And it all rests on your office, or on you yourself, in fact?—Yes. A governor of a prison would, no doubt, report sooner or later; but I think those prisoners are to some extent dependent upon my care.

50,029. Is not there now a certain amount of indefinite imprisonment of another kind—cases sent to prison for indefinite terms. It is done in America a good deal?—There are no prisoners for indefinite terms except for contempt, as far as I know. There are some imprisonments by the Inland Revenue for non-payment of taxes, but those I have nothing to do with.

50,030. Then you have a good deal of travelling, because you go to prisons in the north of England sometimes?—I visit persons of unsound mind all over the country.

50,031. And also prisons?—I have to occasionally; but if one was in Newcastle he would be reported to me by the governor, and I should usually deal with it by correspondence. I have only regular visits to pay to what are called the King's prisons; that is, Brixton and Holloway. I visit those regularly. If a case is reported to me and the person wants assistance, I either employ an agent on the spot, or send Mr. Toone down to make the necessary enquiries.

50,032. When you say you visit regularly, how often do you visit?—I have to visit each of those prisons in London four times a year.

50,033. (Mr. Clynes.) You have spoken of the refusal of the Treasury to meet your wishes on any of these occasions. Could you say whether their reasons are known. Did they state them to you?—I think they say: "If you are on this lump-sum system we cannot give you anything more." I have tried to arrange that I should pay out of the profits, but they objected to that. There has been only one case of actual retirement where I have wanted it, but they have written me about Mr. Toone's case and told me that they would not allow any payment to him.

50,034. Have these matters ever been the subject of parliamentary discussion?—No, I do not think so.

50,035. (Mr. Coward.) The Chairman asked you about some of the different branches of the legal departments, but he did not ask you whether you had any experience of the Probate Registry. I do not know whether you can say anything about that. They have in the Probate Registry about 125 clerks. Can you tell us anything at all about the Probate Registry—whether the work is well done, or whether there might be any reconstitution, or anything of that kind?—I am afraid I should not be able to answer that question effectively. I know less of the Probate work than I do of other departments.

50,036. In your own office—whether in your official solicitor's office or your private office—is it your practice to increase the salaries of your clerks irrespective of merit?—We have a list every year, and the partners go carefully through it, and we should increase the salaries unless we had some special reason for not doing it. We should not do it if the clerk had not been satisfactory.

50,037. Then I suppose you would not increase them by very much when doing that?—No; 5*l.*, 10*l.*, or 15*l.* increase per year as the case may be.

50,038. What are your office hours?—They are a great deal longer than they are in the courts generally. We begin at 10 and are supposed to close at 6, but I very rarely leave at 6, and my staff, I am sorry to say, sometimes stay a good deal later than that.

50,039. And in the Long Vacation?—Our office is always open all the vacation, but of course the staff have to take their holidays during that time.

50,040. What holidays do they get?—A month for the seniors, and three weeks and two weeks for the juniors—it is not quite enough.

50,041. And the short vacations?—They would not get more than a day or two except for exceptional reasons.

50,042. You were asked whether you were in the habit of getting junior clerks from other solicitors' offices. The fact is you are a solicitor, and you train your clerks?—That is so; I prefer to train them.

50,043. You bring them up, I suppose, in the way they should go?—I try to.

50,044. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) In the representation from your clerks, the following sentence occurs: "Should any radical change be made in the department (and this has been threatened on two recent occasions) it is difficult to assume that posts would be actually created to find employment for the staff." Do you know what those two different occasions are to which they refer?—I think one was my intended retirement. The difficulty is this: If I retired and a new solicitor was appointed he might bring his own staff there and tell all the present clerks to go. He would not be so foolish, I hope, but they have no certainty. When I was appointed they did not know whether I was going to bring my staff or whether I should adopt them.

50,045. Do you know what the other occasion was when such a radical change was threatened?—You must ask my manager, but I rather think it was in regard to the fact that there was a suggestion by the Lunacy Department that they should not only adjudicate on the lunatics, but attend to everything and do the whole thing themselves. (Mr. Sant.) I think the two occasions that we had in mind were these: There was a suggestion at one time that the Public Trustee should be eligible to be appointed receiver of lunatics' estates, which I do not think at the present moment he is. That would have taken perhaps three-quarters of the work out of the official solicitor's department. The other occasion, I think, was when a suggestion was made that in the Lunacy Office there should be a sort of official committee, appointed by the Masters in Lunacy, who would apparently form part of the masters' staff and manage the smaller lunacy cases; and that again would of course seriously affect the work done in our department and entail a reduced staff.

50,046. (To Mr. Winterbotham.) You were asked about the Chancery registrars, and from your opinion I gather that the work done by the registrars now could be done as part of their ordinary duties by other persons in other offices?—Yes.

50,047. That is to say, the Chancery registrar is the fifth wheel upon the coach?—Yes.

50,048. And is frankly no use to the public?—I do not say they are of no use, because they do some very valuable work, but I think it would be much better done as part of the work of the Chancery masters.

50,049. You are aware that the salaries in the Chancery Registry amount to more than 20,000*l.* a year?—They would have been 10,000*l.* more if it had not been for our committee in 1907. They have reduced the number from 12 to 8.

50,050. But it remains at an expense of more than 20,000*l.* a year?—It is a very expensive department. I may mention that in the Lunacy Department they draw up all their own orders.

50,051. (Mr. Boutwood.) You spoke about the establishment of your own clerks, but have you thought out in detail how that will apply to the existing men? For instance, with regard to their claim for pension, what would be your views as to their back years?—I think that the claims of these men who have been for many years practically in the service of the State, should be duly considered. They have been doing all through these years the work that other people have been earning a pension in respect of, and I think they ought to be dealt with accordingly. Take the case I mentioned. This gentleman, as I say, has been doing important work for 41 years; he has been entirely in the service of the State, and, I think, that ought to be reckoned to him.

50,052. Do you mean that the whole of his 41 years should count towards a pension or only part of them?—I think 40 is the total that will count. Certainly, in his case, I think it should. I think it requires to be applied with proper care. He is the only one at the present moment who would be retired naturally on the ground of age.

17 March 1915.]

Mr. WILLIAM HOWARD WINTERBOTHAM, accompanied by
Mr. EDWARD SANT.

50,053. Speaking generally, you think if establishment takes place, past years should count approximating to the full number of years for pension?—I think so, but it might be that only part should count. You are making a change, and you are giving them something to which they are not entitled at the moment.

50,054. I wanted to get what your view was on the point?—If it is just, I think it ought to be done, but if you are giving a man something you have withheld from him for many years, he might be very glad to take half.

50,055. As a matter of fact, what do you think is just?—I think such men as I have mentioned ought to receive the same amount as they would if justice had been done to them in the first instance.

50,056. As if they had been on the establishment all the time?—Yes, but, as I say, a smaller measure of generosity would no doubt meet the case.

Mr. EDWARD SANT, called and examined.

50,057. (Chairman.) The Commission have before them the representation from the staff of the official solicitor, and some points in it have been dealt with already in the course of Mr. Winterbotham's evidence. Are there any other points you wish to mention specially to the Commission in connection with it?—I do not know that I have very much to add to what appears in the petition, but I might draw attention to, and emphasise one point, if I may. In the Commissioners' fourth report, on page 52, there occurs this passage, with reference to the staffs of solicitors' offices not on the establishment: "The work of these men " is permanent and their service is continuous. " They lose touch with their profession as their " specialised experience increases, and they have no " certain prospects, security of tenure, or pension " rights, while they work in intimate connection with " officers who admittedly often perform less important " duties, and who do not suffer from these disabilities." All the staff of the Official Solicitor's Department are in continual and intimate association with officials, who certainly do not do more important work, and who, almost without exception, are paid higher salaries, have shorter hours of employment, have longer vacations, and have security of tenure with pensions at the end of their terms of service. That naturally gives rise to a feeling of soreness amongst us all, I think, and perhaps encourages a feeling of discontent, which does not, I submit, make for efficiency in any office or department.

50,058. The point you wish to bring out is, that the paragraph of the Commission's previous report which you quoted is specially applicable to your department?—Yes, peculiarly applicable to our department. I think I have nothing else to add.

50,059. (Mr. Boutwood.) I do not know whether you know that the Public Trustee's Department is now in process of establishment?—I have heard so.

50,060. Do you know the details of it?—No, I do not.

50,061. I was going to ask you whether that sort of establishment would meet your view of the case?—I am afraid I am not sufficiently familiar with it to answer your question.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SECOND DAY.

Thursday, 18th March 1915.

PRESENT:

;(Sir HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.
Mr. CECIL COWARD.

Mr. PERCY EWING MATHESON.
Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT (Managing Clerk to Messrs. Chester, Broome and Griffithes), called and examined.

50,062. (Chairman.) You are a managing clerk to Messrs. Chester, Broome and Griffithes?—That is so.

50,063. How long have you been with them in that position?—Thirty-three years.

50,064. Thirty-three years altogether or as managing clerk?—Thirty-three years altogether—31 years as managing clerk.

50,065. With which branches of the court is your work chiefly concerned?—Chiefly with the Chancery Division, Companies (Winding-up), and at first Lunacy, and during the last two years Lunacy. There was an intervening period when Lunacy was done by another department, and I have now taken that over again.

50,066. What kind of business comes to your firm?—It is a mixed business of agency and proper. Agency work is work sent to us by country solicitors, and there is also work where we are properly concerned.

50,067. You have a considerable amount of agency business?—Of both.

50,068?—Will you tell us, from your experience of the departments of the court, what you consider the most suitable source from which to draw the staff for those departments?—My view is that for the staff appointments, such as the first and second class clerks, the most suitable men are to be found in solicitors' offices who have had a good legal training.

50,069. Do you apply that also to clerks of the third class?—I think it would be better.

50,070. In your dealings with the offices do you mainly come in contact with the clerks of the higher classes?—With the higher classes. My junior would come in contact with the third class clerks more than I should.

50,071. But in the past, when you yourself were a junior, you frequently came in contact with the third class clerks?—Yes, I did.

50,072. Do you consider the work is well done on the whole?—I do.

50,073. The staff are competent for the work which they have to perform?—I think so.

50,074. But you suggest that for the whole of the staff—first, second, and third class—previous experience in a solicitor's office is desirable?—In my view that is so. I am very clear about that.

18 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

50,075. Do you think that the clerks of the third class cannot learn their work satisfactorily in the office itself?—In my view they cannot. You want years of experience. There is so much detail which is only acquired by long experience. A man who has been preparing cases for use in chambers is, in my view, the better man to deal with them in an official form.

50,076. Are you speaking specially now of the Chancery and Lunacy offices, or do you apply that to the offices of the Court as a whole?—I am only speaking as regards the Chancery, the Companies (Winding-up) and the Lunacy. I am not very well versed in the King's Bench practice, as I have had so very little to do with that.

50,077. If a man goes into one of those offices from outside without previous legal experience, do you think he will never learn the work properly at all, or merely that it will take him longer to learn it without previous experience?—I would not say that he would not learn the work. A man of average ability would, but it would take time, and he would never be so efficient as a man who had had a legal training such as I have spoken of.

50,078. You think, even when he had learnt the work, he would be less competent than the man who had had previous experience?—I do.

50,079. Is that because of the actual knowledge he would have obtained outside, or the mental training and the attitude of mind that he would have acquired?—I should say it is due to both. The actual knowledge he would have acquired outside in all its detail—the drafting of affidavits to answer inquiries, the attendance before the master, proceeding thereon, and all that, is knowledge which must be acquired by actual practice. It is not a thing which a man who is taken straight into the office could learn by observation.

50,080. But he would be constantly dealing with those documents in the office?—I admit he would, and to that extent he would get a great deal of knowledge; but in my view he would never be so efficient as a man who had had legal training in a solicitor's office.

50,081. Would he not acquire all that which was necessary for him to know from the office point of view?—I should not like to say no to that, but I should think it very doubtful.

50,082. At any rate you consider that he would be the more efficient man ultimately if he had had this outside experience?—Certainly.

50,083. As regards the method of recruiting the offices, as you are aware probably. The present system, generally speaking, except in the Registrars Office, is to recruit for the third class and then to fill the higher classes by promotion from the third class?—That is so.

50,084. Do you consider that that is the right system, or do you consider it better to make appointments direct, say, to the second class?—Direct, I think.

50,085. In all cases?—Yes.

50,086. The result of that would be to have a third class which was not habitually promoted, and which would remain third class all its official life?—Yes, that would be the result.

50,087. Do you consider that that would be the best arrangement?—I certainly do.

50,088. Taking the present scale of pay for the third class, which is 100*l.* rising by annual increments to 200*l.*, do you think you would get men of sufficiently good quality for the work of that class if they had no prospect of promotion beyond that?—You would not get a man from a solicitor's office who was qualified to take a second or first class clerkship, and that seems to me the difficulty.

50,089. But you think you would get a man who is quite sufficiently qualified for the work of the third class?—Certainly.

50,090. And who would be content all his life to remain in the third class?—I should not say that. Everybody is ambitious, and no doubt he would want to get promotion. That is only natural; but at the present rate of remuneration you would not secure a qualified man from a solicitor's office who had been holding the position of a managing clerk to go into the courts at 100*l.* a year.

50,091. Do you not, as a matter of fact, at present get some men of that class entering in consideration of the future prospects?—I should think it is very probable you do.

50,092. But if there were no prospects of rising beyond 200*l.* you would not get those men?—I should say no.

50,093. Nevertheless, you think they would be sufficiently good for the work of the third class?—I think you would find men who would be quite qualified to carry out the duties of a third class clerk.

50,094. The duties being of a routine and clerical character not involving the exercise of much discretion?—Quite so—issuing summonses; giving appointments.

50,095. Filing affidavits, and so forth?—Yes, and filing certificates; sending papers to the judge.

50,096. Do you think that the prospect of discontent in that class is a serious drawback to that system of recruitment?—It is a rather difficult question. What I would suggest would be that he would be a junior clerk, and on the same footing as I understand you have junior clerks now in the Civil Service—that he gets to a certain position and there he stops, and he has to go to something else by means of examination, or something of that sort. I do not think you would get a man to take a third class clerkship who would be qualified in other respects for a first or second class clerkship, because he could not afford the drop in his income.

50,097. Could not you get a man young who has the personal and intellectual qualifications that would enable him to become an efficient clerk of a higher grade later, but who has not yet reached a point where his salary has increased much beyond 100*l.* a year?—You would catch a man of that sort.

50,098. So you might catch a man—as, indeed, I think you do at present—who has the necessary qualities, but who has not very long experience?—That is so.

50,099. As regards recruiting for the second and first class, you suggest appointment direct to the second class, and subsequent promotion, I suppose, from the second to the first class?—Certainly.

50,100. Do you consider that the class of solicitors' managing clerks would be the suitable field from which to draw candidates for these appointments?—I think so. It is a very good field, and, I think, they would supply all the wants, and I do not think you could improve on that.

50,101. At what age would you suggest their appointment to that class?—I should think at 30.

50,102. At 30 you will get a man with, I suppose, 13 or 14 years' experience in a solicitor's office?—At least 10 years' experience.

50,103. At what age do clerks generally enter solicitors' offices now?—I should say at about 15.

50,104. For the first few years are they doing work of a mechanical character?—Yes, junior work, postage work, and delivering papers to counsel, and so on.

50,105. (Mr. Coward.) Copying letters?—Yes.

50,106. (Chairman.) At what age do they begin to do work requiring intelligence?—I have had very intelligent boys with me beginning at 16.

50,107. What is the earliest age at which a man would become a managing clerk?—That depends very much upon the man himself. I have known managing clerks at 19 and 20.

50,108. What do you suggest would be the best method of selection of the persons whom we are considering for appointment to the second class?—I do not know with whom the appointment rests, but if it rested with a judge of the Chancery Division I should think he would be able to make a selection. From what I know of the judges they would have no difficulty.

50,109. At present the appointments in the Chancery offices rest, generally speaking, with the Lord Chancellor?—The Lord Chancellor does not come in contact with the clerks like the judges of the Chancery Division do. They come more into personal contact with the clerks than the Lord Chancellor or his

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

secretary do, and are able to form some opinion of a man's ability.

50,110. Do you suggest any examination test, either competitive or qualifying?—I do not think that is necessary.

50,111. (Lord Mersey.) No examination is necessary?—I do not think so.

50,112. (Chairman.) You think the qualifications can be sufficiently tested by information obtainable apart from examination?—Certainly. If the judge had any difficulty his master would be able to help him.

50,113. Have you known in the past clerks appointed to the higher classes direct?—I am trying to recall a case. I am not quite sure whether Mr. Naylor was appointed direct to a first class clerkship. I knew him personally.

50,114. Was he in a solicitor's office before that?—Yes, he was in the same office as I am in now. He was my predecessor, and was there many years.

50,115. You suggest that appointments should be made to the second class, and that the first class should be filled by promotion from the second class. What do you think the right principle on which that promotion should be conducted?—As the distribution of business at present stands a master has a first class clerk and a second class clerk, and I think that the second class clerk should step into the shoes of the first class.

50,116. Among the second class clerks there will be men of very different degrees of merit and ability?—Quite so.

50,117. Is it not important that the best men should be selected for appointment to the first class posts?—I am afraid that would lead to very great difficulty, and I do not know whether it would become workable.

50,118. In your own office do you or your principals select men by seniority for appointment as managing clerks?—In my own office the answer would be that they go up by seniority, because when unfortunately we have lost a managing clerk his second man has taken his place.

50,119. At what age did you become a managing clerk?—I think I was just about 20.

50,120. Were you selected by seniority?—Mine was a new post opened.

50,121. The appointment to that new post was not made by selecting the senior man in the office at the time?—No, it was not. My appointment came about in this way: the Chancery work at Messrs. Chester and Co.'s office was done in one room, and it was found that there was too much for one room to conveniently deal with, and thereupon Mr. Broome opened another room. I was the leading junior clerk in the first room and I was appointed managing clerk in the second room.

50,122. Were you the senior of those who were not managing clerks?—Yes.

50,123. At the age of 20?—Yes.

50,124. (Lord Mersey.) Do you remember Mr. Jennings?—Yes, I had him in mind when answering the Chairman's question.

50,125. Unfortunately he died many years ago. Did his junior, the man immediately below him, succeed him?—He did.

50,126. What was his name?—Mr. Schofield.

50,127. Is he there still?—He is there still.

50,128. Mr. Schofield is a man of very great ability, as Mr. Jennings was?—I think so.

50,129. And therefore he may have been selected because of his ability?—I have no doubt that if he had not been an able man he would not have got the appointment. That goes without saying.

50,130. (Chairman.) Speaking generally, in solicitors' offices, do you think the important posts are filled by seniority?—I think they are.

50,131. That does not entirely agree with statements that we have already had in evidence?—It may not, but I am looking back now at a firm like Bell, Brodrick, and Gray. I remember their managing Chancery clerk was a gentleman named Jewitt, who was there for years and years. His junior clerk, when Mr. Jewitt retired, took his position, and I have known that happen in many large offices.

50,132. (Mr. Coward.) Is it not for another reason, that you train up the junior with that object, and if he did not come on well as a junior you would get rid of him?—That is it.

50,133. (Chairman.) In fact it is really selection, but the selection takes place at an earlier point; it is the selection of the man who is second in command?—Quite so, and as Mr. Coward put it to me, he would not be second in command if he had not got the ability. He is gradually coming along.

50,134. But your suggestion as regards the legal offices, if I understand you rightly, is that promotion should be by seniority irrespective of ability?—May I answer that in this way: If a man is sufficiently able to discharge the duties of a second class clerk, which are very little different from the duties of a first class clerk, he is quite competent to become a first class clerk.

50,135. Is not that assuming that all of them are equally competent to discharge the duties of a first class clerk?—Yes, I suppose it is.

50,136. Is that likely to be the case?—I should say so.

50,137. That they are all equally fitted to discharge the duties of a first class clerk?—I think so.

50,138. (Mr. Coward.) You may get a man who is a disappointing man, and who when you have selected him is not good, and you would like to chasser him, and certainly you would not like to promote him?—Yes.

50,139. (Chairman.) Does not that ever occur?—I have no doubt it has occurred.

50,140. And it might occur in future?—I think it probably would.

50,141. In that case, would you promote him nevertheless?—There are lots of disappointments; when you put a man into an official position, he may be very good in his non-official position, but when he gets to the official position he is sometimes a failure.

50,142. Would you nevertheless promote him when he has reached a place of seniority?—Certainly not, I should not promote him.

50,143. So that you do not carry your views so far as to say that it should be solely and entirely by seniority?—No. I think you must have regard to the ability of a man to judge whether he is fit for promotion, and those above him would have to exercise that discretion.

50,144. Turning now to the question of the arrangement of the business in the offices, do you find that it is satisfactory?—I do not think it is.

50,145. Will you tell us the points on which you find it unsatisfactory?—As the business is at present conducted, we have masters, taxing masters, and registrars of the Chancery Division. I think the business would be better conducted if they were all amalgamated, that is to say, you would have more masters, but you would not want so many as you have got now collectively. I think there are some twelve masters, nine registrars, and eleven taxing masters, including Master Macnamara, who is on the Railway Commission, but who is also a taxing master. You would not want the whole of those gentlemen if you had a system by which the master who took the initiation of the business—that is, beginning with the writ and summons for directions—followed it to a conclusion.

50,146. That is the system at present in force in the Bankruptcy Department?—In the Companies (Winding-up).

50,147. Do you find that it works satisfactorily there?—I think it works very well there.

50,148. Taking first the question of taxation, I understand that the principal reason which brought about the creation of a Central Taxing Office was that it was found that when the taxing was done in the different offices considerable divergences of standard and practice arose, with the result that certain portions of the Court were preferred on account of their greater leniency in taxation, and that those inequalities and divergences were intended to be removed, and were successfully removed by the creation of the Central Taxing Office?—Yes.

50,149. Do you attach importance to those considerations?—No, I cannot say that I do.

18 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

50,150. Do not you think that if the taxing offices were separated again and attached to the different divisions, similar inequalities might arise?—I do not think so. According to my view, if you have sufficient staff by way of masters and clerks to conduct the business from A to Z—that is everything, the taxing, the drawing of orders, and carrying the whole matter through—you get rid of the inconvenience of an order being made by one master and drawn up by a registrar.

50,151. I will come to the registrars directly. I was dealing for the moment with the taxation question?—Almost the same principle applies to taxation. You get an order made for taxation of costs which have involved probably an enormous amount of work before a master in all its details. Then you go to the taxing master, who is entirely fresh to the whole thing; he has to gain his knowledge from a perusal of the papers. My view is, that the work would be much better done if the master who has done the business also taxed the costs.

50,152. Do you find, apart from the question of duplication of work, that the work is not satisfactorily done at present in the Taxing Office?—I think it is satisfactorily done.

50,153. Do you find practical inconvenience from the duplication of the work?—I think there is some inconvenience, certainly.

50,154. In the way of delay or additional attendances in the Court?—In the way of unnecessary waste of time.

50,155. (Mr. Coward.) Of judicial time?—Of judicial time.

50,156. (Chairman.) In a taxation, in the first place the bill has to be scrutinised and checked as to the items?—Yes.

50,157. That would have to be done whether the work was done in the master's office or in the taxing master's office?—I quite agree.

50,158. Then you come to the important items which are matters of discretion?—Yes, questions of principle.

50,159. Is it your point there that the taxing master has to go into the documents in the case in a way that would not be necessary for the master who has dealt with the case to go into them?—That is my personal view, certainly.

50,160. Does that going into the documents mean a prolonged investigation of the details of the case?—Sometimes; and long arguments.

50,161. Would those arguments be entirely avoided if the taxing was done by the master, although the master might be familiar with the case?—I would not say entirely avoided, but very much minimised.

50,162. On the other hand, might not delays be caused by the fact that the master who had to tax a case had a good deal of other business to attend to, because taxing was not his only function?—You would have more masters, so that there would be a more equal distribution of the work.

50,163. Do you consider that by increasing the number of masters you could avoid any occasion for delay of that kind?—I think so, certainly.

50,164. And you do not consider that inequalities of practice would arise?—I do not think so.

50,165. How would you avoid them. They were found to arise in the past?—Of course, there would have to be special arrangements made. Probably there would have to be still maintained a taxing master, or taxing masters, for dealing with what I should call exclusive business, such as under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and under the Solicitors Act, probably.

50,166. That is to say, taxations not arising out of litigation?—Yes. That probably might have to be looked into and provided for.

50,167. But would that serve to keep the standard uniform as regards the contentious taxation?—I think so.

50,168. (Lord Mersey.) How?—Because you would separate the two.

50,169. That has nothing to do with it. How would you avoid the possible inequalities? The fact that you had a special man to tax bills under the Lands Clauses

Act, or whatever it may be, could not avoid inequalities in the taxation of the litigious bills?—I do not quite follow your lordship's reasoning.

50,170. (Chairman.) The point is this: In the old times when the taxation of each division was done by officers in that division, it was found that considerable inequalities arose between the practice in the different parts of the court. Those inequalities have been removed by placing the taxation on a body of masters who do that work for the whole of the courts, with certain exceptions, and who take it in rotation?—Yes.

50,171. If you restored the old system of taxation in the different divisions of the Court, you would then have the taxing done by a number of persons who do not form one body, and do not rotate on the work; and prima facie it would appear that the same tendency to inequality of practice between different parts of the Court would arise. How do you suggest that that tendency would be counteracted or avoided?—As I understand the question you differentiate between the King's Bench and the Chancery Division.

50,172. And also between the different groups in the Chancery Division?—That is the Companies (Wind-ing-up) and Lunacy.

50,173. And also between the three groups, each of which has a group of masters attached to it?—I cannot see that there would be any inequality.

50,174. Taking the Chancery Division alone you have the three groups of linked judges. Each of those groups has four masters attached to it. The four masters attached to the first group would do the whole of the taxation in that group, and the four masters attached to the second group would do the whole of the taxation in that group. How would you secure that the first group of masters and the second group of masters should apply the same standards and methods of taxation?—I cannot say that they would, any more than the same methods are applied now where you have the 11 taxing masters.

50,175. The 11 taxing masters take the work in rotation and not according to the group of judges. They also have frequent meetings for comparison and discussion of methods; but the complete rotation is the principal means of securing absolute equality?—That is in the distribution of the work.

50,176. Taxing master A does not take the whole of the work coming from the first group of Chancery judges or solely Chancery work, but takes the work in rotation as it comes, and in that way you secure equality of treatment both between King's Bench and Chancery work, and also between the different groups in Chancery?—Yes.

50,177. If you sub-divided the work again I do not see what security you have that the inequalities which were found in the past would not arise again?—I am afraid I cannot offer any further opinion upon that. It seems to me that if the costs are taxed by the masters of the judges, there would not, in my view, be any inequality, although there is no rotation of work.

50,178. (Lord Mersey.) Is it not a fact that in days gone by solicitors liked particular courts in which to practise because they knew that their costs would be favourably taxed?—I know that in days gone by solicitors liked to get their cases in the Chancery Division before particular judges.

50,179. Why?—For the better dispatch of business and—

50,180. I am waiting for what comes after the "and"?—It did not affect the remuneration.

50,181. Did it affect the taxation?—Not at all, in my opinion.

50,182. Are you sure?—Yes.

50,183. Were not there some masters who were more indulgent towards solicitors than others?—I suppose that is natural. I think there were, and I suppose there are now.

50,184. (Chairman.) Passing now to the question of the registrars, you suggest that similar inconvenience arises in their case from the fact that an order is drawn up in a different office from that in which the case has been dealt with up to that point?—Yes.

18 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

50,185. Do you find practical inconvenience arising from that?—Yes. There is a lot of explanation required that otherwise would not be necessary.

50,186. In dealing with the Registrars Office, you have an appointment with a registrar for settling an order?—Yes.

50,187. Do you habitually attend those appointments, or does your principal attend them?—My junior clerk generally attends, but if there is anything of a complicated order I attend myself.

50,188. When your junior clerk attends, does he see the registrar or one of the registrar's clerks?—He would sometimes see the registrar and sometimes the order is settled by the clerk, or the draft order is altered in pencil and signed by the respective solicitors, and then goes before the registrar for his approval.

50,189. Do you find that inconvenience arises from the fact that the case has to be explained and gone into afresh by a fresh set of officers?—That is my view.

50,190. It has been suggested to us by some witnesses that the Chancery orders are of so difficult and complicated a nature that it is absolutely necessary to have officers who devote themselves entirely to the work of drawing them up. Do you think that that is so?—I do not entirely agree with that. I agree that some of the orders are very complicated, and must be settled before an official who is able to deal with them, such as a registrar or a master.

50,191. (Mr. Coward.) Who settles the minutes in the first place in those cases?—When the papers are left in the registrar's office, the registrar's principal clerk pencils out the order.

50,192. Are not the minutes in those cases usually prepared by counsel?—In complicated cases, yes.

50,193. (Chairman.) When minutes have been prepared by counsel, does the form of the order follow the minutes closely?—Very closely. There is hardly any departure from it except to put in the evidence.

50,194. When minutes are drawn, are there often modifications of form in order to comply with the pay office regulations or other rules?—Yes, that frequently happens.

50,195. It is the business of the registrar and his officers to look after points like that?—Certainly.

50,196. Are those points so difficult and technical that a master who is doing the general work of his office at the same time would be unable to deal with them?—I think not.

50,197. You think he would be able to deal with them?—I think he would.

50,198. You think there would be considerable advantage in the dispatch of business in having that part of the work dealt with by the same persons as have dealt with the proceedings in the case up to that point?—Certainly.

50,199. Do you see any advantages in the present separate offices which would be lost if they were amalgamated?—I think there would be advantage in amalgamating the registrars with the masters—a distinct advantage.

50,200. And nothing important lost by amalgamation?—I think not.

50,201. The registrars at present attend in court in a good many cases?—They do.

50,202. Do you think that necessary?—I do not.

50,203. What do they do in court?—They call the case on the list; they administer the oath to witnesses; they note any documents that are put in evidence, and they mark exhibits and documents put to the witnesses.

50,204. All that is work that could be done by a less eminent person than a registrar?—I think so.

50,205. Are they also consulted on questions of procedure by the Court?—Frequently.

50,206. Could that part of the work be done by one of their clerks?—I think so. If you take the Companies (Winding-up), the registrar when the office was first instituted sat in court with the judge—that is my recollection—but when Mr. Registrar Hood was appointed he ceased that practice, and the registrar has never sat in court with the judge since.

50,207. Has any practical inconvenience resulted?—I think not.

50,208. In any case, if it was necessary to consult a registrar on a point of procedure, he could be sent for?—Certainly, as a master is sent for now sometimes by a judge. I do not know whether it will help the Commission, but I may say that recently under the Trading with the Enemy Act it has been found convenient that all the business should be conducted before Mr. Justice Warrington. When the Act was first put in force all the Chancery judges dealt with cases under the Trading with the Enemy Act, but now there has been a direction by which Mr. Justice Warrington deals with them.

50,209. Does that affect the manner in which the work is dealt with in the office?—No.

50,210. The taxation is done in the Central Taxing Office, and the orders are drawn up in the Registrars Office?—Quite so.

50,211. So it does not bear directly on the point before us?—No, except that it brings about uniformity.

50,212. (Mr. Coward.) That is why it was directed. Cases which stood before other judges have been transferred for that reason?—Yes.

50,213. (Chairman.) That is a case of new business, raising new questions, where it was convenient for the sake of uniformity that they should be dealt with by one judge?—Quite so.

50,214. Have you any observations to make on the Companies (Winding-up) Department?—The only observation I wish to make on the Companies (Winding-up) Department is, that it seems to me to work very well indeed. I have had experience of it since its inception, and I think it works very well.

50,215. That being a new department has, perhaps, been less bound by rules and methods than the other departments which have been long in existence?—There may be something in that.

50,216. It has had perhaps rather a freer hand for framing its own procedure?—Yes.

50,217. Is it to that that you attribute its special efficiency?—No, I think the Companies (Winding-up) being in a department of its own, whereas it was formerly spread over the Chancery Division, works better and there is uniformity.

50,218. Do you attribute that entirely to the concentration of the work in one department?—To a great extent.

50,219. Or do you consider it is partly due to the fact that in forming a new department it was possible to disregard precedent more and to follow business-like lines?—In my view it is principally through having it in one department that it works so well.

50,220. Do you consider it works decidedly better than the other offices of the Court?—I do.

50,221. In what respect—in the greater dispatch of business?—It is quicker and more convenient.

50,222. And also more efficient?—I would not say that, but it is more convenient. An order when made by the judge or registrar is drawn up in the office in which it is made, and the whole thing works smoothly.

50,223. Do you get your orders quicker in that department?—I do not think you get them quicker.

50,224. We were told that in the Registrars Office such delay as there may be in obtaining orders is rather due to the fact that the solicitors are not ready with their part of the business than that the registrars are not ready with theirs. Do you agree with that?—Not altogether.

50,225. Do you sometimes find delay arising in the Registrars Office?—I have not experienced much delay in the Registrars Office. There is sometimes a little delay in getting appointments before the registrar, and that is in consequence of his being so much in court.

50,226. That difficulty would be removed if he had not to attend in court so constantly?—Certainly.

50,227. Do you consider that the staff is sufficient and not more than sufficient for the work?—I think the staff is adequate. I do not think the office is over-staffed on the present administration.

50,228. Not in any of the departments?—I do not think so.

50,229. The hours are not long?—I do not see very well how you could extend the hours. It would put solicitors, especially agency houses, in a very difficult position if you did, and if they had to remain down in chambers until 5 o'clock.

18 March 1915.]

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

50,230. You are speaking now of the hours during which the offices are open to the practitioners?—Yes.

50,231. Is not there work, at any rate in some offices, which is done irrespective of the presence of practitioners?—I should not think there could be very much. There is a certain amount of detail work, such as drafting certificates and documents of that nature, which could be done when the practitioner is not there.

50,232. In the Chancery chambers is not a large portion of the work done without the presence of the practitioner?—A great deal of it.

50,233. Part of it consists in examining affidavits and documents, and getting information from them and drawing it up in the form of certificates?—Certainly.

50,234. All that is not dependent on the presence of the practitioner?—No, not until you come to the settlement of the documents.

50,235. Then in the Registrars Office the drafting of orders is done without the presence of the practitioner?—Certainly.

50,236. And the examination of the drafts by the registrar is done without the presence of the practitioner until it comes to final settlement of the draft?—Quite so.

50,237. All that work is not dependent on the presence of the practitioner?—No.

50,238. So if the hours were somewhat lengthened that could be done in the part of the day when the practitioners were not present without inconveniencing the practitioners?—That would be so.

50,239. In the Taxing Office is not a certain amount of the work done without the presence of practitioners?—There must be an enormous lot.

50,240. So that could be done after the hours that the office is open to the public?—I should say myself, that if the clerk is working from 10 in the morning till 4 in the afternoon it is quite long enough. I do not think he could usefully stay longer.

50,241. What are your office hours?—From half-past 9 to 6.

50,242. Why can you work 2½ hours longer than a clerk in one of the offices of the Courts?—We do have some variety. We have the walk down to the Courts and back again; we are not fixed in a room the whole time.

50,243. Are not the hours of your clerks often longer than that?—Some offices are open later. I do not say that our office is closed at 6; it is probably 7 or getting on for 7 when it closes.

50,244. After 4 o'clock you have your country correspondence and a good deal of other work to do?—Yes.

50,245. (Lord Mersey.) Surely you have several clerks in your office who do not leave their stools except for their dinners?—That is so.

50,246. How long do they work?—They work until 6.

50,247. At what time do they begin?—Between half-past 9 and 10.

50,248. (Mr. Coward.) Ten o'clock is a late hour to begin, is it not?—We are supposed to begin at half-past 9, but 10 is the usual time when we begin.

50,249. (Lord Mersey.) Do you keep an attendance-book?—No, we have never had one.

50,250. (Chairman.) As regards vacation work, do you find the arrangements as to that satisfactory?—I think it would be better to have two masters in attendance in the vacation.

50,251. Two masters in each division of the Court?—I am speaking of the Chancery Division.

50,252. At present, out of the 12 masters, how many attend during vacation?—One.

50,253. One out of the 12?—Yes.

50,254. That master deals with the work of all three groups?—That is so.

50,255. You think that two masters could usefully attend?—I should say that two would be better.

50,256. It has been suggested to us by one witness that a more liberal interpretation could with advantage be given of the term "vacation business." Do you agree with that?—I do to an extent. I think it should be more liberally extended where payment of money is concerned,

50,257. Do you find that inconvenience is caused by the present interpretation of the term "vacation business"?—Sometimes, when money payment is dependent upon it, I think it ought to be relaxed.

50,258. In the other offices of the Court—the Taxing Office and the Registrars Office—does the work go on satisfactorily in vacations?—Taxations are practically stopped in vacations; unless there is an order made which requires the distribution of a fund in court, the bill would not be taxed.

50,259. Is the registrar's business practically stopped in vacations?—The registrar's business depends upon the work done by the vacation judge and the vacation master; he automatically follows.

50,260. (Mr. Coward.) In vacation it very often happens that if you have a big bill of costs you cannot get it taxed until the courts reopen in October?—That is so.

50,261. (Chairman.) Do you consider it would be desirable to have an age limit for retirement in the offices of the Court?—Not in my view.

50,262. Have you ever known a case in which an officer has continued at his work after his powers had begun to fail?—I think in all my experience I can only recall one such case.

50,263. Have you not known any such case in the Lunacy Department?—No. The case I am referring to was not in the Lunacy Department, it was in the Taxing Office. I remember a first class clerk in the Taxing Office who unfortunately through illness ought to have retired.

50,264. (Lord Mersey.) Would you go so far as to say that the older a man gets the better he gets?—I am inclined to that view.

50,265. (Chairman.) Do you place any limit to that process of improvement?—I remember going before a very old and very able man, a first class clerk, a man like the late Mr. Upjohn, who, I think, was father to the present King's Counsel. Then there was Mr. Biddle, another old gentleman, Mr. Williams, and Mr. Rogers.

50,266. Were they clerks or masters?—First class clerks, very able and very efficient men and very old men.

50,267. They remained until an advanced age?—They did.

50,268. And you found no diminution in their powers?—No.

50,269. (Mr. Matheson.) You are in favour of the appointment of clerks who have had experience in a solicitor's office?—Decidedly.

50,270. There are three classes of clerks at present employed in these offices?—Yes.

50,271. Is it your idea that clerks should come in in the third class and work up, or do you think that the duties of the third class are so mechanical that the third class should be treated as a separate self-contained class?—That is my view.

50,272. And that the second class should be filled direct from outside?—Yes.

50,273. You think the duties of the third class could be performed by what you may call the ordinary lower class Civil Service clerk?—I should say so.

50,274. (Sir John Kempe.) With regard to the question just put to you, I do not understand you to exclude altogether the idea of recruiting the public offices through the third class, but you think it would be better to recruit direct to the second and first?—Yes, I do.

50,275. That is because they would get the advantage of a technical training?—Quite so.

50,276. You admit that there are advantages in recruiting through the third class, and in having the third class in an office, because on an emergency you can call upon men to do things in the second class, especially in small offices?—Yes.

50,277. Would not you lose that altogether if you recruited directly into the second class and had a third class of merely mechanical workers. At present the third class are not merely mechanical workers, but they would be more or less mechanical workers under your plan of having a separate third class?—I think that you would have to bring direct from the solicitors' offices the second and first class clerks, but you might get a man who would accept a third class clerkship if he thought he would thereby get promotion to a second class clerkship.

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

50,278. Then you think the fact of a man having some little legal training would compensate for not getting a higher average of men throughout the office, if you brought them into the third class by open competition?—Certainly.

50,279. You think the mere fact of their having technical knowledge counterbalances the higher education. Supposing you had your choice of recruiting your office from men who had some legal training and men of higher average mental intelligence, would you take the trained man?—I should take the trained man.

50,280. Do you think you would get, on the whole, as good men in that way?—I think so.

50,281. That is to say, they would more easily train up to be competent?—Yes.

50,282. Is not the reason that you prefer trained men rather than you get men who have been already tested, than that the technical training is of more advantage, and that if you take a man into the second class who has had 10 years' training in a solicitor's office, you are quite sure, or more sure, that he will not turn out badly. Is not that your main reason?—That is one reason, but it is a question of qualification. The man who has had the training, in my view, is the qualified man for the position.

50,283. The man has had the training and has been tested and has proved that he is a good man?—Yes.

50,284. Of course, you are very particular about the man you choose. Naturally you get the very best man?—Certainly.

50,285. Do you know the taxing masters' offices?—Very well.

50,286. How would you deal with an office of that sort where there is one first class clerk, one second class clerk, and one third class clerk?—A taxing master has two clerks.

50,287. One a third class clerk and one a second class or first class clerk. How would you deal with an office like that if you have for a third class clerk a man doing the mechanical work?—My experience in the Taxing Office is that the first class clerk and the junior clerk, whatever his grade is—I am not sure which it is—both do skilled work. That is my experience as the office is at present constituted.

50,288. At present the third class clerk is selected from a solicitor's office?—He is.

50,289. And, therefore, he is much older than the age at which a man would come in by open competition?—Certainly.

50,290. Is not that a great disadvantage?—I think in the Taxing Office it is an advantage.

50,291. Is it not a disadvantage, because when a man comes in at 30 or more, he gets discontented, as he cannot serve his time out?—There is something in that.

50,292. There are several reasons why recruiting into the third class would be preferable in some cases?—In some cases it would. If you take the Taxing Office as an illustration, the first class clerk and the junior clerk both do skilled work.

50,293. Do you know the Probate Office?—Not at all.

50,294. (Mr. Coward.) About how many clerks have you altogether in your office?—I should say now about 15 or 16. We are very much reduced on account of the war and other circumstances.

50,295. Have not you in your office clerks who have been in the lower grade, and have remained there all their lives, probably as long as you have been there?—Yes, we have.

50,296. And there they are quite content—at any rate, they do not emerge from that?—Quite right.

50,297. There are all sorts of duties to be performed that these people are satisfied to do, and they never try to emerge out of it?—That is so.

50,298. As I understand, your scheme would be to have the third class clerks in these Government offices, who would be appointed for that purpose, to do that kind of work, just as you would have a messenger?—Yes, and remain so.

50,299. Then you would recruit into the first and second classes from outside?—Quite so.

50,300. You would obviously recruit from the staffs of solicitors?—I should, certainly.

50,301. Because you say they have had the experience of doing the work they will have to do in the offices?—Yes.

50,302. You were asked something about examinations. Would not the real test of their qualifications be the position they had attained in the offices from which they came?—That is the best test you can have.

50,303. If they were people who were high up, and who had had great experience, you would say, what better qualifications could you have than the knowledge that they had done that duty?—Exactly; and done it for a number of years.

50,304. One question about the drawing up of orders. It does take a considerable time to draw up an order?—Sometimes.

50,305–6. If an order were made to-day, you would find that there was some little delay in its being drawn up?—There is some delay, and I think it arises in consequence, as I say, of the registrars. In the olden times a registrar used to sit one day in court and one day in chambers all through the week. Now, the same registrar probably sits in court four days out of the six.

50,307. You cannot, of course, compare the Common Law orders with the Chancery orders?—You cannot; they are incomparable.

50,308. That is true; but you go with a Common Law order, get your summons endorsed by the judge, and draw up the order there and then and serve it that day?—That is so.

50,309. You cannot do that with the Chancery orders?—No.

50,310. I am going to suggest to you that it is because it goes through such a great number of hands that it takes far longer to do. It is true it is more complicated, but it does go through a great many more hands, and, consequently, takes far longer to do?—That is so.

50,311. We have heard, if my recollection serves me aright, that the masters take home work and their clerks take home work. Perhaps you cannot give us an opinion about that. You would not know whether they did or not. None of us can know, except from what they say?—I am told frequently by masters that they take home work.

50,312. If they do there would be no difficulty in extending the hours without their going through the additional burden of doing work out of hours. Their hours, we should say, are ridiculous?—Speaking for myself, I should say that they are short hours.

50,313. (Lord Mersey.) What are those hours you are talking about?—Ten to four.

50,314. I thought you said just now that that was quite long enough?—I think it is for the work they do.

50,315. Have you ever heard of a leading question? Beware of that?—Yes.

50,316. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) At what time in the morning is it customary for solicitors and solicitors' clerks to go to the master's office?—Eleven o'clock.

50,317. Not before 11?—No.

50,318. So when you say "as regards the staff the attendance is regular, I do not find any difficulty or delay in obtaining appointments in chambers," you are referring to the regularity of attendance from 11 onwards?—That is my only knowledge.

50,319. If there is any irregularity of attendance before 11 you would not know of it?—I should not know of it.

50,320. In answer to a question which might be called, perhaps, "leading," you said a solicitor's clerk ought to be appointed to a Government office according to his place in the original office, as that was sufficient indication of his qualifications for appointment to a Government office?—I take it that Mr. Coward's question was directed to the efficiency of the man who was to be appointed—the test of his efficiency—and I agreed that a proper test would be that he had filled a position in an office for so many years.

Mr. FREDERICK CAUNT.

50,321. In a great solicitor's office, if there are two men of the age of 30, one of whom is the son of the senior partner and the other is not, and has perhaps entered as junior clerk at 15, do you think that the fact that the son of the senior partner occupied a higher position in the office would be proof absolute that he was the abler man?—No.

Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON (Assistant Paymaster-General of the Supreme Court), accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR (Principal Clerk), called and examined.

50,322. (Chairman.) You are Assistant Paymaster-General of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

50,323. How long have you held that office?—I was appointed at the end of 1909.

50,324. What had been your previous experience before appointment?—I had been 25 years in Parliament. I had been connected as private secretary with various Government Departments, and I had acquired a considerable knowledge of Parliamentary work, and also of the work of Government Departments.

50,325. You were not in the public service except so far as you had served as private secretary?—No.

50,326. The history of your office goes back to the year 1726?—Yes.

50,327. At that time an Accountant-General was appointed by an Act of that year to look after the funds in court?—Yes.

50,328. At that time the expenses of the court were paid, I think, out of the proceeds of the fees and interest on the funds in its hands?—That is so.

50,329. When the great reforms of the Judicature came about towards the year 1870, considerable changes were made?—Yes.

50,330. The effect of those changes was that the expenses of the courts were charged upon the Exchequer, that the funds in court were taken over by the Exchequer, and that the Exchequer assumed liability for all payments to be made out of those funds. Was that the general effect of the changes?—Broadly speaking, that is so.

50,331. In 1872 the Accountant-General's office was abolished and the funds were transferred to the Paymaster-General?—Yes.

50,332. Finally, when the Supreme Court was consolidated into its present form the Paymaster was appointed accounting officer for the whole of the courts?—Yes. Perhaps I should mention that nominally the Paymaster-General was appointed for the purposes you have just mentioned, but of course he was empowered by the Act to depute all duties concerning the Supreme Court of Judicature to the Assistant Paymaster-General and his deputy. The term "Paymaster-General" is possibly a little misleading, because the Paymaster-General in Whitehall really holds a nominal office.

50,333. Each Paymaster-General executes a deputation transferring the whole of his duties as regards the Supreme Court to an assistant?—Quite so.

50,334. As regards the work of the Supreme Court the authority of the Paymaster-General is purely nominal, and it is entirely transferred to the Assistant and Deputy-Assistant Paymaster-General?—Yes.

50,335. Generally, what is the nature of the work of the Pay Office?—The Pay Office is, I think you will understand, not a legal department. It is the accounting department of the Supreme Court dealing with money and securities of the court as directed. The work in the department consists in dealing with the receipt of funds, lodgment and transfer of securities, investment of money, payment of interest, liquidation and distribution of capital, conversions, payments off, funding of interest, and various financial transactions of that kind.

50,336. That is work relating to the funds in court?—Yes.

50,337. There is another entirely distinct branch of the work relating to the payment of salaries, and so on, of the Supreme Court, and accounting for that expenditure for Parliamentary purposes?—Yes, that is the work of the Assistant Paymaster-General as accounting officer for the Supreme Court Vote.

50,338. That is an entirely distinct branch of work from the work of dealing with the funds in court?—Yes.

50,339. The funds in court amount to a large sum in all?—In round figures they now amount to nearly 50 millions sterling.

50,340. Are those funds mainly invested?—Those funds are practically all invested. In case the information should be of use I have copies here of the Parliamentary account showing that the securities invested are 46,200,000*l.*

50,341. Of which, I suppose, a very large proportion is in Government securities?—A constantly diminishing quantity. Now the amount of Government securities only amounts to about 20,000,000*l.* It was very much larger, but of late years the tendency has been to invest in what we call odd stocks; that is to say, securities other than Government securities.

50,342. I see there are about twenty and a half millions of Consols alone?—Yes.

50,343. I suppose there are other Government securities as well?—There are other Government securities; but for practical purposes we may really resolve Government securities, in my case, into Consols.

50,344. You have a considerable amount of Indian Government securities—some eight or nine millions?—Yes; of India three per cent. stock some 3,000,000*l.*, and of India three and a half per cent. 5,000,000*l.*

50,345. The remainder of the funds are distributed over a large number of securities of every sort and kind?—An enormously increasing number of securities. It is, perhaps, rather interesting to mention that in 1884, when practically the office was just commencing, the number of different securities held was 460; it is now considerably over 2,000.

50,346. The work of the office includes the drawing of the dividends and interest, and other operations connected with all these securities?—Yes; not only a very large number of operations, but growing in complexity in consequence of the increasing investment in these various securities.

50,347. It would, in fact, I suppose, be similar to the work which a bank does as regards securities lodged in its custody by a client?—I should think it is very analogous indeed.

50,348. Supposing, for instance, an opportunity is given to the holder of one of those securities of subscribing to a fresh issue, would you deal with that in the interest of the fund and take it up, or not take it up?—Yes; but, of course, you will understand it would be done by direction of the Court. I undertake no operations except under directions of the Court. I have no discretionary power to deal with suitors' funds at all.

50,349. (Mr. Coward.) One of the parties would have to move about that. The Assistant Paymaster-General would not intervene, or have anything to do with it; he would not tell the people there was a right to subscribe or anything; they must find out for themselves?—No. For instance, in the case of allotment letters they are received by me, and I use those for the benefit of the holders of the securities concerned.

50,350. You do not mean allotment letters, do you?—Yes, I mean allotment letters—new stock.

50,351. You mean offers?—Yes, offers. That is a matter of initiative in the Pay Office. Where a conversion is concerned, of course, I refer at once to the beneficiary—the holder of the stock or his representative. An immense amount of my securities are held under the Masters in Lunacy, and in cases of conversion where an option is exercisable, I refer that option to the beneficiary.

50,352. (Chairman.) In the case of an offer of a new issue where there is an option of taking it up or not, would you refer that to the master for instructions?—In lunacy cases, primarily, to the parties responsible—to the committee or to the solicitors—but, generally speaking, I think I may say that in that case I receive a general order from the Masters in Lunacy, if the offer is an advantageous one, to deal with all the accounts.

18 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON, accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR.

50,353. Take the case of a new issue which is offered on advantageous terms, such new issues as have been made by the Canadian Pacific in the past. Funds are required to take it up; you have to subscribe for new stock. Surely a general authority would not authorise you to take up new stock without referring in a particular case?—No, I was only referring to conversions—the exchange of one security for another.

50,354. Take the case I have put. I want to arrive at what your procedure is. You receive a notice from the Canadian Pacific Company of an issue of that kind; there is a holding in the name of some person in the court, and there is an opportunity of taking up the new issue. To whom would you refer that? You would not act on your own discretion?—If that offer is an advantageous one; if the rights, so to speak, can be sold, my procedure is to obtain it for the beneficiaries. That is really the case of the allotment letters which I was speaking of.

50,355. Would you sell the rights without consulting anybody?—I think, informally, we consult the solicitors to know what their view is. If the solicitors representing the parties raised any objection, I think I should probably exercise my discretion in the negative. I am very anxious to give you the information you seek.

50,356. My point is this: Where there is a discretion to be exercised, is it part of your business to exercise that for the persons concerned, or to put the matter before the persons concerned and act upon the opinion which they express, or, if it is a matter requiring to be decided by the Court, do you act on the decision of the Court?—(Mr. Sellar.) May I explain? Rule 110 of the Supreme Court Funds Rules tells the Paymaster-General to sell all allotment letters and rights of that kind. If our Supreme Court broker tells us that a right is valuable and saleable, and we find that we can realise anything, we sell it, and credit the suitors' accounts with the proceeds.

50,357. (Mr. Coward.) Without telling anybody?—It depends on the circumstances. We have no money by which we can subscribe for an issue of new stock, we cannot take up any new stock, we have no funds with which to do it.

50,358. (Chairman.) Take the case where the right to subscribe is a right that can be sold, do you sell it on your own initiative without reference to anybody?—Yes, under the rule. (Mr. Paulton.) Under the rule I sell that right.

50,359. Without giving the person interested the option of subscribing if he wishes to?—I do not think that that option is really exerciseable by him without an Order of the Court. With the delay involved I do not think it would be practicable. Probably the right would have expired before he could have obtained the authority of the Court to deal with it. (Mr. Sellar.) The right is exercised by the Paymaster-General in respect of his total holding of the stock, and it may be spread over 40 or 50 accounts. (Mr. Paulton.) I recently had cases in which, I think, there were some 200 distributions of a fractional amount.

50,360. Taking a case of that kind, would you exercise discretion for the whole of the stock held by you in a lump without referring to the individual parties interested in parts of it?—Yes, I think, broadly speaking, that may be so. In every case I inform the representatives of the person whose account is concerned.

50,361. (To Mr. Sellar.) You referred to Rule 110. Is not the answer to my question contained in that rule which prescribes that all such rights should be sold?—Yes.

50,362. Under that rule there is no question of offering the option of subscribing to the persons interested?—No question of option to subscribe. They come in various forms; sometimes we get a direct allotment of stock, which must be immediately sold under the rule; another time we may be told by the broker: "This stock will have certain rights; if you subscribe, 'the rights will be worth something,' and we sell if we get an actual allotment from the company.

50,363. (To Mr. Paulton.) If it takes a form where there is a right which can be actually sold under the rule, you have to sell it?—Yes.

50,364. In that case there is no discretion to exercise?—That is practically so.

50,365. Speaking generally, is it right to say that in all cases you act under instructions and do not exercise discretion in matters of this kind?—Yes.

50,366. Looking at the return, I see, besides securities, you have a certain number of actual objects, packets, and boxes to take charge of?—Yes.

50,367. Some of those, I see, are of very ancient date?—Very.

50,368. Do you keep them indefinitely?—They are merely in my custody. I know nothing about them. I am like the manager of a bank with whom has been deposited boxes or bundles of securities.

50,369. Is there no provision for disposing of them after a certain lapse of time?—No.

50,370. I see, for instance, you have a "bag of clipped money in Jones v. Lloyd, 20th August 1726." That is not likely to be claimed now by anyone. Will it remain indefinitely in the custody of your office?—There is not the least chance of that being claimed, I think.

50,371. Then it will remain indefinitely?—Indefinitely. I asked, as a favour, to be allowed to see it, but great difficulties were placed in the way, and it was regarded as so strange a request that I did not press it.

50,372. But is it not under your custody?—It is in the bank. Everything the bank has the bank is responsible for, and I am not permitted to examine.

50,373. In the case of funds, there is an arrangement for dealing with funds which are dead?—Dormant funds, yes. Those are dormant when they have not been dealt with for 15 years. I publish a list every three years of those funds. Perhaps I ought to put in a list—I shall be glad to do so—of the dormant funds. Roughly, they amount to about one and a half millions. The enormous majority of those funds are absolutely derelict. They cannot be claimed, and never will be claimed. They have been published for years and years unavailingly. The cost of taking them out would, in almost every instance, be far greater than the value of the fund, even if it were possible to trace a claimant. I may observe that I have, more than once, endeavoured to call attention to the desirability of releasing the Consols represented by these dormant funds, which can never be touched, which go on in my books accumulating interest year after year since the year 1726 for no one's benefit, and the taking over of which by the Treasury, it seems to me, would be a very desirable operation.

50,374. Is it not the case that those funds are, as a matter of fact, taken over by the Treasury, the Treasury being responsible for finding the money if it is claimed?—That is so. The Treasury took over the responsibility for this in 1869.

50,375. So that the practical effect of your suggestion would be merely the clearing of your books?—Yes.

50,376. It would not make any difference to the application of the actual funds?—No, it would release a very considerable amount of Consols on a very dead market.

50,377. How is your office organised for dealing with these various matters?—The staff consists of principal clerks, first class, second class, and second division clerks, with seven assistant clerks. I had occasion soon after I was appointed to reorganise the system of work in the office because I considered it very unsatisfactory, to the extent to which I have referred in my précis of evidence. I do not know if you wish me to elaborate that in any way?

50,378. I think we need not go into that in much detail. Will you tell us what generally is the distribution of the work at present?—As amongst the different grades of the staff?

50,379. First of all as regards the divisions of the office in which the work is done. You have four divisions, I think, dealing with Chancery causes and Lunacy accounts divided into alphabetical departments?—Yes.

50,380. The fifth division deals with public works and bodies, causes in the King's Bench, Probate, Divorce,

18 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON, accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR.

and Admiralty Divisions, and Judicial Trustee funds?—Yes.

50,381. What are the cases connected with public works and bodies with which you deal?—Those are very largely railway cases—purchases by railways of glebe land, and so on, the life interest in which is vested in the incumbent. Those are the majority of the cases. (Mr. Sellar.) They represent the proceeds of land compulsorily acquired under Acts of Parliament.

50,382. Proceeds deposited in court pending allotment to persons ultimately entitled?—No, it is where there is continuous interest, either by a rector or incumbent or trustees or a tenant for life, and disability to sell. The money is paid into court and invested, and the beneficiary gets the income. (Mr. Paulton.) They are nearly all cases of incumbents of livings.

50,383. You have also a department dealing with the vote for the Supreme Court?—Yes; that is quite a separate department.

50,384. Another department is the Central Division dealing with general correspondence and operations connected with exchange or purchase of securities?—Yes.

50,385. And, finally, there is an Accounts Branch?—Yes, that deals with the consolidated accounts of the whole department.

50,386. Are the other departments not practically accounts branches?—No. All their work is centred in the Accounts Branch.

50,387. Taking the branches which deal with Chancery accounts, do not they keep the books and suitors' accounts?—(Mr. Sellar.) They only deal with suitors' accounts, and all their accounts are focussed in the one room and entered as totals; it is a summarising department, really.

50,388. How are your principal clerks distributed amongst those departments?—(Mr. Paulton.) There is a principal clerk to each of the four Chancery Divisions. The fifth division is in charge of a first class clerk.

50,389. Are the three other departments in charge of a first class clerk?—They are in charge of second class clerks.

50,390. Where are the other first class clerks employed?—There are only five first class clerks, one first class clerk under a principal in each of the four Chancery Divisions, and one is in charge of the fifth division. Each principal has under him one first class clerk and one second class clerk.

50,391. I suppose the three other divisions, the Vote, the Central Division, and the Accounts Branch, are more directly under the supervision of yourself and your deputy?—I think it is correct to say that, broadly, they are more directly under us.

50,392. What work do the second division clerks do?—Mr. Sellar's great experience of the work and his knowledge would probably enable him to condense the matter more than I should be able to do. (Mr. Sellar.) I can give you the statistics of my own division.

50,393. (To Mr. Sellar.) Will you tell us what the work done by the second division clerk is?—Mainly book-keeping work.

50,394. I suppose a large amount of the work is book-keeping work?—Naturally. In my room I have 6,000 suitors' accounts, having balances aggregating 288,000*l.* cash and about 10,000,000*l.* stock. That is roughly one quarter of the funds in court.

50,395. In your division there is one principal clerk, one first class clerk, one second class clerk, six second division clerks, and one assistant clerk?—Yes.

50,396. Is it correct to say broadly that the second division clerks do book-keeping work, while the higher clerks do supervision of and deal with questions that require something higher than a second division clerk to decide them?—Yes. The first class clerk actually delivers out to suitors and to solicitors what we call "principal" cheques in payment of principal money. He delivers out directions for the issue of bonds, and also superintends instructions to the bank for transfer of securities.

50,397. When you say "delivers out cheques," are cheques largely given personally or are they sent by post?—A large number personally.

50,398. (Mr. Coward.) The majority?—A large number of people come for cheques.

50,399. (Chairman.) Are they suitors coming in person, or by their solicitors?—They come in person with solicitors and are identified by solicitors usually. Many of our annuitants prefer to come for their cheques. Although the postal system has been in force 30 years, still some prefer to come personally, but the great majority of the cheques, of course, are sent by post nowadays.

50,400. The post is much simpler?—Much simpler.

50,401. So far as you are concerned, do you prefer the post?—No, I think it is easier to deliver a cheque over the counter than to send it by post.

50,402. (Mr. Coward.) Did you say that cheques are sent by post?—Yes, thousands are so sent.

50,403. Under what circumstances?—Simply on the request of the payee.

50,404. Not always, are they? It is a question of amount?—(Mr. Paulton.) That has been so hitherto. Under a revision of the rules, I am glad to say, the limit will be abolished. I am not allowed at present to send by post a cheque for more than 1,000*l.*, which is very inconvenient.

50,405. (Chairman.) In ordinary commercial transactions is not the payment of money done almost entirely by post?—Yes.

50,406. Is there any reason why it should not be so in your office?—(Mr. Sellar.) We pay many cheques for costs to solicitors, and many of them prefer to run in and pick up their cheques.

50,407. (Mr. Coward.) Do they really?—I am sure they do.

50,408. (Chairman.) Why should they?—They are about the building, I suppose. Often one says to a solicitor's clerk: "You can have it on Form 25," and he says, "No, my principal will come for it."

50,409. (Mr. Coward.) It is the solicitor who has to go, and you will only deliver it to the solicitor himself if it is due to him; or if it is due to his client he has to have a power of attorney?—Yes.

50,410. So that you have all the trouble and expense of a power of attorney and compel the solicitor to go up and get the money as well. It is an unheard of thing?—(Mr. Paulton.) I have used my utmost endeavours to reduce the system of power of attorney to a minimum.

50,411. I am only asking about what is the practice to-day?—Yes.

50,412. (Chairman.) Is a revision of the Rules of Court applicable to the Pay Office in contemplation now?—I am glad to say that a revision undertaken last autumn has practically been sanctioned by the Treasury, and the revised rules will, I hope, very shortly be issued.

50,413. Does that include any extension of the powers of sending cheques by post?—Yes. That, for instance, is, I think, an important gain to the public. The various restrictions which have been imposed upon my office in dealing, if I may say so, in a business-like way with the public have become unnecessary, and I think under the revised rules the public will gain considerably in convenience, and in the removal of various irritating things.

50,414. (Mr. Coward.) If all these fetters are removed the public certainly will gain?—Unquestionably. It seems to me dreadful to find that an office, if I may venture to say so, like mine, should be regarded not as a pay office, but as a money box. My business is to pay out as expeditiously and cheaply as possible to the public what is due to them, and I have endeavoured to revise the rules in that spirit as far as possible.

50,415. (Chairman.) And the new revised rules will remove a considerable number of those restrictions?—I hope so. For instance, as to the troublesome provisions for the giving of evidence before money can be paid to annuitants and people of that kind, I have endeavoured, in this revision of rules, to treat payees in the same way as Queen Anne's Bounty and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners deal with them; that is to say,

18 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON, accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR.

I want to be satisfied that I have sufficient proof that they are the proper people, and as far as possible—speaking very broadly—to remove the petty, and often very troublesome requirements imposed upon the public. I hope in the matter of evidence we shall give the public very considerably greater facilities under the revised rules.

50,416. (To Mr. Sellar.) To come back to the question of the work of the different classes, you have a certain number of assistant clerks?—Only one in each division at present.

50,417. What work do they do?—The assistant clerk keeps the register of payments, and assists with such work as copying transcripts, copying certificates, and drawing a certain number of cheques.

50,418. Practically copying work?—Largely copying work.

50,419. The cheques that he draws, I suppose, are drawn from schedules?—Drawn from what we call “models.” Many of our dividend payments run for years and years, and a model is made from which a cheque is drawn each quarter.

50,420. He has something which gives him the exact words he has to write on the cheque, and he has to copy that?—Yes, he has to copy it.

50,421. What is the method of appointment at present to the different posts in the office? By whom are the appointments made?—(Mr. Paulton.) By the Civil Service Commissioners in the ordinary course, and mine is a Civil Service Department.

50,422. Yes, but somebody has to appoint. In the first place, taking yourself, who appointed you?—The Assistant Paymaster and the Deputy Paymaster are appointed by the Treasury. That appointment has always been kept in the hands of the Treasury specifically, as I think is mentioned in the Spring-Rice Memorandum. It has been, and, as he says, must be retained by the Treasury on account of the responsibility which the Assistant Paymaster holds on behalf of the Treasury towards the suitors' funds. The Deputy Paymaster is in practically the same position.

50,423. Both these appointments are made by the Treasury?—Yes, those two appointments are made by selection.

50,424. Is the staff of the office considered eligible for promotion to these posts?—It has never been held that these two posts were to be regarded as open to the staff. I see no absolute bar to the holding of those posts by promotion, but I do not think the Treasury would be willing to assent to it—certainly not as a matter of right, and hardly as a practice.

50,425. In the past has any appointment to one of those two posts been made from among the staff?—(Mr. Sellar.) Mr. Lewis was appointed Assistant Paymaster, and Mr. Sharpe was appointed from the office to be Deputy Paymaster. In 1884, when there were great changes in the office, the Treasury introduced the first outsider to the post of Deputy Paymaster. The changes were then thought to be so important that they sent their own accountant, Mr. Skinner.

50,426. Mr. Skinner came from the Treasury?—Yes, he was a Treasury accountant.

50,427. And his successor was Mr. Lewis, who was appointed from the staff of the office?—Mr. Lewis was a principal clerk in the office.

50,428. I see, when Mr. Skinner was appointed Deputy Paymaster, Sir George Kellner was appointed Assistant Paymaster-General. Where did he come from?—He was Accountant-General in the India Office.

50,429. Mr. Lewis, in 1892, was promoted to be Assistant Paymaster-General, and Mr. Rowe was appointed deputy. Where did he come from?—He came from the Central Conservative Association.

50,430. He had not been in the public service before?—Not at all.

50,431. In 1900 Mr. Rowe was appointed to be Assistant Paymaster-General and Mr. Sharp was appointed deputy?—Mr. Sharp was appointed from the office. In 1884 the Treasury distinctly laid it down that they hoped in future to fill that post from the office.

50,432. (To Mr. Paulton.) Did you succeed Mr. Rowe?—Yes, in 1909.

50,433. Then Mr. Longley had been appointed deputy before that time?—Yes, in 1905.

50,434. What was Mr. Longley's previous experience?—He was Private Secretary at the Home Office from 1895 to 1902. Then Assistant Private Secretary at the Treasury; Secretary to two Royal Commissions, and Private Secretary at the Privy Council Office.

50,435. Mr. Longley had had previous experience in the public service?—Yes.

50,436. But not in the Pay Office?—Not in the Pay Office.

50,437. I gather that your own previous experience had not included service in an office of accountants or an office of a financial character?—No.

50,438. In fact, you had not had experience connected with accounting work or financial work of the nature that the office deals with?—That is true.

50,439. Can you say whether Mr. Longley's previous work had been of a financial nature or connected with accounts?—I think I can say not, and that, in that respect, his record would be much the same as mine.

50,440. As regards the other classes in the office, are the first and second class filled by promotion from the second division?—Yes.

50,441. From the second division clerks in the office itself, or from second division clerks generally?—We have had very few, if any, introductions from outside. The promotions to the second class during my time have been entirely from the existing second division.

50,442. From members of the second division working in this office?—Yes.

50,443. In theory, is it open to selection from the second division anywhere?—In theory, yes.

50,444. But in practice it is confined to the second division working in the office?—Yes.

50,445. By whom are the promotions made?—By myself; or, in case of my absence, by Mr. Longley. It is by personal selection by the paymaster on the governing consideration of merit.

50,446. You make promotions on your own authority without reference to the Treasury?—My recommendations are sent in to the Treasury for confirmation.

50,447. They have to be confirmed by the Treasury?—Yes.

50,448. Has promotion proceeded generally by seniority, or have you departed largely from seniority?—I may say that the principle upon which I myself have acted has been that, where merit is equal, seniority should determine; but that seniority should not prevail over merit.

50,449. I suppose the point at which selection would chiefly come in would be in the selection of the second division clerks who are to be promoted to the second class?—Yes. I think the same remark would apply to promotion to the first class from the second, and that is an even more responsible duty.

50,450. In selecting for promotion to the second class, have you, as a matter of fact, departed largely from the order of seniority?—Yes; I am afraid I have been obliged to do that to a certain extent or even to a considerable extent.

50,451. In considering seniority amongst the second division clerks, do you take the date of appointment to the public service or the date of promotion to the higher grade as determining seniority?—I think the date of appointment.

50,452. Are there any second division clerks at present who are senior to any of the clerks in the second class?—There are four.

50,453. The four clerks to whom you refer were appointed in the months from February to July 1881?—Yes.

50,454. And the three junior clerks at present in the second class were appointed in July 1881?—Yes. (Mr. Sellar.) A great many men entered the office about that time.

50,455. So the difference of seniority in that case is a difference of two or three months, and, in some cases, days?—(Mr. Paulton.) Yes.

18 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON, accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR.

50,456. Practically, they are of the same seniority?—Yes.

50,457. Apart from that slight difference in seniority, promotions have been made in order of seniority?—Yes.

50,458. The second division clerks are sent to you from the Civil Service Commission?—Yes.

50,459. Have you any voice in saying who shall be sent you?—No.

50,460. You take those who come?—Yes.

50,461. I presume you have a power of rejection if they are not found satisfactory?—I think so; but I may say that since my appointment we have not had many second division clerks appointed by the Commissioners.

50,462. You have never had occasion to exercise that power of rejection?—No.

50,463. Do you find the present system satisfactory?—Satisfactory.

50,464. Do the second division clerks do the work they have to do in a satisfactory manner?—Indeed they do their work, if I may say so, in an admirable manner. Their work merges very largely on a considerable portion of the work of the second class clerk. It is almost impossible to draw a close dividing line between the work of the second division and the second class in my office; the work is so intermingled, as it were. The zeal with which the second division clerks have worked is, I think, very remarkable when one reflects that under the peculiar circumstances of the Pay Office most of these men have been practically debarred from any hope of promotion.

50,465. What peculiar circumstances do you mean?—When I went to the Pay Office I found that promotion had practically been stagnant for 20 and almost 30 years, largely due to the fact that the old Accountant-General's men had remained in their posts, and they had considered, and had been allowed to consider, that they had a life interest in their posts. There were several men of 70 years of age who had been over 50 years in the department who declined to take their pension and to make way for the younger members of the office. It seemed to me to be a most terrible hardship. I had the greatest difficulty, if I may say so, in obtaining the active assent of the Treasury to my endeavours to remove them. I succeeded in doing so within a year or two, and promotion was, to a certain extent, accelerated; but I think I may say—and Mr. Sellar will correct me if I am wrong—that the main cause of the terrible state of stagnation in the Pay Office was due to the fact that the Accountant-General's men, a large number of whom were taken over when the Pay Office was constituted, remained at their posts, and were regarded as irremovable, with no time limit.

50,466. Are any of them remaining?—None remain now.

50,467. So that cause is removed?—Yes.

50,468. I see in the last five years, practically since your appointment to the office, there have been six promotions to the second class?—Yes.

50,469. Have you compared that rate of promotion for second division clerks with the rate of promotion which exists for second division clerks in any other offices of the Civil Service?—I cannot say I have.

50,470. Would not a comparison of that kind be necessary before pronouncing that there is an exceptional degree of stagnation in this office?—I do not think the rate of promotion that might have prevailed in the last four or five years can be taken as the average rate of promotion in the office, because, as I have just said, for so very many years there was really no promotion at all. I think if you take the average rate of promotion over a period of 25 years, or anything like that, you would find that the average rate of promotion in the Pay Office was immensely below.

50,471. What is the present rule as regards an age limit for retirement in the office?—The age limit is 60 years of age. I fixed that rule, I may say, by the universal desire of the members of the staff. There was no age limit for retirement when I came in.

50,472. Then in the next nine years there must be at least 17 vacancies in the higher classes?—Yes.

50,473. I see all the members of the principal clerks' class and the first and second class, are of the age of 51, or over?—Yes.

50,474. So that the rate of promotion in the coming years will be at least as rapid as it has been in the last five years; probably more rapid?—I think so.

50,475. That rate of promotion may be exceptional as compared with the past, but is not likely to be exceptional as compared with the immediate future?—Perhaps that is so; but the men now in the office, or the greater number of men in the second division, have no chance or hope whatever of promotion. They will be retired long before they can possibly expect or hope for any chance of promotion.

50,476. That arises, does it not, from the fact that a large number were appointed in the early days of the office upon its present footing?—Yes.

50,477. That is an accident which may arise in any office, and may produce an inequality in promotion at certain times; but before pronouncing that the second division are in a worse position in this office than they are elsewhere in the Service, would not it be necessary to compare the rate of promotion here with the rate of promotion for the second division in the Civil Service generally?—Yes; I think, perhaps, I should admit that, and I do not know why I should in the least hesitate to make the comparison; but I regret I did not realise the necessity of doing it.

50,478. As regards the conditions of service generally, do the ordinary Civil Service rules apply as regards hours of attendance, leave, and so forth?—Yes.

50,479. You have a seven-hour day in this office?—Yes.

50,480. What are the hours in vacations?—Nominally the hours which the office is open to the public are reduced in the vacations. If the work of the office permits during the Long Vacation, the principal can allow his clerks to leave before the usual time, at 4 instead of 5; it is permitted when there is less work; but the permission is entirely subject to the exigencies of the division and the state of the work.

50,481. As a matter of fact, is the work much diminished in vacation?—I do not think very much. I find very little difference.

50,482. All the work connected with dividends goes on as usual?—(Mr. Sellar.) We should welcome the abolition of the Long Vacation.

50,483. Why?—Because towards the end of July and the beginning of August we are flooded with orders. The registrars and others upstairs are wanting to get away, and everything has to be done in a rush and hurry to assist them in doing so. During the first part of the Long Vacation we are working out those orders which come to us en masse at the beginning of August. September comes along, and we have the preparation of the October dividends. The bank books close on the 1st September. That month gives us a chance of taking the bulk of our leave, and we can spare two men to be on leave during that time, and the others have to work practically full time. There is not much advantage to the Pay Office in the Long Vacation.

50,484. Although the hours are nominally shorter?—The office is open to the public from 11 till 3—that is all.

50,485. Practically the clerks do not get the benefit of the shorter hours?—No.

50,486. (To Mr. Paulton.) We have heard in evidence, as regards the Chancery Division, that the Chancery orders are of a difficult and technical nature, and that the difficulty and technicality arise partly from the necessity of complying with the rules that govern the Pay Office. Do you confirm that?—Yes. It is not the way I should put it: but I think that is the general result.

50,487. How would you put it?—The orders must be in a form which are workable by me according to my rules and practice. I have very little difficulty. It is very seldom, indeed, that any difficulty arises.

50,488. Are there many cases in which the order comes down in a form that does not comply with your rules and practice?—Very seldom, because in any exceptional case a solicitor would be sure to come and consult my officers or myself before drawing a difficult or exceptional direction in an order.

18 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON, accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR.

50,489. Whose business would it be, when an order comes, to say: "This does not comply with the requirements of the Pay Office"—would it be the duty of a first class clerk, a second class clerk, or a second division clerk?—(Mr. Sellar.) The principal clerk. The orders go to the principal clerk every morning, and he has to supervise them to see if they are workable or not.

50,490. The principal clerk sees the orders before they go to the other clerks to act upon?—Yes. I had yesterday an order telling me to pay some interest which I had already paid under a previous order in 1911. I am told to pay interest which accrued up to a date in 1910, when a lady married. I have already paid that interest under an earlier order in 1911, and, therefore, the new order is wrong and must be amended.

50,491. That error is not an error of mere technicality but an error of fact?—It is an error of fact. The order might direct me to make a payment representing interest which accrued in that period, but I cannot pay interest twice over in separate orders.

50,492. Do you get orders where there are errors in them?—Those are the errors we get. Our difficulty lies in inducing the registrar to see the error, and we have great difficulty in getting a registrar to amend an order. It is almost like asking him to operate on himself. Sometimes they come to us, and say: "Will this do?" and we go through it with them. (Mr. Paulton.) We make every effort to avoid these difficulties, and solicitors understand that now, and come to us to consult us before any unusual direction is inserted in an order.

50,493. Speaking generally, have you any suggestions or observations to make on the working of the office and its organisation?—I would like, if I may be permitted, to make one reference to the assistant clerks, and to put before you my very strong view as to the special unsuitability of that class of clerk for the work which my office has to do. These lads are appointed; they have some difficulty in supporting themselves; their first desire is to be nearer their homes, if possible. I have lads sent to me from Ireland, Scotland, and so on, and they have to find their lodgings in London, which it is very difficult for them to do, and their one desire is to get away. At least a year is spent in giving them an elementary training in their duties, although those duties are quite simple clerical duties, and by that time a good many of them, perhaps, will have qualified for a second division examination. Their one desire is to go; out of 17 that I have had since I have been in the office, 10 have gone. Now their work has been entirely lost to the office, and they have occupied a great deal of time and attention. Mr. Sellar is specially disposed to train these boys and assist them in their work and give them a knowledge of their duties and encourage them, and he knows very well that the able ones, as soon as they have mastered the elements of the work of their seats, naturally are anxious to go out to improve themselves. I do not think it too much to say that the salaries paid to these boys is money wasted as far as the Pay Office is concerned. I really think it is a most extravagant system. I should also like you to notice that it is really in derogation of the efficiency of the staff, because the knowledge gained in those junior seats is essential to the clerks as they proceed up in the scale of promotion. That is my feeling.

50,494. You would rather have the work entirely done by second division clerks?—I feel sure that the money which is spent on the assistant clerks is wasted so far as my department is concerned. I do not think it is a sort of department in which that kind of labour can be usefully employed. Really it is not merely clerical work like, perhaps, the work in the War Office or the Admiralty, in which you can have rooms in which these boys can be employed in purely clerical copying work. That is not the case in the Pay Office. I regret very much to see the amount of zeal and labour which is spent upon these lads, whose first desire is to get another post.

50,495. Is there any other point on which you wish to make any observations?—I would very much like, if I might venture to do so, to draw attention to a point which no doubt has been before the Commission, and that is as to the advisability of giving to the head of a department a very limited, no doubt, and strictly defined power of recommending for retirement as distinct from recommending for dismissal of an inefficient clerk. I will not labour the point if it is one which has been before the Commission, as I dare say it has, but it does seem to me extremely desirable that in the Civil Service there should be the kind of rule which prevails in a business house, that you must scrap your inefficient material.

50,496. Have you some cases in which you would apply that power if it existed?—Yes, indeed I have. They stand out, perhaps, particularly in the case of what I say most honestly is a most efficient staff. The few exceptions stand out so clearly that they have called my attention to this matter very much. There is inefficiency of two kinds. There is what I may call a moral and almost intentional inefficiency—laziness, indifference to discipline, and lack of desirable qualities. That is one kind that can be dealt with, as a rule, by disciplinary measures, although it is very difficult to do so, especially in the case where a man is always exercising a bad influence in the office. But then there is the much more difficult case of the physically inefficient man who is incompetent, not from lack of any good qualities, but because he is not able to really do his full measure of work; he has not got the gift of accuracy; his errors, wholly unintentional, cause great distress to himself and are a constant source of danger in an office like mine. After 20 years' service that man's services cannot be dispensed with, because it is a cruel thing to deprive him of his pension. You can only recommend him for dismissal on the ground of misconduct, which case does not arise; there is no suggestion of recommending him for dismissal, but there are many cases I am sure—there are a few within my own knowledge—where a man would willingly retire if retirement carried with it a proportionate pension for the years of service he had given.

50,497. Is there not any power of that kind at present?—I believe none whatever. I do not think, except on the ground of absolute loss of health, it is possible that a man can retire. I did my utmost last year to obtain the assent of the Treasury to the retirement of two clerks in my office who had each served more than 40 years, and who were anxious to retire in order to assist promotion in the office, but they had not reached the age of 60, and therefore they were not allowed to retire; but that is optional retirement, which is another matter altogether.

50,498. These were not cases of inefficiency?—No, far from it. It would have been a great loss to me if they should have retired.

50,499. Are you acquainted with the second section of the Superannuation Act of 1887, which gives power to grant a retiring allowance to persons removed on the ground of inefficiency?—But those provisions are very stringent.

50,500. It gives discretion to the Treasury to grant a retiring allowance to a person retired for inefficiency within the amount for which his length of service would qualify him?—I have always understood that that is practically a dead letter—that you must have so serious a suggestion against a man to induce his retirement that he practically will lose his pension.

50,501. In the cases that you spoke of, have you ever approached the Treasury with a view to the application of the second section of the Act of 1887?—I have several times, and at this moment I am in consultation with the Treasury about a difficult case; but the provisions of that section have never been put before me as a remedy for any individual difficulty that I have brought forward.

50,502. That section applies in the case where an individual is unable to discharge efficiently the duties of his office, so that it would appear to be possible under that section, if the Treasury in their discretion think it desirable, to meet the cases of inefficiency to which you have referred?—Granting that the existence of the inefficiency will not cause the individual to run the risk of being given no retiring allowance at all.

18 March 1915.] Mr. JAMES MELLOR PAULTON, accompanied by Mr. HENRY SELLAR.

That is a practical difficulty with which one is faced. I think you have to prove so strong a case.

50,503. (Sir John Kempe.) They reduce the pensions sometimes to fit the case, where the inefficiency is culpable. If a man is incompetent from drink, or anything of that kind, they can reduce the pension?—Yes.

50,504. I think, where it is not culpable, it is not the practice of the Treasury to reduce the pension?—I apologise for having introduced the topic without sufficient investigation into that particular section.

50,505. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) You were appointed in 1909?—Yes.

50,506. At that time you had been a Member of Parliament 24 years?—Yes.

50,507. Did you resign your membership before receiving the appointment?—It was just at the time of the General Election. I had notified my intention of not standing again. I remember that, but I forget the exact date of the Dissolution of Parliament.

50,508. But you received an effective promise of the post while you were a Member of Parliament?—No; I retired quite independently.

50,509. You were, at the time when you received notice that you would be appointed, a Member of Parliament?—My recollection is not quite sure as to the exact date of the Dissolution, whether I was actually in Parliament in 1909 or whether it had come to an end before I received my appointment.

50,510. But surely the matter was one of debate in Parliament at one time?—No.

50,511. Do you remember whether you were a Member of the House when you received an effective offer of this post?—I remember I received the offer on the 21st December 1909, and I do not think the General Election was proclaimed until early in 1910. I must have been still in the House.

50,512. You were then at the age of 51?—Yes, I think so.

50,513. Do you remember whether you were appointed by direct action of the Crown or under Section 4 of the Act of 1859, or how?—I really could not tell you.

50,514. Is your office pensionable?—Yes.

50,515. Were years added to your service at the time you were appointed?—I believe not.

50,516. You only earn such pension as you earn by your actual years of service?—I believe so.

50,517. Is there any retiring age in your case?—I think it is at the discretion of the Treasury. The usual age would be 65, I imagine, at the discretion of the Treasury. I have never gone into the matter or made formal inquiry about it.

50,518. At the time when you received an effective offer of the appointment you were private secretary to one of the Ministers?—No.

50,519. That work had ceased?—I had not been private secretary for very many years.

50,520. To which Minister were you private secretary last?—I was at the Home Office with Mr. Asquith. That was my last private secretaryship.

50,521. I see you have a clerk put down as an assistant clerk named G. Gilchrist, whose age is given as 17?—Yes.

50,522. Is not he a boy clerk rather than an assistant clerk?—(Mr. Sellar.) He comes to us as an assistant clerk. (Mr. Paulton.) That is exactly one of the cases I had in mind. That boy's parents live in Scotland, and he is longing to get back to Scotland. He has very great difficulty in living on his salary in London.

50,523. You are probably aware that the whole system of boy clerks and assistant clerks has been proposed by this Commission to be swept away?—I am sorry that I am not as well acquainted as I ought to be with your interim reports. I intended to examine them yesterday, but was unavoidably prevented from doing so.

50,524. Have you any typing done in your office?—I am allowed specially now one typist. My type-writing clerk in the Central Division in the correspondence branch is a Naval Reserve man, and he has been captured and is interned in Holland, so I had to apply to the Treasury for a temporary typist.

50,525. Have you a woman typist?—Yes.

50,526. Would it be possible for most of the work now done by assistant clerks—the copying work, and so on—to be done by women typists?—No, I do not think it would be possible, because the work must be all done in the same room, and I do not think it would be physically possible to make suitable arrangements in my office.

50,527. There is a time-book in your office, I presume?—Yes.

50,528. It was given in evidence the other day that it was the custom in these departments to count any attendance up to 10.20 a.m. as being punctual attendance at 10. Do you know whether such a custom exists in your office?—The rule is very strict, and I am sure Mr. Sellar will corroborate me. There are a few cases in which, owing to actual physical difficulties, a man cannot catch a train, so that he must either arrive at a quarter past nine, and kick his heels about until the time of his attendance, or be, perhaps, 10 minutes late. I think, broadly speaking, in a few special cases, with my sanction, 10.15 is permitted.

50,529. But there is no general custom by which attendance up to 10.20 or 10.15 counts as punctual attendance?—I should certainly not consider so. (Mr. Sellar.) Our attendance is before 10 rather than after.

50,530. (Sir John Kempe.) (To Mr. Sellar.) Can you tell me if all of the clerks above the second division at the present moment have passed through the second division?—Yes, all except the two seniors, who were the old Class II. before 1876.

50,531. Are they old men?—No, but they came in in 1875 at the end of the old Class II. Prior to the Playfair Commission they were Class II.

50,532. Are they as good men as the second division?—I should say the same. It was the same examination.

50,533. (To Mr. Paulton.) I see in your précis of evidence you say that your clerks “have no legal training, but they must and do acquire by practice and experience a specialised knowledge of the work of the Supreme Court in all its departments, and are frequently consulted by the officials.” I suppose that is rather too broad a statement. It is only the financial side of it that they are consulted on; they are not consulted on legal points?—Yes. (Mr. Sellar.) Only on the financial bearings.

50,534. You say it is the rule in your office that every letter should be answered on the day of receipt. You do not mean that every letter can be completed?—(Mr. Paulton.) Mr. Sellar was for many years head of the correspondence branch, and will bear me out that, at any rate since I have been in the department, it is the rarest thing for a single letter to be held over until the following day, and then it is purely on account of physical inability to get the information, or something of that kind.

50,535. Then the cases, on the whole, must be small cases; because, if you had to make any investigation or inquiries to enable you to answer, you could not answer it on the day?—It is done by telephone or interview with solicitors. I insist on every effort being made to procure the information necessary to answer every letter on the day of receipt.

50,536. That is very satisfactory?—May I hand in a memorandum drawn up by my staff with regard to their position?

(Chairman.) You may hand it in. They might have sent it in themselves. Strictly speaking, it ought to have been sent in by the 1st of March, in accordance with the notice we have published.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 24th March 1915.

PRESENT:

SIR HENRY BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. LORD MERSEY.
 Sir JOHN PRESCOTT HEWETT, G.C.S.I., C.I.E.
 Sir DONALD MACALISTER, K.C.B.
 Sir JOHN ARROW KEMPE, K.C.B.
 Mr. JOHN ROBERT CLYNES, M.P.

Mr. CECIL COWARD.
 Mr. ARTHUR EVERETT SHIPLEY, F.R.S.
 Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.
 Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS.
 Miss HALDANE.

Mr. E. W. H. MILLAR (Secretary).

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G., called and examined.

50,537. (Chairman.) My lord, you held the office of Lord Chancellor from 1905 to 1912?—Yes.

50,538. In that office you were responsible for the control of the legal departments generally, and for appointments to a great number of legal posts?—There were some that were in other hands, but generally speaking that is right.

50,539. The Commission have had evidence as to the system of appointment to the legal offices which it will be convenient to recall. The Lord Chancellor has the appointment to the greater number, but in the Probate Division the President of the division appoints to all posts; the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls have the right of appointment to certain posts, and the judges have the appointment, of course, of their own personal clerks, and also certain judges have the right of appointing clerks of assize?—That is so.

50,540. The Commission have decided that the judges, and also the County Court judges, are outside their reference. We would therefore ask you in dealing with the questions that come up to-day to treat them apart from the question of the judges and the County Court judges. The first point on which we should like to have your opinion is on the question of the system of appointment—whether the present system is completely satisfactory, and, if not, whether any change should be made?—I believe that the present system has produced satisfactory appointments in the sense that the work is properly done. I have not heard many, if any, complaints about the way in which the work is done; but I do not like the present system of appointment, and I think it might be with advantage altered. As regards the Lord Chancellor, who has the responsibility for the appointments, he is a very very busy man, and I do not believe that any human being, with the different things he has to do, could possibly exercise the close personal supervision which, I think, ought to be applied to any department of the State in the way of making appointments. I do not think it is enough to say that the appointments on the whole are satisfactory and efficient—which I think they are on the whole—but I think it is also desirable that the system should not be such as to provoke discontent either among the people employed in the office or the public. For that reason, but not because of any inefficiency that has been brought to my notice, I should prefer that the whole of those appointments which do not partake of a judicial character should be in the hands of a Board or Committee—that is, all the offices in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, as well as those in the gift of the judges, other than what I call personal appointments.

50,541. You would exclude the judges' personal clerks?—Certainly. All the appointments of what I call a public character, I myself should desire to see placed in the hands of a Board or of a Committee.

50,542. Before going further into the question of the nature of the Board or Committee, could you tell us whether, in the exercise of the duty of appointment, you have found yourself exposed to pressure, or attempts at pressure, from outside, either of a personal or political character?—Not very much of a personal character, and after a little time not very much of a political character; but for a period there was a good deal of what I would call political pressure attempted.

50,543. That applied, I suppose, mainly to the more important appointments?—Entirely, I think, to the more important appointments; but I ought to say that I do not think it was so marked on the legal side as it was on other sides. I mean the legal appointments were less the subject of political solicitation than others.

50,544. In the case of the minor appointments, did you find that there was much in the nature of personal solicitation?—No, very little. I do not think, in regard to the minor appointments, there was much. The beginning is not an object of very great ambition; to begin at 100*l.* a year with a prospect of rising to 600*l.* a year when you are an old man is not very tempting, and I do not think those appointments are very much coveted; and besides that, promotions are practically by seniority, and therefore there is no trouble in regard to that.

50,545. Then, taking the question on the whole, you would suggest that the appointments should be in the hands of a Board?—I think so, or a Committee—I do not care what you call it.

50,546. What are your views as to the composition of such a committee?—I would take as a specimen the Central Office: I would have for that, in the first place, a representative of the Treasury, because he would be able to tell you whether economies might be effected, and whether it was necessary to fill up the place at all.

50,547. On that point is it not the case that before any post is filled up it is necessary that the vacancy should be reported to the Lord Chancellor, and that the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury should agree that the place ought to be filled up?—I do not think that is what I may call an effective working arrangement; because, having regard to all the different clerkships and so forth, you certainly do not reconsider each time whether a place is to be filled up.

50,548. We heard from Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie that notice had to be given and an interval of a month left before the appointment was made, in order that if any change was thought desirable the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury might have the opportunity of effecting such a change?—Very likely that is so, and I know there was constant communication between the Treasury and the permanent secretary, and he would bring to the Lord Chancellor's notice anything of importance which occurred. I mean Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie is absolutely the most economical and reliable person in matters of appointment that you can have, and he would in my time bring to my notice anything that was communicated to him; but, of course, in the ordinary way he would say, "Well, there is no room for economy," or "There is room for economy," and would treat it rather as a matter of routine unless something arose which required notice.

50,549. You think if the Treasury were actually represented on the Committee of Appointment, that would bring them into closer and more direct touch with the system of appointments?—I think, from the point of view of economy, it would be a most excellent provision, because the Treasury representative would then be closely in touch with the whole of the offices and with the system.

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

50,550. Besides the Treasury would you suggest that the Civil Service Commission should be represented upon the committee?—Yes, I think so, certainly, because they know all about the qualifications that are required.

50,551. And would you suggest that the department to which the appointment was to be made should be represented by the head of that department?—I should not object to that, and, indeed, in one sense, it would be most desirable, because the heads of the departments in this country, I believe, are very trustworthy men; in fact, they are among the best men in the country. The only thing I feel about that is, that it might rather tend to leave the future of the whole of the staff, numbering in some cases hundreds, largely in the hands of one man, and I have a sort of feeling that compartments which are too tight are a mistake.

50,552. You are speaking now of the question of promotion after a man has entered the office?—Yes, that is what I am thinking about. For the first appointment it would be desirable in the last degree that the heads of departments should be represented, and, I think, one might very fairly be on such committee.

50,553. At present are not promotions made largely upon the recommendation of the head of the department?—I have no doubt that is so, but promotion goes automatically mostly, does it not?

50,554. My doubt was whether the head of the department, as one member of a committee of four or five, would have a greater power of control over the destinies of the men in his department than he has at present when the promotions are made largely or solely upon his recommendation?—Very likely you are right. I have not had the practical experience of being the head of a department, and therefore your opinion is much more valuable than mine on a subject of that kind.

50,555. In any case you would assent to the view that the head of the department ought to be represented on the committee, at any rate, for the purpose of the first appointments?—I should not make any difficulty about that. I should quite accept that.

50,556. That is to say, in the case of the Central Office, for example, the senior master, I presume?—Yes.

50,557. On that point I should like to ask a question which is a little beside the main question we are considering. The senior master at present becomes senior master by lapse of time; he is actually the senior of the masters for the time being. The suggestion has been made in the course of evidence given, that there might be advantage if the post of senior master were one to which the appointment was made by selection and not purely by seniority. If additional functions were given to the post, that might strengthen the argument for a system of that kind. What would be your lordship's view on that point?—If you look at a privately-managed business you will find that the employer selects the best men. Of course there are prizes in a professional calling of that kind, and there are not so many prizes in the Civil Service, which is not highly paid. The ideal is, of course, to get the best man for the work, and I think I should like to have rather more liberty of selection and not quite so rigid a rule for promotion by seniority, provided that you get an unimpeachable authority who really can attend to it and knows what is going on himself, which, I venture to observe, is quite impossible by the Lord Chancellor. I have not counted the number of departments for which he is responsible and the number of persons employed in them, but anything like the idea of personal supervision in the promotion of the clerks is really, in practice, out of the question with a man who has got so many other things to do. Therefore I should like to see selection exercised—of course with due care—by people who would be able to master the whole of the departments, and who would be sensible Englishmen, and would never think of putting one man over another man's head without a real reason. That is what I should like to see.

50,558. Would you apply that principle to the selection of one of the masters for the post of senior master?—Yes, I think I would.

50,559. To go back to the question of the committee or the board, you have spoken now of a representative of the Treasury, a representative of the Civil Service Commission, and a representative of the department concerned. Would you suggest that the Lord Chancellor should be represented by his Permanent Secretary?—Yes, upon the whole I think I would. Although I do not want to impart a too official character to the committee, still I think he must always have great experience and knowledge, and I should like, if he is placed on a committee of that kind, that it should be understood that he is there as, in the present instance, Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, and not there as the Permanent Secretary. Sir Kenneth, for example, has an office of his own—the Crown Office—with which the Lord Chancellor has nothing whatever to do; it is his own affair altogether. Although he is also the Permanent Secretary he is an independent person so far as the Crown Office is concerned, I think. I should like to see him in the same status if he goes upon this committee.

50,560. Then would you suggest any outside element as well as the official elements of which you have spoken?—Yes. I should like to see also a solicitor of the highest standing and experience. I think he would bring in a very useful element, because these offices mostly deal with what is called "practice" more or less, and I think an experienced solicitor of high standing who would be in a position to snap his fingers at all the world, so to speak, if necessary, would be a very useful man. You would have to select him, of course, but there is an abundant number of people who would be quite able to fill such a position.

50,561. The work of solicitors brings them much more into contact with the offices of the courts than the work of barristers does?—Certainly.

50,562. So it would be natural to have a solicitor rather than a barrister for that purpose?—A solicitor is also a man of business. A barrister may be, I hope, a man of business in a sense, but what we are concerned with at the Bar is not to deal with the business side of life so much as the forensic and legal side.

50,563. And also solicitors have the practice and experience of managing a considerable staff for office work, and barristers have not that particular experience?—That is very true, and it is a very important additional qualification.

50,564. That would make a committee of five—the Treasury, the Civil Service Commission, the department concerned, the Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor, and a distinguished solicitor?—I should be content with that.

50,565. That, perhaps, would be large enough for the purpose?—I think so.

50,566. Is it your suggestion that that committee should make the appointment on its own authority, or recommend to the Lord Chancellor or to some other high authority?—I should like to see them make the appointments on their own responsibility, because I do not think it is desirable that the power should be in one place and the responsibility in another. I would prefer that if there was any single dissident among those five to any act that was done—and I do not think there would be often dissent—he should be at liberty to say, "Well, I disagree, and I would desire this matter to be laid before the Lord Chancellor for his decision." It would very seldom happen, but I think if, in regard to any appointment, things did come to that, it would be desirable that the Lord Chancellor should finally decide. Apart from that, I would give the responsibility where I gave the power, and the power where I gave the responsibility.

50,567. In that connection may I read to you one of Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie's statements to the Commission? He said, speaking of appointments to legal offices, "I have always thought that nobody ought to have the power of appointment who is not responsible to Parliament. The judges, of all people in the world, are those who are not responsible to Parliament, because it is contrary, I believe, to the rules of the House of Commons that you should even discuss what a judge does." He was speaking there of the question as between the Lord Chancellor, who is a responsible Minister, and the judges, as appointing authorities; but the point I would put to you is, whether the view that he expressed there would have any influence on the question of making the committee the ultimate appointing authority. The committee would not be directly responsible to Parliament in the way that a Minister is. Do you consider that any objection to making the committee the actual appointing authority?—We are all responsible to Parliament, and I hope always shall be—everybody is responsible to Parliament. But there is a technical sense of responsibility to Parliament in the position of a Minister of the Crown being a member of the Government, and it means in effect that he and his colleagues may be hauled over the coals more readily and more easily in the House of Commons. It also means that he and his colleagues are theoretically, at all events—I will not say anything about the practice—more liable to what I call pressure in the lobbies of the House of Commons, or elsewhere, in regard to appointments. If the purpose is to keep men responsible in the sense that they may be brought to book if they do wrong you cannot have too much responsibility to Parliament. If it means that the patronage should be unnecessarily placed in the hands of those who are peculiarly accessible to party and political considerations, I think the less you trust appointments to people in that position the better. I do not know if that answers your question. I should contemplate that the Committee or Board would be responsible in the sense that they would be blamed by public opinion and by Parliament if they went wrong; but I think it is very desirable that they should be kept out of the political system. That is one of the things that I should like most to see.

50,568. I think that answers my question, but I should like to add to it this: What would be the practical way, supposing an appointment by the proposed Board was open to criticism, of bringing it under criticism in the House of Commons? If a Minister is responsible it can be brought under criticism by moving a reduction in his salary. What would be the corresponding method in the case of a Board of this kind?—There would be no corresponding method, because there would be no salary, I take it, and it would not come before the House of Commons in that way at all, but the House of Commons can interpose whenever they think anything wrong is being done. I think the real remedy would be that this committee is not a permanent body. I should say they would be appointed for 12 months, and reappointed at the end of the 12 months by somebody—preferably by the Lord Chancellor, I think—and, if there was a complaint made (which I imagine would really never happen) in regard to the method of appointment, the thing could be mentioned in Parliament, even in the form of a question, and he could properly inquire into it, and it could be seen if the complaint was well founded or not. You must trust somebody in a matter of this sort, and that, subject to the control and constant control of Parliament, would, I think, adequately provide for fulfilling the responsibility.

50,569. Then you would say that there are ample means of scrutinising the actions of such a Board in Parliament, without having the technical method of moving a reduction of the Minister's salary?—I think so. A question will do a great deal, especially if there is a method of going to some one in whom you repose confidence.

50,570. I suppose, without being technically responsible for their actions, the Lord Chancellor would be the Minister, as the Minister who appointed the Board, who would deal with any Parliamentary question coming up as regards their actions?—If there was any suggestion of anything wrong being done, of course he would ask about it and inquire about it, and satisfy himself as to whether there had been a dereliction of duty. But these gentlemen would be independent men. In the same way with any office in the British Empire, if a man does not discharge his duty properly the Houses of Parliament can interfere. I do not think you can get anything more than that.

50,571. That suggests a question which was touched upon by Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, and which I should like to raise now, though it is off the main line. Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie pointed out that there was no Minister in the House of Commons whose official duty it was to represent the Lord Chancellor and deal with questions that might be raised regarding the departments under the control of the Lord Chancellor. Is it your opinion that there would be advantage in having a Minister specially charged with that duty?—Most decidedly.

50,572. Have you found practical inconvenience from not having a Minister in that position?—There must always be an inconvenience, naturally. The Lord Chancellor is concerned in different Bills. In happy times, when there is more time available for Parliament to consider things, there are a number of small Bills which are opposed only by quite small vested interests, or opposed by people who have got theories or fancies, and the mischief of not being able to pass small Bills—Departmental Bills if you like to call them so—is very great. You cannot expect that, with the best will, your colleagues will associate themselves with your department; they have plenty to do with their own, and the result is, I think, apt to be, that if a legal Bill belonging to the Lord Chancellor's department comes forward, although he may have plenty of goodwill from his colleagues, they really have a great deal of their own work to do, and they are not familiar with his office, and, in fact, those Bills are apt to go among the innocents that are massacred at the end of a session. In the second place, I think it is desirable that, when any questions arise about the administration of the Lord Chancellor's office, of which there were certainly some in my time, he should have someone there who is known to represent him, and who would be able to put forward practically first hand, from knowledge of the interior, the real answer. As I say, I do not think the want of that direct representation can be compensated for by any degree of goodwill among his colleagues; they have their own business to attend to, and they are very hard-worked, most of them.

50,573. Going back to the question of the committee, to sum up your suggestion, it is this: A committee of five persons representing the Treasury, the Civil Service Commission, the head of the department concerned, the Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor in his personal capacity, and an eminent solicitor?—Yes.

50,574. That committee would make all the appointments—other than those of judges and County Court judges, which the Commission are excluding from their consideration—which are at present made by the Lord Chancellor or any of the judges?—Yes.

50,575. And it would also deal with all questions of promotions in the legal departments?—Yes.

50,576. There would be an appeal to the Lord Chancellor on the motion of any one or more members of the committee?—Yes.

50,577. And in such cases the Lord Chancellor's decision would be binding?—Yes.

50,578. You suggest also that the Board should be appointed year by year?—Yes.

50,579. And its composition would vary to this extent, that for each different department to which an appointment was to be made, you would have a different representative?—Yes, or if the task is too heavy to deal what I may call intimately with each department, then you might have more Boards or Committees than one, but I do not anticipate that it would be so, and I think you would get willing assistance from the gentlemen of the class I have mentioned.

50,580. Turning more particularly to the question of the clerks in the offices as distinguished from the masters, registrars, and other high officers, the question has been raised whether the present system, under which in almost all the offices appointments are made in the first instance to the third class and to the higher classes by promotion from the third class, is the best, or whether it would be desirable to create a separate grade for the lower and more mechanical work without any prospect of rising, unless it were in very exceptional circumstances, beyond that grade, and to make direct appointments to the higher grades for the more important work. What is your opinion as to that suggestion?—I must preface what I say by this observation; of course, my knowledge, and necessarily so I think, of the actual work that is done in each of the offices is limited. Nobody could tell you more fully or better about that than Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie, who, I am sure, has the whole thing at his fingers' ends. My belief is that in some, at all events, of these departments there is a good deal of practically mechanical work, and there is an element of more important work requiring more education and capacity. The present system is, that you bring a man in—I will take again as a specimen the Central Office—at 100*l.* a year, and then the man who is appointed goes up practically by so much increase of salary each year, from the third class into the second class, and then into the first class. I am all in favour of keeping every place open to the best men, so as to encourage men to do their duty; but I should be disposed to draw a line and make two grades, in the first instance at all events, for those who do and are suited for the merely mechanical work, and for those who have more education and more capacity; and I would, I think, have the mechanical men rising to salaries proportionate to the kind of work they are really expected to do, and which they do all their lives, and the others rising to salaries proportionate to the kind of work that they have to do. That is what I should do, but always reserving the right, and, indeed bearing in mind the wisdom of making a perfectly open door from one grade to another grade, so that merit shall have its full reward. It comes to this, that you have the State employing a great number of people. Any private employer would have messengers, for instance, or clerks who are merely copying clerks, and at the same time he would have in his business other men from whom he would expect a much better paid kind of service; but if he was a wise man he would always have his eyes open and be vigilant to find the merit in the lower grade wherever it could be found by self-improvement, by self-education, and so forth, and by meritorious service, and be glad to encourage the whole office by promoting such when occasion arose. That is the sort of ideal that I should aim at, being conscious that ideals very often are not realised.

50,581. (Mr. Coward.) But he would have his eyes open outside as well as inside his office?—Certainly, I quite agree with that.

50,582. (Chairman.) You would recruit the lower grade on the supposition that normally they would not proceed beyond that grade, and you would aim at getting men who would be content not to go beyond that; but if there was a case of exceptional merit, where a man by personal qualities and education was suited to go to the higher grades, you would leave the door open for him to go?—Certainly.

50,583. Then for the higher grades you would recruit independently, and from the outside?—I would leave it to the committee to do so, always remembering that they have a double problem to solve. The first is to get the best men you can get to do the work of the State, and the second thing is to keep the whole staff, as far as you can, satisfied that they will be rewarded, and that their claims will be fully considered. It is impossible to lay down a formula under which you would act; good sense, fairplay, and goodwill would have to be employed, of course. But I would leave that part of discretion to such a body; and the wider the discretion that you leave to a body of men who have to appoint, the more desirable it is that the public should be completely satisfied that the men are independent and fair-minded, and representative of the best class of men you can get to exercise those functions.

50,584. On the other hand, if you are not to have discontent in the lower grade, would not it be important to have a definite understanding when the men come in as to what their prospects of promotion are—whether the normal course of promotion is to be from that grade to the higher grade, or whether it is to be in exceptional cases?—I certainly should have it clearly understood. There are a number of people, and most excellent people, who discharge humble duties, as you might call them—for instance, the messengers, ushers, and people who look after things in the Royal Courts of Justice—but they are employed for that kind of purpose, and they are well paid; and I think those people ought to be well paid, so that they shall be thoroughly satisfied, and, I think, they do not expect to be made clerks.

50,585. The present system, under which a man who is ultimately destined to do work of a better and more intelligent kind is employed for the first 10 or 15 years of his service on purely mechanical work, is not satisfactory in that respect?—I do not think it is. You are mixing up two things—the mechanical work and the other work. I cannot say it is unsatisfactory in all senses, but the effect of it is that you do not get such a good class of man as I think you would get if you were to have two grades, because you mix up the duties which are partly mechanical and partly of a higher kind.

50,586. If that organisation were applied the question arises whether you would make the appointment purely a matter of selection by the committee or whether you would bring in examination in the method of selection. What is your opinion as to that?—It is quite certain that you must have examination for all those whom you employ for other than mechanical work. Competitive examination, of course, is one of those things the merits and demerits of which have been constantly disputed, and it is a very large subject; but I suppose the chief merit of competitive examination is that you say, "Well, there you are; you have passed the best examination, and we have no more to say." I am not at all sure that it necessarily follows that you get the best man, because you can examine a man effectually as regards his intellectual attainments, although even there I am not sure that the man with the best intellectual attainments always passes the best examination; but you cannot examine for the other qualifications which I would put under the general term "character." The ideal system would be the one under which you get the best and most competent and able man, and also a man whom you feel you can rely upon and who has the qualities which a mere intellectual education cannot give.

50,587. Were you speaking of the second class as it now exists, or the lower grade in the future?—I was thinking of the second class, but it would be better to speak of the upper grade to describe more accurately what I want to convey. In regard to that there is a question which ought to be borne in mind. For that kind of work, I believe that those who have had some legal experience already are decidedly useful, and yet they are taken largely from solicitors' clerks. These men, if they were chosen, would no doubt be excellent and good men who would do their duty, and so forth, and who have had experience, but then many of them have come quite young into a solicitor's office and had to do hard work while they were there; they have been taken away from education, unless it be continuation schools, and they have not had the same opportunities that others outside have had, and therefore, if they were to enter into competitive examination on general subjects of education with others of the same age who had had more advantages, they might be the better men to get from the point of view of the office, but at the same time they probably could not compete in any examination at all. For that reason, having ex hypothesi your trustworthy reliable Board, I should give them a fairly wide discretion to take in men, for example, of that class, always subject, of course, to a qualifying examination. I mean on the whole, on the legal side, I would not push competitive examination too far, for the reason that I have stated—for the benefit of the public service.

50,588. Taking the case of the lower grade, you point out that competitive examination does not necessarily test qualities of character. In the case of a young man of 18 or 19 coming into that grade, would a committee of selection be able effectually to test character by any other means?—They would see him, and they would hear about him. But what you are asking now is really about the way to choose people of the same kind as those you would employ as messengers, for instance—it really is very much the same thing.

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

50,589. They would be in rather a different class from that, would they not, because their work would be entirely of a clerical character; it would be dealing with legal papers, filing them, keeping books, keeping records, and so forth. It would be of a more distinctly clerical character than the work of a messenger?—As I said, I am not sufficiently familiar with the details of the work of the offices to be able to say, but there is a certain amount of almost purely mechanical work—stamping writs, for instance, may be a specimen. You would have to discriminate between the one class of work and the other. For example, in my experience of the work such as the work of messengers and work of that kind, I always gave about 90 per cent. or 80 per cent. at least to men who had got first class characters in the Army and the Navy. I remember once receiving from my friend Mr. Haldane a request to know whether I would give 50 per cent. of the appointments of that kind to men in the Army and the Navy, and I said that I would, if he wished it, but at present I gave them between 80 and 90 per cent.—which I think is the proper way. You get men of that stamp and that class. In that way you have the best means of knowing what stamp of man you are to get into your employment.

50,590. That is the case of men who in their previous service, if they have done well and shown good qualities, have already satisfied a test?—Yes.

50,591. My difficulty is rather this: In the case of young men at the beginning of their career who are entering the third class, while admitting that examination is an imperfect test of character, is scrutiny by a committee and a quarter of an hour's interview combined with testimonials any better test of character than selecting by examination a few out of a very large number of candidates?—You are putting a problem, and we are trying to meet the difficulty. The thing is a very difficult one at all times, and that it cannot be absolutely satisfactorily solved is very likely, but I am thinking of the best way to try and solve it. For example, I had better tell you the sort of thing I should do if I were on the committee: I should look to the Army and Navy for one class of work, and for the other work I should find out from great employers by asking about this man or that man, in regard to the way they have acted and done their work in the industry with which they were concerned. That is the sort of thing I mean.

50,592. That would hardly apply to young men quite at the beginning of their career—men coming straight from their education?—I do not know that you would necessarily take men of 18 or 19. I think I should prefer taking men at 22, 23, or 24, who had given some proof that they were trustworthy and good fellows; but that is, of course, confined to whatever may be the ambit of practically mechanical employment.

50,593. So on the whole you would prefer selection by a committee with a qualifying examination to any form of selection by competitive examination?—Not altogether. Are you speaking of the lower grade?

50,594. I understood your opinion to apply generally, but do you distinguish between the two grades?—I was thinking of the lower grade. For the upper grade I think it should be competitive examination with a considerable discretion to bring in from the outside those who had not been able, so to speak, to qualify themselves for success in a competitive examination in those particular offices.

50,595. That is to say, you would fill them sometimes by competitive examination in matters of general education, and sometimes by selection on the ground of actual legal experience in a solicitor's office or otherwise?—Yes, I was thinking of the legal experience, to acquire which a man disqualifies himself from being able to compete successfully in an open examination. I was thinking of that for the upper grade.

50,596. And having acquired that experience he would probably have reached an age at which he is becoming less examinable?—I do not know what you consider an examinable age, but I suppose it is about 25 or 26.

50,597. That is about the age at which the Chief Civil Service Commissioner put it?—I suppose that is the limit of the examinable age, probably.

50,598. At present there is no fixed age for retirement, either in the case of the higher officers, such as masters or registrars, or in the case of the clerical staff. Are you in favour of fixing an age limit for retirement?—Yes. I think the Civil Service rule is satisfactory, which is, I believe, optional retirement at 60, compulsory retirement at 65, subject to a power to ask that the employee shall continue, and there is a final limit at 70.

50,599. That is so, and in the case of any prolongation after 65 a minute has to be laid on the table of the House stating the reason?—I should be disposed in legal offices, perhaps, a little to extend the last limit at the discretion of the committee, but upon that I am sure you would know better than I.

50,600. Would you apply those limits to the masters and registrars as well as to the clerical staff?—I think so.

50,601. A suggestion has been made by some witnesses that a somewhat higher limit is suitable in the case of the semi-judicial offices on the ground that in the first place a man is generally appointed to such a position later in life, and therefore has a shorter tenure, and, secondly, I think on the ground that the work being of a judicial character and not of a character which requires initiative, the necessary qualities of judgment and decision upon matters put before one do not diminish with age in the same way as qualities of initiative do?—I think myself that in regard to any judicial office, provided a man retains his health and faculties unimpaired, and is able to do his work, the older he is very often the better he is. But of course there is a limit to that like everything else. If I remember rightly there was a Commission with regard to the judges, on which Mr. Coward sat, and their recommendation was that the age should be 72, and that would be very good sense, it seems to me. I should say that probably for judicial offices it should be 72 years. In the case of semi-judicial offices, like masters, which are largely judicial, I think very likely you might treat them the same as the judges, and make the age 72, but I would like to have the power always in these quasi-judicial offices so that the person concerned might be asked to continue.

50,602. Turning to the question of organisation, we have had evidence about the Chancery chambers and the office of the Chancery registrars, and the question has come up whether those two offices ought not to be amalgamated. When your Lordship was Lord Chancellor you appointed a committee to examine into question of the Chancery registrars, and previous Commissions had reported on the same subject. The previous Commissions reported in favour of such amalgamation, but the majority of the committee which you appointed reported against it, though a minority reported in favour of it. The number of registrars has been reduced as the result of that committee but the offices still remain separate. Can you tell us what your opinion is on that point?—I thought myself that an amalgamation would be desirable. The committee that I appointed, I think, recommended a reduction in the number of registrars, and either I asked Parliament to do it and they consented, or else I did it off my own bat—I have forgotten which—but they were reduced from 12 to 8. I always think it is undesirable to multiply what I might call fissures between different departments. I think if the work is kindred work, the wider area you have of activity for each department the better it is for the public service. I believe, although not professing to have a very clear recollection on the subject, that all the different committees reported that it would be desirable to amalgamate the offices; but when I was speaking of amalgamation and changes of this kind you will understand that in that case, as in others, one always must bear in mind the existence of existing interests of men who have been allowed to enter a professional calling with fixed prospects, and that you have no right, in my opinion, to disturb them without doing full justice to those who are in the offices already. But I think it would be desirable to amalgamate.

50,603. A somewhat similar question arose with regard to the different Lunacy departments. There is the department of the Masters in Lunacy and of the Chancery Visitors in Lunacy, and also the large separate department of what used to be the Lunacy Commission and is now called the Board of Control?—Yes.

50,604. As regards the Board of Control and its union with the two legal Lunacy departments, that question, perhaps, is prejudged by the fact that Parliament has recently legislated on the subject and has not effected an amalgamation; but the narrower question arises as to whether the offices of the Masters and the Visitors in Lunacy ought not to be brought into closer relation with one another and made part of the same organisation?—You mean the Masters and the Lord Chancellor's Visitors. I know nothing at all about the Board of Control, I have not followed what was done. In my time I was anxious to amalgamate the Lord Chancellor's Visitors and Masters who are one department with the Lunacy Commissioners as they existed at that time. I have forgotten the particulars, but I know Bills were brought in, and I think an Act was passed leaving out the character of Hamlet in the play of "Hamlet," that is leaving out the amalgamation. That, I think, was just at the end of my time. But your question is on quite a different point—the relation between the visitors and the masters. I do not think I had brought to my attention in my term of office any particular grievance in regard to that. If you will indicate to me what is the nature of the difficulty that has arisen I will do my best to answer you.

50,605. I do not know that the evidence that we have had goes so far as to say that an actual difficulty has arisen, but the point is this: The principal work of the visitors is obtaining information as to the condition and circumstances of lunatics on which the masters have to act. At present they are entirely independent of the masters; the masters make requests to them to visit certain lunatics, but as regards the whole organisation of their work and their office, and so forth, they are independent of the masters, and responsible only to the Lord Chancellor. The question was whether they ought not to be made part of the masters' organisation, and responsible to them as inspectors are generally responsible to the executive head. That was a point which was put to Master Theobald, and he expressed an opinion in favour of a change of that kind, and expressed the opinion also that if that were done it probably would be possible to modify the present system of visitors largely in the direction of decentralisation, and making it more local?—As regards the relation between the masters and visitors, I should like to go more closely into it before expressing an opinion, because it would depend upon what happened in the office; but as regards decentralisation, there are two things that I most wish in regard to that and other Lunacy departments. The first is decentralisation in order that there may be local supervision available without the necessity of getting someone from London; and the second is the employment of women in connection with the Lunacy system of the country—the large employment of women—because I cannot imagine anything more desirable than that those poor things should have someone of their own sex in authority to deal with. Those are the two things that I care most about in regard to that. So far as regards what you say that Master Theobald, who is a very high authority, thinks that there also ought to be some change in the relation with a view to decentralisation, I think, without going closely into it, he already having done so, it would be presumptuous on my part to express too confident an opinion; but the object of decentralisation is, to my mind, eminently desirable for the convenience of constant supervision.

50,606. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) Would you apply this Board of Selection to the appointments for purely clerical work of a not very important character?—I think so.

50,607. What reason is there why, in the legal departments, you should depart from the very general practice of the Civil Service of appointing to clerical posts by means of open competition?—There is not any very strong ground at all. I did not realise that that was the practice in the Civil Service in general for purely clerical work; but if it is—and I have no doubt it works well or it would not have been continued—I should not make any difficulty about that.

50,608. It was suggested to you that there might be some re-organisation of the clerkships, and that there might be a lower grade and a higher grade, and the work of the lower grade would be of an inferior and not very important nature. Would you consider it to be necessary in the case of applicants for posts in the lower grade that they should have some experience in a solicitor's office?—You mean in the lower grade, the work of which is practically mechanical?

50,609. Yes, something, I take it, corresponding to the work of the third class clerk now?—I want to answer your question, but it assumes something which I am not quite sure I should assent to. The work of the third class clerk is mixed, is it not? The man who goes into the third class has to do the mechanical work, but he will also have a certain amount of other work to do, will he not?

50,610. I should think that he will do rather more important work than would be expected from the proposed lower grade, seeing that he is eligible for promotion to much more important work?—That conveys what I mean.

50,611. But assuming that the new lower grade was to be confined generally to doing work of a routine character, would you still consider it to be necessary that they should have had this legal experience?—I think in that case they would not require legal experience. I was thinking of the legal experience as rather appertaining to what one may call the upper grade, if it is right to call it upper and lower—I mean the more advanced grade.

50,612. Are you familiar with the system which obtains in some departments in regard to appointments to the Civil Service of what is known as limited competition; that is to say, that the applicants must furnish evidence of experience of the necessary kind, and then amongst those who have satisfied that preliminary condition there should be a competitive examination. How would that strike you as a suitable method for appointing to the proposed upper division, or something corresponding to the second or first class clerkships?—Of course, that brings up the whole question of competitive examination. Pray do not think that I am an enemy of competitive examination, because I think it solves your difficulty on one side of it; it puts an end to discontent; and it puts an end to favouritism, and, what is equally important, to the suspicion of unfairness and favouritism. It has all those merits, and I fully and frankly admit them, and probably it is the only solution; but, at the same time, if you ask me, I do not think, as I think I have already said, that you necessarily get the best men. I mean, in the subjects of examination a man may be master of all those things, and you do not necessarily get the best men. What one would like would be something like you have indicated—a sort of mixture in a way so as to leave a little freer hand to the authorities who appoint than requiring them to obey absolutely the result of the competitive examination.

50,613. Did I understand aright that you would give to this suggested committee the right to make promotions?—I think so.

50,614. Do you think they would have sufficient knowledge?—Always subject to existing interests; they would have to be regarded in that case also. You would have to remember that you had got men in on a particular footing, and would rather keep to that.

50,615. Supposing we take the case of promotion from, say, a second class to a first class clerkship: do you think that this committee, constituted as it would be wholly—apart from the head of the department—

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

of men who had no practical knowledge of the working of the office and of the personnel of the staff, would be qualified to come to a decision as to who is the most suitable person to be promoted?—Yes, I think so. Whether they had the head of the department as a member, which I am quite prepared to assent to, or whether they consulted him, they would always be able to learn all about the office, and they would choose fairly, I think. You see what the alternative is: A public department is different from a private business; the best results are produced in a private business because a man can choose exactly whom he likes, and he has the motive of self-interest. You cannot have it the same way in a public department; but I should like to get rather near to it, if I could. I think they would be able to choose.

50,616. This committee of yours, of course, would not be a whole-time committee?—No.

50,617. They would meet occasionally when some appointment had to be made or some promotion considered?—Yes.

50,618. Part of this Royal Commission which inquired into the general Civil Service made a recommendation for the appointment of a department of the Treasury which would be composed of men who devoted all their time to the work, and their functions would be to become acquainted with the organisation and personnel of all the Government departments, and they should be the authority for determining promotions and suggesting reorganisation, and the like. This, of course, may come quite new to you, and you may therefore not be willing to express an opinion upon it at the moment?—I was not aware of it.

50,619. But how would that strike you as being a suitable body to deal with the legal departments also?—Of course I do not know the composition of the Board or Committee that you propose to appoint, and I have not heard of it before, and I do not know anything about it; but for legal business, remember, you are dealing with what one may call professional subjects rather. I do not know that the committee from the Treasury, which you suggest, would not do the work perfectly well; I quite believe that they would be independent and fair and all that, but they would not have legal experience. Now just see what the committee which I suggest has: It has the legal experience, in the first instance, of a solicitor; it has the legal experience of the permanent secretary of the Lord Chancellor; it has the legal experience of the head of the department—that is, three out of the five would have some sort of legal knowledge. Really if you are dealing with legal reforms of any kind, or legal business, it is very valuable to have some people who are familiar with legal business as they know the kind of thing that is wanted.

50,620. Who would you have to appoint this committee—the Lord Chancellor?—I suggested the Lord Chancellor.

50,621. Then would not the final responsibility in any case rest with him for the actions of this committee?—It seems to me not. He would appoint that committee and would be responsible for the appointment of the committee, but would not be responsible for what they did.

50,622. But is not the Prime Minister in the House of Commons responsible for the action of any committee which he appoints?—I should think not. If the Prime Minister appointed this Royal Commission, for instance, or other Royal Commissions, of one of which I am a member, or a committee, it would be rather hard on him to say that he was held responsible.

50,623. Technically the King appoints a Royal Commission, and therefore that might relieve the Prime Minister from responsibility?—No. I beg most respectfully to dissent from that. The responsible Minister alone is to be charged and to be hanged if necessary.

50,624. But in the case of a committee appointed, say, by the Home Secretary, the Home Secretary would be responsible to Parliament for the actions of that committee, or could be criticised?—I should think not.

(Lord Mersey.) I am not aware of that, but it may be true.

50,625. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) The question, at any rate, could be addressed to the Home Secretary in regard to the actions of the committee?—Certainly, he would inform the House of what they had done, but he might say, "Heaven forbid that I should agree with "this view."

50,626. You quite admit the need for being able to raise in Parliament any questions about the actions of this committee; for instance, supposing they were charged with having been guilty of an abuse of patronage, there ought to be some means by which that question could be raised in Parliament?—Yes; and so it can, theoretically, and in the fullest constitutional sense. The only thing that one has to bear in mind in dealing with this question is, that the House of Commons has not got the time and has not got the opportunity to do many things which one might perhaps wish that they had the opportunity and time to do. That is a thing one cannot help.

50,627. But if the Lord Chancellor is responsible for the appointment of this committee annually, it seems to me that his must be the responsibility to Parliament; but the difficulty that I want to try to get over, and to see if you can assist me in any way upon, is how the matter could be raised in the House of Commons, seeing that the Lord Chancellor is not represented by any subordinate there?—You are touching upon a thing which, when I was in the House of Commons, for a long time had been a subject of complaint, and that is that the Lord Chancellor is the one Minister whose salary is not voted by the House of Commons as Lord Chancellor. My impression is that his salary as speaker of the House of Lords, which is a separate matter, is on the Votes, but I will not be sure about that. The consequence is that you cannot get at the Lord Chancellor easily in the House of Commons. It has been a complaint very often, but the reason is that after all the poor man is a judge, so the House of Commons can never get at a judge unless they move for a committee to inquire into his conduct, and then move an Address to the Crown to remove him. That is the peculiarity of any high judicial position.

50,628. I see a difficulty of raising any matter as to the action of this committee by means of a question in the House of Commons, but I see no difficulty in raising it on one of the Estimates, because the salary of the person who has been appointed to any post will appear upon the Estimate, and therefore it seems to me that it could be raised there?—It could be, if you had time.

50,629. But still, I quite agree with what you said, that it is very useful sometimes to raise these matters by means of questions, because you can do it without having to wait for an opportunity on the Estimates, which never may come. Therefore I would like to be satisfied before assenting to this proposal for the appointment of such a committee, that there would be some easy means by which they could be made responsible to the House of Commons, or the Lord Chancellor, as the person appointing them?—The whole purpose of what I suggested was to get a method of appointment under which people would not think that it was all in the hands of one man who could not attend to it, and that the private claims of members of the public were not sufficiently considered.

50,630. I was rather surprised to hear you say that there was not much competition for these minor appointments—I suppose you meant the third class clerkships?—What I said, I think, was that there had not been much or any political pressure that I knew of for appointments to these third class clerkships. I think there is a good deal of competition for them.

50,631. Have you always a very long waiting list?—I think so.

50,632. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) Have you noticed that a great many personal rights of patronage in the legal departments are protected by statute?—I know there are some. Do you mean protected by statute so that a particular person must appoint?

50,633. Yes?—Yes, there are.

50,634. In that respect the legal departments are entirely unlike the ordinary Civil Service, where regulations are made by Orders in Council?—The legal departments are different, as you say, in that respect. It used to be otherwise.

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

50,635. The change you propose to us of the substitution of a committee for a number of high officers in making the appointments would involve, therefore, quite a considerable amount of legislation?—It would.

50,636. And that legislation would not have much chance of getting through the House, unless His Majesty's Government made a rather serious effort in that direction?—I should think it is very likely. I really do not know what effort would be required. I cannot gauge that.

50,637. You have told us that you did not find legislation with regard to legal reforms in your time easy—Hamlet was apt to be left out of the piece, you said?—It was on more than one occasion. That was really through the pressure of time. That is what it really came to.

50,638. Because of that a definite effort would be required to legislate?—I cannot measure the extent of the effort, but it would have to pass through the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

50,639. When it is done, do you think it would be better to fix it again by further statutes, or would it be better to make the new arrangements by Orders in Council, which can be modified under experience?—I should not mind, but you would require a statute empowering the Order in Council to be made. I think that might be a good way of doing it. Once you put it under an Order in Council, a reform of this character, if it be a reform, is more flexible; you can change it and improve upon it, learning by experience, and I think you might be quite sure that Orders in Council would be carried out in complete good faith.

50,640. Then you propose that the committee shall not deal with any offices which partake of a judicial character?—I do not think I said that. Take the office of Master, for example: that is an office of a quasi judicial character, largely judicial. I do not mean to exclude those offices.

50,641. Then I must have misunderstood you. You would include the registrarships and masterships in the offices, the appointments to which are regulated by this committee?—Yes, I would.

50,642. (Chairman.) I understood that the committee would apply to all offices except judges of the Supreme Court and County Court judges?—There may be some offices that I have overlooked, but, broadly speaking the answer is, yes.

50,643. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) But there would be excluded from the purview of this committee what you call the personal appointments by the judges?—Yes.

50,644. Then it would be necessary to make a perfectly definite list showing unmistakably what were those personal appointments?—I think it amounts to what used to be called and are still called body clerks.

50,645. Would you include the judge's marshal?—I certainly would not. Let me tell you what a judge's marshal is. A judge goes for six weeks, or it may be seven weeks, away on circuit, and he is alone unless there happen to be two judges. If he is married he does not take his wife with him, as a rule, and he is destitute of all the charms of domestic life. Whether it is right or whether it is wrong, he is allowed to pay 80*l.* a circuit—something like 10*l.* a week—to a young gentleman, who has to go and keep him company, talk to him, and walk with him, and all that. Surely you would not have competitive examination for that.

50,646. There are the judge's personal clerk and his marshal?—He takes with him his clerk and his marshal.

50,647. Is there anyone else besides the clerk and the marshal?—No, unless it is his wife.

50,648. She is not paid out of public funds, but the clerk and the marshal are so paid?—The clerk is paid 400*l.* a year. I never was one of the judges myself, but I think the marshal gets about 70*l.* each circuit, and then the thing is at an end.

50,649. But you are clear that the clerks of assize ought to be brought under the purview of this committee?—Certainly.

50,650. That would require another piece of legislation, as their appointment is also protected by statute?—That is so; by statute, I know, because I had occasion to look it up once.

50,651. You told us that the Lord Chancellor, in your experience, is an extremely busy man, who cannot know the details of the vast number of departments for which he is responsible at present?—I did not know them myself, or, at least, I have forgotten them.

50,652. Therefore your statement that, as far as you know, the work in all these departments is satisfactorily done, must be taken with the caution that we cannot ask you to know all the details of all the departments?—The caution is most necessary. If you knew the number of departments you would know that I cannot be expected to know, but I think you will find, if you ask any solicitor, or any person acquainted with it, that the work is fairly well done.

50,653. But if, for instance, there was a master in the Probate Registry who was past his work, the Lord Chancellor would not necessarily know that fact?—The Lord Chancellor has nothing to do with the Probate Registry, and has no jurisdiction over it. He certainly would spare himself from any such knowledge under these circumstances.

50,654. But it might happen that an official here, or an official there, was in fact past his work without it being anybody's business to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to that fact?—It could not be anybody's business to call the Lord Chancellor's attention to it, because he has nothing to do with the Probate Department.

50,655. But what do you say with regard to other departments for which he is responsible?—Anybody might draw attention to anything of that kind if he liked.

50,656. In the Civil Service generally, by the Act of 1859, there is an express rule that no one is to be appointed to a pensionable office except on the certificate of the Civil Service Commission; that is to say, no one is to be appointed to a pensionable office unless he submits to some kind of medical inspection, to which he would have to submit if his life was going to be insured. But in the case of the legal offices a clause in the Act of 1879 states that the Lord Chancellor may from time to time, with the concurrence of the Treasury, revoke and alter orders declaring that this section shall not be applied to any office or class of office. Did you use that power yourself when you were Lord Chancellor?—I am sure I did not, because it has always been the rule. If an order was required, it was made by somebody before me. If it was so in the Civil Service generally, it has never been so in practice as regards judicial offices.

50,657. Would you agree that with regard to all appointments to pensionable offices, putting aside, of course, His Majesty's judges, it is to the interest of the State and no derogation to a man concerned that he should submit to a medical examination?—I have not thought about it. I do not see any objection. Perhaps the man might refuse, but I do not know.

50,658. We had before us the other day a very distinguished gentleman, who was Master in Lunacy, and who almost at once after his appointment—I think within a year after—unfortunately became stone blind. If he had been submitted to due certification before appointment he might have been warned that his eyesight was failing?—If the symptoms then were that his eyesight was likely to fail, he no doubt would have been warned. I am quite sure that the gentleman you refer to, as soon as his eyesight became an impediment to his work, sent in his resignation to me, and I declined to accept the resignation, because I thought it was in the public interest that it should not be accepted; and I may say that although it was my responsibility wholly, I remember receiving from one of the Lords Justices, who has the supervision of his work, a very urgent letter begging of me not to deprive the public of the value of his services, as he was a most valuable public servant. I should have refused to receive the resignation in any case.

50,659. A list has been made out for us of the appointments of the higher type made by your lordship?—I have not the least objection to such a list. I hope you have all the information you desire.

50,660. There was a request made that if any member of the Commission wished to ask about any particular

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

appointment you might have notice of it?—I did make that request.

50,661. The list contains four appointments of masters in Chancery chambers, and I wish to ask you was Master R. T. Watkin Williams the son of a judge? —Yes, he was the son of a judge who died more than 30 years ago.

50,662. Was Master J. H. Chitty the son of a judge? —I have ascertained that he was the son of Lord Justice Chitty, who, I think, died 10 or 15 years ago.

50,663. Finally, the list contains the name of the secretary in one of the Lunacy departments—Mr. R. C. Reid. Is Mr. R. C. Reid a relation of yours?—He is; and will you let me tell you a little more? I have had my memory refreshed upon that. He is my nephew, and he was assistant private secretary to Lord Ripon until Lord Ripon's resignation of office or death, I forget which, and I might say that Lord Ripon employed him without knowing that he was my nephew. He did, I believe, very well. I then employed him myself as assistant private secretary at a time of pressure, and paid his salary myself. In 1912 a vacancy arose in the office of Secretary to the Visitors, because the Lunacy Commissioners had chosen Mr. Dickinson, who was then the visitors' secretary. I decided not to fill it up by any permanent appointment, because I was then engaged in amalgamating the Lunacy Commissioners and the Lord Chancellor's visitors, and I thought that I could effect this amalgamation very soon, and one secretary would do for the amalgamated departments. So I left it in the ordinary course to Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie to procure the necessary help for the Visitors' Department by employing someone to act as temporary secretary during the interval pending amalgamation. I was, of course, alone responsible, but temporary appointments are always managed by Sir Kenneth, and he afterwards told me he had employed Mr. Reid, and had arranged with the Treasury that he should be paid 25*l.* a month during his employment for the time. I quite approved of what Sir Kenneth had done. This was in January 1912, and in June 1912 I resigned the Great Seal, and I do not know what happened afterwards, except that the amalgamation was not proceeded with.

50,664. (Mr. Coward.) The problem with regard to the clerks in these offices is to obtain efficiency?—Of course.

50,665. The present system is to appoint a clerk to the third class, and you would say that it is quite immaterial what his qualifications are for that except for the fact that by gradual yearly steps he may get up to the head of the first class?—Yes.

50,666. Solely by seniority, and without any selection?—I should think it is practically that, although there is always a right of selection, I think.

50,667. Yes, there is a right of selection, but we have had it over and over again that it is practically never exercised?—Practically, you are right.

50,668. They never get rid of a man; he goes up gradually by yearly increments to his salary of 5*l.* or 10*l.*, or whatever it may be, irrespective of whether he has improved or has not, until he gets to the top; but then, curiously enough, he does not go any farther. He is not eligible for a mastership, and is never made a master?—That is so.

50,669. It seems very curious to me that that should be the course of procedure, that you should go up from the lowest, which would mean the office boy, until you get up to the first class, and then you are not eligible for a mastership?—There are criticisms at both ends about the system to be made. The first is, as you say, that a man goes in as a third class clerk at 100*l.* a year and goes up automatically, and the work is partly mechanical and partly of a more difficult kind. I tried to meet that difficulty by the suggestion I made about two grades, but I was not asked, and I ought to add, that I should allow these clerks, if they are suitable for the work, to go straight up to masterships, or any other office in their department. I do not approve of what you call impenetrable bars in a department. I think merit ought always to have its full swing, and that if a man has done well it would encourage the whole office if he could reflect that he might get to the very top if he showed himself deserving. If an office boy came in in the first department under any system that you like to recommend for grading or otherwise, and was competent, I should like to see him go up to the second class and then to the first class, then to be made a master, and then to be made senior master if he is a suitable and proper person.

50,670. You may take it that all the men selected for the third class cannot, in the ordinary course of things, be competent people hereafter for the first class; as a rule, men have their limitations?—I quite agree. It is a question of limitations.

50,671. Therefore, if you find that the office is so managed that a man must by seniority get from the lowest to the highest, you cannot say that that is a good plan?—I quite agree.

50,672. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) That would point, would it not, to having definite efficiency bars at at least two points: First, at the head of the third class; a man recruited early with moderate qualifications for more or less mechanical duties would not pass out of the third class except he prove himself to be of unusual ability?—Except he prove himself to be a useful and proper appointment; but I should rather like to see him advanced. I would clear off all bars to begin with, and I would like, myself, to see him promoted if he had really done his work well in the third class, and was qualified for the second class.

50,673. For the second class we are told the qualification implies previous legal experience?—I do not think there is any legal qualification of that kind, but I think in practice—but here you must allow me to speak with some reserve, because I could not carry it all in my mind—the second class clerk, or rather the third class clerk, is very often taken from solicitors' offices, and then he goes up to the second class by seniority.

50,674. You would not agree with some of the witnesses who have given evidence to the Commission that experience for some years in a solicitor's office is a requirement for the higher second and first grades?—I should think it is very useful and desirable, but I should say that it is certainly not indispensable.

50,675. The experience that an able man in the third class acquires in the office might take the place of the experience acquired outside in a solicitor's office?—I think so.

50,676. It is also, I understand, for the higher ranks a requirement that professional legal experience should be previously had?—You mean for the masters?—Yes, I think the masters have always been so appointed.

50,677. It is a requirement?—I do not know whether it is a statutory requirement.

50,678. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) It is statutory—10 years' practice as a solicitor or barrister?—Very likely it is a statutory requirement, but I know it is the practice, perhaps in obedience to the statute.

50,679. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) So you see that at present such professional experience outside the office could not be acquired by one who is promoted from the third class?—Obviously. It is a bar, and I want to remove it.

50,680. That would involve your removing the qualification of previous legal experience as barrister or solicitor outside the office for appointment to the higher class?—To remove the disqualification of others; yes, I think it ought to be done.

50,681. Third class clerks would be recruited in the ordinary way up to the age of 22 or 24?—That sort of age; or you might go a little higher, perhaps. At present the limit is between 20 and 30 years.

50,682. Looking forward to the possibility of recruiting into the third class those who will afterwards be in the second or first class, or in masterships, would not that age of 30 be too high?—I do not know. You might make it 25, but I do not know that there is anything wrong in 30. I think it is preferable to have a rather younger man to begin with, but I do not think I would lower the age from 30. I would rather you consulted Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie about that.

50,683. What I had in my mind was what was suggested at previous sittings of the Commission, that a person who had had legal experience outside might be allowed to enter at a later age, and a person who had had no legal experience must enter before, say, 24. Would there be any fitness in that?—If in practice it turned out to be desirable I would reserve power to do that if you like. I do not see any objection to it. I would make the thing as flexible as you can.

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

50,684. I observe also that it has frequently been mentioned—and I think you, yourself, indicated it—that it was possible that a very large number of applicants for these third class posts are always available?—I am sure of that.

50,685. And it has also been said more than once that the difference between them is inappreciable?—It comes to this, that you have a lot of very good, well-deserving men who come forward, and it is a pitiable thing, I know, when there are so many seeking employment and there is so little employment to give.

50,686. I notice, my Lord, you state that in the case of many of the appointments there is very little, if anything, to choose between different candidates?—That is perfectly true.

50,687. I have reason to think that that is the case. Is not that a very strong argument for saying: "There is so little to choose between you, gentlemen, that I shall make you all go in for a competitive examination"?—Pray do not let me be understood as being a sworn foe of competitive examination. I am not. I think it really does solve a difficulty which otherwise seems to me, perhaps, insuperable; but I do beg very strongly to say that I am not to be taken as thinking that the man who passes the best examination knows most even of the subject on which he is examined. Let me tell you of an incident: I remember once being asked by one of the universities to examine for a great legal prize. It was a great compliment to me to ask me to do it. I was Attorney-General at the time, and I said, "Well, I will see; but let me see some of the papers that have been set," and they sent me the papers which had been set in previous examinations, and I declare to you that I doubt if I could have qualified in those papers, and I am quite certain that I could not have won the prize. The reason is that the questions had no relation to the actual work of the law as barristers and judges know it, and to me they investigated into a proficiency in knowledge which was useless for practical purposes.

50,688. But as examiner you could have set a paper which would have been suitable?—I would not examine, because I did not think I was qualified.

50,689. The result is that the examination in question was utterly inappropriate, say, for the class of candidates to be examined for the Civil Service?—This was not a Civil Service examination. I make no reflection upon anybody.

50,690. Does there not seem a strong reason, where you have a large number of candidates whose other qualifications are all very similar indeed, for you to say, "We shall decide who are successful and who are not by the results of a perfectly impartial, and appropriate, competitive examination"?—It cuts the Gordian knot.

50,691. Some preliminary qualification, as Mr. Snowden suggested, would be required beforehand as to previous experience, testimonials as to character, and so on, but the competitive examination would come in after these preliminaries had been settled?—Yes.

50,692. With regard to the promotion work of the proposed board or committee, which is extremely important, that committee would have to be sitting nearly continuously, would it not, if it were to take charge of the whole of the various legal departments, Central Office, and others?—Oh dear no. I do not think so. (Mr. Coward.) There are between 400 and 500 of these clerks in these offices—417, I think.

50,693. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) How many appointments are made a year?—(Mr. Coward.) I do not know that. (Witness.) If they are life appointments you can get at that by dividing the 417 by the average duration of the tenure of the office.

50,694. (Chairman.) The appointments are somewhere about 20 a year?—Most of the promotions would in all cases be routine.

50,695. (Sir Donald MacAlister.) Such a committee or board, then, would not be overworked?—No, it would meet very occasionally.

50,696. With regard to promotions, you contemplate it being an instruction to this committee that merit is the first consideration, and seniority only in cases of equality?—I did not mean to convey that. In the first place, I would exclude all existing appointments; but then when you come to the future if you leave a discretion you or I might intimate a preference one way or the other; but I am quite certain that no committee would ever pass over a man without good reason. I think we must all estimate how things of that kind would work, but my belief is that the rule would be promotion by seniority, and the exception would be selection by special merit. I think that is the way it would work.

50,697. You would give it as an option to such a Promotion Board—because it would be that?—It would be a Promotion Board—

50,698. To say, "Here is a vacancy; we will consider whether there is anyone in the office who is fit to fill the vacancy in order of seniority, and if we do not find such a person we are free to appoint someone from outside?"—Yes? the comparison that there is in my mind—if I may give you my reason—all through is this: Take the great staffs that there are. Many people in this country have large staffs of employees of all kinds—hundreds and thousands—and what they always do is, they get the best man they can with regard to the post. That is perhaps, rather too great a break with tradition to apply roughly, and at once, to the Civil Service, and therefore you go on not quite like that in a Government department; but I would try to qualify the practice of departments by the example of private employers in a reasonable way to a reasonable extent.

50,699. You would not exclude their appointing someone from outside to a high post, if they were not satisfied that there was anybody already on the staff who was perfectly suitable for it?—I should think if they had not anyone who was perfectly fit it would be their duty to appoint from outside.

50,700. (Miss Haldane.) There is one point with regard to appointments which I do not think you were asked about. Would you approve of further steps being taken to make vacant appointments known by advertisement or otherwise?—I should not object to it, but everybody who wants an appointment sends in his name, and anybody can send in his name. It is perfectly well known, so I doubt whether there is any necessity for advertising.

50,701. But I suppose it is known within a limited circle, so to speak; the whole public would not know it?—If they do not know it, and have not fair opportunities they ought to have fair opportunities.

50,702. I gather that you are in favour of a woman Visitor in Lunacy being appointed?—Most strongly. I do not care about the office—I mean they ought to be treated just in the same sort of way as men are; but I think it is a cruel thing not to allow women to have those of their own sex in high responsible positions dealing with lunacy matters.

50,703. At present, as you know, it is necessary for the visitor, other than the doctors, to have a legal qualification. Would you anticipate that the barrier against women being qualified in this way may soon disappear?—You are asking me quite a different question, but I do not in the least mind answering it. I think that the disqualifications for the legal profession which affect women now ought to be removed—I mean for entering these professions.

50,704. You think it ought to be open to women?—I think it ought to be open. I am not now speaking of a judgeship, which really is outside the whole scope of your inquiry, but I am speaking about admission into the legal profession.

50,705. (Mr. Philip Snowden.) That is to say, you would permit women to be solicitors and barristers?—Yes; and afterwards when they come to the period when they might become eligible for judicial offices, experience will be able to tell those who come after me whether they ought to be advanced to those offices.

24 March 1915.]

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

50,706. (Miss Haldane.) In fact, the best qualified persons, be they male or female, should be appointed?—I am speaking simply of admission to the legal profession. They would have to get their practice and business if they proved themselves to be competent for it, of course.

50,707. Do you consider that women might be admitted into some of the other departments which we have been discussing?—Certainly.

50,708. Into the clerical departments?—Certainly.

50,709. It struck me, in listening to the evidence, that a great deal of the work, for instance, in the Scrivenery Department really might be done by typists, and so on?—Is it not? I remember going once to the Law Courts and receiving a deputation of the scriveners. My memory may be failing, but if I recollect rightly there were some women there. Am I wrong?

50,710. (Chairman.) There are some, but not very many?—There are not very many in the Scrivenery Office.

50,711. (Miss Haldane.) There are a few in the office, and a certain amount of typing is done outside?—My answer is, that I see no objection to women being employed.

50,712. We had evidence from the official solicitor, that he appointed ladies in the country to visit lunatics because he was employed by the Masters in Lunacy to administer the estates of female lunatics. Nobody directed it, but it was done in a semi-private manner. It would be better, would it not, that the visiting should be done officially?—Certainly, and as a rule, and as a matter of course. I do not say that men should not act as medical advisers in regard to women patients, but to my mind women should certainly take part in it.

50,713. That women should also be visiting those lunatics who are women?—Yes. I may be wrong, I have never gone and visited these poor people myself, but I feel that if I were a woman, I would much prefer to see a woman as a medical inspector or visitor.

50,714. In fact, it applies both to the medical side and to the other side?—Yes, I am quite sure it would.

50,715. (Sir John Kempe.) I understand that you propose the establishment of a lower grade for inferior work. Already the scriveners do the absolutely mechanical work?—That is so.

50,716. The lower grade you propose would, I suppose, do the purely mechanical work, and something in addition, which is now done by the third class clerks. Would your new class be composed of men doing partly purely mechanical work, and partly the lower grade of work done by the third class now?—It is very difficult to distinguish between the different grades of work, and one would have to go into the thing closely in order to describe the dividing line. You never can find a formula to define things to absolutely mutually exclusive departments; but what I mean is that the sort of work which is done, which is merely clerical or which is merely mechanical, should be the work for the lower grade. I could not define the exact line. That would have to be done after inquiry into the nature of the work.

50,717. In the earliest days of the Civil Service the first committee recommended that there should be a distinct division between mechanical and intellectual work, as they called it, and the result of that was that the copyist class was established, and that turned out such a failure that it had to be abolished after a few years, and what was called the second division was established, into which many of the copyists were absorbed. It was found impossible, in fact, to have a lower grade for purely mechanical work. Would not the same difficulty arise now; that is to say, if you give the lower grade part of the work now done by the third class it would overlap the third class, and you always would have overlapping, unless you make a distinct division between mechanical and intellectual work?—I do not know that there is any distinction between mechanical and intellectual work that you can draw rigidly.

50,718. There is the typewriting machine for copying simply?—Typewriting, I should think, was mechanical work.

50,719. And there is copying, scrivenery?—I should think some copying was mechanical work.

50,720. Is it not far better to keep the distinction at mechanical work and not to try and impose upon the same class partly intellectual work, such as checking figures and the filling up of forms, which are very often liable to mistakes, and require a certain amount of intelligence?—No doubt you are perfectly right; but I could not draw the line distinctly. One would have to examine into it.

50,721. I want to know why you are dissatisfied with the third class doing some mechanical work and some less intellectual work now as training for their work afterwards. In all the Civil Service the lower class begin by doing a certain amount of less intellectual work and gradually rise. Do you wish to cut off the third class from that kind of work which, after all, is good training?—No; I do not want to cut them off from it in the least. What I feel, and the source of my suggestion, is this: You employ people to begin within the third class, and for the third class it suffices at present that a man shall have some examination in the three R's, and he is put into that class. There he has to do some mechanical work and some work which is not mechanical, like the filling up of forms. Then he proceeds steadily up until he gets to the top of the tree. The consequence is that the man who is introduced for mechanical reasons, so to speak, proceeds as if he had been introduced for other reasons.

50,722. My point is that you restore the old difficulty of overlapping work, and the difficulty of refusing to the lowest class entrance into the upper class unless they show distinguished merit. As at present the Scrivenery Department seems to be a fairly defined line, and it is purely mechanical work?—Yes.

50,723. I do not see why you should not be contented with the first, second, and third classes as they are now, but alter the method of entry if you like. I do not see that anything has been yet said sufficiently against the third class doing the work they do now?—I have not at any time suggested that they ought not to be entitled to promotion if they deserve it, but when you have mixed work, if it be mixed work, as it is, to a certain extent, I think you ought to have promotion when it is deserved, but not promotion going automatically and without any sufficient test to show that the person who is capable enough of stamping writs or filling up a simple form, for example, should go to the very top of the tree. However, it is a matter of opinion. I agree that there always must be a difficulty in finding a dividing line if you are going to divide.

50,724. Therefore, when you have a dividing line which seems fairly satisfactory, it seems a pity to depart from it?—If it is fairly satisfactory.

50,725. The scrivenery people do not expect to go up into the third class?—No.

50,726. (Chairman.) I have not understood your lordship's suggestion as including the scrivenery work in the lower grade that you speak of?—No.

50,727. The scrivenery work is at present entirely separate, and is mostly paid for as piecework. No suggestion has yet been put in evidence before the Commission, so far as I recollect, for putting that work upon the body of persons who do the present work of the third class, and I have not understood your suggestion as implying any change in that respect?—I did not mean to convey that. I thought I took the illustration of the Central Office with the first, second, and third class clerks. I did not mean to enter into the question of the Scrivenery Department at all, and I do not think I did.

50,728. The view on which the suggestion was based, as I understood it, was that the present work of the third class is, in the Central Office, and to a great extent throughout the legal offices, of a purely mechanical nature but of a clerical kind—the keeping of books and records and the filing of documents, but not the actual copying, which is done by the scriveners. It is work of a very mechanical kind, although of a clerical character, and it was work of that kind which you considered an unsatisfactory preparation for work of a better kind, and you suggested that it had better be treated by a separate grade which would not normally look for promotion to the higher grades. Was not that your suggestion?—That is exactly what I meant.

The Right Hon. EARL LOREBURN, G.C.M.G.

50,729. (Sir John Kempe.) That seems to me to raise a difficult question of three grades instead of two?—If you will introduce me to a question on the point which is not difficult I shall be much obliged.

(Chairman.) The Commission are much indebted to your lordship for the evidence you have given.

Mr. CHARLES NEISH, C.B., Registrar of the Privy Council (Judicial Committee), accompanied by Mr. W. R. WALLACE, Chief Clerk, called and examined.

50,730. (Chairman.) You are Registrar of the Privy Council?—I am.

50,731. How long have you held that office?—Since September 1909.

50,732. What had been your previous experience before appointment as registrar?—I was a barrister called in 1881. I had a practice at the Bar. I “devilled,” to use the common expression, for Lord Loreburn when he was Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, and also “devilled” for him when he ceased to hold those offices, and on the appointment of Lord Loreburn as Lord Chancellor I became his private secretary, an office which I held for four years, from 1905 to 1909.

50,733. Generally, what is the work of the office?—The duties of the Judicial Department are practically confined to appeals to His Majesty in Council from India, the Dominions beyond the Seas, Channel Islands and Isle of Man, and the Ecclesiastical Courts of this country, and matters specially referred by His Majesty to the Judicial Committee. That is under Section 4 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833. The only index to the amount of work transacted would be a return of the number of appeals and analogous matters which were admitted in any one year. I have here a table giving the information for two years. In 1891–92 there were 68 appeals and 35 petitions for leave to appeal, etc. In 1911–12 there were 121 appeals and 84 petitions. Since then I have had the return made up to date, and in 1912 there were 100 appeals and 83 petitions. In 1913 there were 141 appeals and 105 petitions. In 1914 there were 115 appeals and 115 petitions—the two figures corresponding.

50,734. I gather from that the work is increasing?—Yes. Since then under the Government of Ireland Act and the Welsh Church Act various matters are also referred to the Judicial Committee. All appeals from Ireland and questions as to the validity of Irish Acts of Parliament in future will come to the Judicial Committee. Under the Welsh Church Act, there are questions for appeal as regards border parishes and also questions as to the amount of funds to be transferred to the new body constituted under that Act. In addition to that we take all the appeals from the Prize Courts in this country and throughout the empire.

50,735. That is likely to give a considerable amount of work in the near future?—Yes.

50,736. Then the work of the registrar and his office in connection with those cases consists, I suppose, of practically the whole of the work which is done in the Supreme Court by the officers of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

50,737. That is to say the preparation of all papers and the keeping of the records in connection with those cases?—Yes, and seeing that the cases are all ripe for hearing. In addition to that we very often have to keep practitioners right on questions of practice; they are in and out all day long consulting us. We carry on a very large correspondence with all parts of the empire. Colonial judges and colonial practitioners come to the office every now and again to make inquiries as to matters of procedure, and so forth.

50,738. Has the registrar any work of a judicial character?—Only so far as occasionally advising the Board on questions of practice, and, of course, I am responsible for the accuracy of the Orders in Council; they certainly require extraordinary care, because once we have passed an Order in Council we cannot alter it without a further Order in Council.

50,739. The registrar has none of the work which, for instance, masters have in deciding on interlocutory applications or applications on points of procedure?—

Sometimes the parties come before me, but not very often. In addition to what I have outlined just now I have to do all the taxations; I am the taxing officer for the appeals.

50,740. And all orders are drawn up by you?—Yes, with the assistance of the chief clerk, and the judgments, of course, are revised.

50,741. What is the staff of the office?—The staff consists of myself, a chief clerk, a second clerk, a third clerk, and a lady typist.

50,742. And that staff is sufficient for keeping up with the work?—Yes, I think so.

50,743. Will you tell us what the salaries of those officers are?—My salary in 1909 was 1,200*l.*, and in 1915 it became 1,500*l.* That was under an old arrangement, I think, settled in 1874.

50,744. What was your age on appointment?—52. The salary of my chief clerk, Mr. W. R. Wallace, is 500*l.* rising to 650*l.* by increments of 20*l.* a year. His present salary is 600*l.*, and, I think, he reaches the maximum in 1917. His age on appointment in 1902 was 29. He entered the office in that year as second clerk.

50,745. What had been his previous experience?—He had been transferred from the Official Solicitor's Department, Royal Courts of Justice, where he had been a managing clerk for more than six years prior to 1902. The second clerk is Mr. J. H. Houghton. His salary is 250*l.* to 450*l.*, rising by increments of 15*l.* a year. His present salary is 325*l.* His age on appointment in 1909 was 30. He came from the district registrar's office at Liverpool. Both these gentlemen are solicitors of the Supreme Court. The third clerk is Mr. D. G. Lys. His salary is 100*l.* rising to 250*l.* by increments of 10*l.* a year; his present salary is 220*l.* His age on appointment in 1900 as temporary clerk was 19. He was a boy clerk in the Charity Commission from 1897 to 1900; he was appointed to a temporary clerkship in 1900, and on a reorganisation of the department in 1902, having passed the examination for assistant clerks (abstractors) he was appointed third clerk.

50,746. You also have a woman clerk?—Yes, Miss Lewis. Her salary is now 40*s.* to 46*s.* a week, rising by increments of 2*s.* per week per annum. Her present salary is 42*s.* per week. I think Sir Almeric FitzRoy was asked in 1912 some questions in regard to her salary, which was then 26*s.* a week plus 25*l.* a year as a maximum for shorthand. She very nearly reached the 25*l.* a year, but not in every year. That would make her maximum salary before 1913 92*l.* 12*s.* as against her present salary of 109*l.* 2*s.*

50,747. Does she do any work besides shorthand and typewriting?—Yes, she reads the proofs. I might explain that most of the records that come from abroad are printed, but a certain number come over in manuscript (I think the number for last year was 40), and they are printed here, and then it becomes the duty of Miss Lewis to go through the proofs with the solicitors to see that they are accurate.

50,748. The proofs of those that are printed here?—Yes, and it was for that reason that it was thought she ought to have some more money. We had a proof reader, a Mr. Maggiolini, who was retired in 1913, who, I think, got 3*l.* a week, and when his retirement took place we represented to the Treasury that Miss Lewis's position, and also the position of Mr. Lys, might be improved. The Treasury assented to that, and they gave Mr. Lys an extra 50*l.* a year, and they increased Miss Lewis's remuneration, as I have already stated, to 46*s.* a week.

50,749. (Mr. Coward.) These transcripts are not always in English?—No, they are sometimes in French.

24 March 1915.] Mr. CHARLES NEISH, C.B., accompanied by Mr. W. R. WALLACE.

50,750. From Canada they come to a considerable extent in French if they come from the French part of Canada?—Yes, from Quebec.

50,751. Does Miss Lewis understand French?—She has some knowledge of it; I do not suppose she can speak it; but, I do not think, there is much difficulty. I should imagine that the solicitor's clerk's French is not particularly good, and I dare say she manages to make it out.

50,752. (Miss Haldane.) I think Sir Almeric FitzRoy told us that she got an additional increment for doing overtime work. Is it a recent change that you are speaking of?—Yes; I think that was under a different set of circumstances before 1913.

50,753. Yes, it was 1912 Sir Almeric was speaking of?—Yes.

50,754. (Chairman.) All the records are printed before they come before the Court?—Yes.

50,755. Are all the judgments printed too?—Yes, all the judgments are printed.

50,756. Does the work of the department vary much at different times of the year?—No, I do not think it does very much. Of course, we are busier when the Board is sitting, but there is a great deal of routine work to be done when the Board is not sitting.

50,757. And that goes on all the year round?—Yes, and there is a very large correspondence as well with the courts abroad.

50,758. What rules apply as regards hours of attendance?—The usual Civil Service rules—10 to 5—and the same arrangement applies to the holidays.

50,759. And the usual Civil Service rules as regards holidays?—Yes; but in regard to that I might say that, so far as the first and second clerks are concerned, I doubt very much whether they get the full Civil Service holiday, because we have a rule in the office that one of these professional gentlemen must always be in attendance in case any questions arise or require to be answered by people who call.

50,760. (Mr. Coward.) In or out of vacation?—Yes, the office is open all the year round, except on Christmas Day, Good Friday, and the Bank Holidays.

50,761. (Chairman.) Have you any rule as regards the age limit of retirement?—The Civil Service rules as to retirement apply to the clerks, but my office is one which is held from the King. It is a patent office, and I believe, so far as I am personally concerned, there is no age limit.

50,762. You hold office during good behaviour?—Yes.

50,763. Who appoints to your office?—The King, on the recommendation of the Lord President, under Section 18 of the Act of 1833.

50,764. And who appoints to the other posts in the office?—The other appointments are made by the Lord President, entirely on his own responsibility.

50,765. And promotions, too, I presume, are made by the Lord President?—Yes.

50,766. Have the clerks to obtain Civil Service certificates?—Yes.

50,767. Is there any qualifying examination?—No, except, I suppose, there must have been some examination for the third clerk. He came from the class of abstractors, but really it was long before my time, and I do not know about that. They settled that qualification for Mr. Lys, as he had passed that particular examination.

50,768. So he obtained a certificate after passing that examination?—Yes.

50,769. And are the first and second clerks certificated?—Yes.

50,770. Were they certificated under clause 7, without examination?—(Mr. Wallace.) I think the answer is, yes. I got the usual certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners, and produced my admission certificate as a solicitor to them.

50,771. Were you medically examined?—Yes, and also the usual certificates were obtained as to my character.

50,772. And on that you were given a certificate from the Commissioners, probably, under what is known as clause 7?—I think so.

50,773. (Mr. Coward.) You had undergone your examination before you were admitted?—Yes, as a solicitor.

50,774. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Neish.) Do you find the present organisation and the system of the office satisfactory?—If I may say so, it is quite admirable. We all know each others' work, and it is all interchangeable; and if one of the clerks is away ill or absent for any reason, the others are quite capable of doing his work.

50,775. Do you think that the present system of appointment is the best?—I think so on the whole. There may be a better, but on the whole it is satisfactory.

50,776. Suggestions have been made to the Commission as to a Committee or Board to make appointments to all the legal departments. If such a Board were set up, would you consider it would be better that appointments to your department should be made by that Board?—I should have thought not. The vacancies are very few; it is a very small office; but I should think it was rather more a question for the Commission than for myself. All I can say is, that the present arrangement is satisfactory; I am responsible for the working of the office, and I do not think I can say more than that.

50,777. A question has also been raised with regard to the other offices—whether the clerks in the office should be considered eligible for appointment to the head post in the office, mastership or registrarship as the case may be, provided they have the necessary qualities for performance of the work?—I can see no objection to that, because in the case of my office the statute itself is particularly vague; it says, "any person" may be appointed.

50,778. Is there any statutory qualification?—No statutory qualification at all.

50,779. So there would be nothing to prevent the Lord President appointing one of the clerks if he thought him a suitable person?—Absolutely nothing. The Act uses the expression "any person," and "any person" might mean even a person without any legal qualification, which, I think, might be rather disastrous.

50,780. (Sir John Kempe.) Do you have much to do with the other legal departments?—No, not very much. We sometimes have business with what I might call the Privy Council proper—Sir Almeric FitzRoy's department, but that is chiefly in regard to passing Orders in Council.

50,781. Your work is not what they call technical legal work, like the Chancery?—Yes, it is.

50,782. But I suppose you have technicalities of your own; experience of the work in the Chancery and other legal departments would not help any one in your department?—No; but ours is purely legal work.

50,783. Is it more legal than some of the work of the Colonial Office, for instance?—Certainly. It has entirely to do with appeals from legal courts abroad.

50,784. It is a court, in fact?—Yes.

50,785. (Mr. Coward.) I should like to say that I have nothing to ask you, because I have always heard that your office is conducted as a model office?—I am obliged to you.

50,786. (Mr. Graham Wallas.) In your model office you have the opportunity of seeing rather closely the work of a lady shorthand typist?—Yes.

50,787. Would you say it is true that the work of a thorough shorthand typist is purely mechanical?—No, I should not say that, because our lady has to understand to a certain extent legal phraseology.

50,788. That is to say, a lady of good general ability and good education is enormously more useful than a lady who has acquired the merely mechanical arts of shorthand and typewriting?—I would not say enormously, because, given ordinary intelligence, any lady might pick it up in time; but, so far as regards starting a lady on this business is concerned, it is an advantage to have that knowledge.

50,789. Anyhow, the developed work is not mechanical work?—Not altogether.

50,790. You said the members of the staff could do each other's work, and were, in fact, interchangeable in the case of holidays, and so on. Does that include Miss Lewis?—No.
